This is a solid Republican district in which Bush drew 66 percent in 2004 and 63 percent in 2000. Recent party registration figures show an advantage for the GOP of 100,000 registered voters — 189,942 Republicans (46 percent), 89,182 Democrats (22 percent) and 132,606 independents (32 percent).

Like New Jersey's 5th district, one public poll alleges that the race is competitive, but here it's an independent Mason-Dixon survey. Moreover, Republicans had a bitter primary and have not united since. All of those circumstances argue for including the race on a list of competitive contests, at least for the moment.

But if you are a Democratic partisan looking for a way for Democrats to net 40 or 50 seats, don't kid yourself. The fundamentals of Colorado's 5th are so terrible for Democrats that it's hard to believe Fawcett will win. Lamborn certainly created enemies within his own party, but he can afford to lose a bunch of them, given his edge in party registration.

DOJ_NMG_0082390

For Democrats, the more interesting long shots may include Rep. Melissa Hart (R-Pa.), whose 4th district gave Bush 54 percent of the vote in 2004 and 52 percent four years earlier. Or Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R), who represents a competitive district in southeastern Minnesota. A true national wave could hit hard in districts like those, creating opportunities that Democrats ought not have in a normal year. That's why both of these races now are on my list of Democratic challenges to watch.

I expect a major surprise or two on election night, with an unheralded Democrat or two pulling off an upset, possibly in a rock-ribbed Republican district. I'll try not to miss that race, but I won't be embarrassed if I do.

In Senate Fund Drive, Democrats Are Ahead (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans were outraised by Democratic opponents in key races in third-quarter fund-raising, setting the stage for a competitive campaign stretch.

In Virginia, a string of incidents raising questions about the ethnic sensitivity of incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen appeared to take a toll. Mr. Allen reported raising $1.94 million in the quarter ended Sept. 30 compared with $3.3 million raised by his Democratic challenger Jim Webb.

In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill outraised Republican Sen. Jim Talent by about $1 million. Mr. Talent reported $4.2 million still in the bank, while Ms. McCaskill reported $246,000 in cash on hand after a major final television ad buy.

Democrat Bob Casey reported raising $3.94 million in his campaign to unseat Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. The Santorum camp reported having $3.6 million in the bank at the end of September; Mr. Casey reported $3.7 million.

Not all incumbents showed weakness, however. Republican Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine collected $2.9 million compared with $2.7 million raised by his challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown.

Lieberman Likes Bolton For UN Job (NYDN)

By Helen Kennedy

New York Daily News, October 17, 2006

Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman yesterday endorsed controversial Bush appointee John Bolton for a permanent slot at the United Nations - putting him at odds once again with Democrats, including his Senate colleague Chris Dodd.

Dodd (D-Conn.) is the leading critic of Bolton, the controversial envoy President Bush sent to the UN on a temporary ambassadorship after Democrats and some key Republicans balked at nominating him.

"I see no reason not to be for Bolton," Lieberman told a meeting of the Daily News Editorial Board.

"Based on his capabilities - and now based on his performance - I believe Bolton is well-qualified," he said.

"I think he's been a good negotiator and a good spokesman. He deserves to have a vote. I think he deserves to be confirmed."

Bolton's recess appointment expires at the end of the year, and he will need Senate approval to remain as UN ambassador.

Lieberman had not publicly taken a position on Bolton before.

Lieberman's support for Bush's foreign policies lost him the Democratic primary in Connecticut. He is now running for reelection as an independent and has a comfortable lead in polls.

Dodd, who is campaigning for the Democratic candidate, Ned Lamont, had led the fight against nominating Bolton and remains his fiercest critic, saying his performance at the UN so far merits "a failing grade."

In a blistering Senate speech last month listing what he called Bolton's failures, Dodd said, "My objection isn't that he is a bully, but that he's been a very ineffective bully - he can't win the day when it really counts."

In 2nd Debate, Whitehouse, Chafee Return To Familiar Themes (BOS/AP)

By Michelle R. Smith

The Boston Globe, October 17, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. --Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee and his Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse tangled over corruption, independence and the Republican Senate on Monday in their second radio debate.

"The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island," Whitehouse said.

Chafee said Whitehouse's record as a former state attorney general and U.S. attorney was one of "incompetence and willful blindness."

DOJ_NMG_0082391

The conversation continued the themes the candidates have focused on in recent days, with Chafee assailing Whitehouse's record as a prosecutor and saying he ignored corruption by friends of powerful Democrats, and Whitehouse tying Chafee to President Bush and the "Republican agenda."

The latest polls have showed Whitehouse apparently leading Chafee, who is still recovering from an expensive primary against Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey. National Democrats hope winning the seat will help them take back control of the Senate, and they've been running TV ads since last month's primary.

The hour-long debate was broadcast on WHJJ-AM from in front of a live audience at Rhode Island College. Their first TV debate was scheduled for Thursday evening on WPRI-TV.

Whitehouse on Monday continued to press his central campaign theme: that a vote for Chafee amounts to a vote for Republicans and Bush, both unpopular in Rhode Island.

"We have a chance to put a Democratic Senate in place, and a Democratic Senate can stop the nonsense," Whitehouse said, adding "We need a change in leadership."

Chafee, one of the most liberal Republicans in the Senate, has run on his record of clashing with fellow Republicans, including Bush, and has emphasized his credentials as an independent thinker, saying Monday that he "has the guts to make the tough decisions."

In recent days, including in the candidates' first debate Friday, Chafee has tried to shift the focus to Whitehouse's record as the state's top prosecutor, saying Whitehouse had not done enough to go after public corruption when it involved Democrats.

"He did not want to step on the toes of his friends," Chafee said Monday, adding, "It's a record of continued incompetence as attorney general and U.S. attorney."

Whitehouse responded by saying that when he departed his job as U.S. attorney, he was thanked by the staff for "solid gold leadership" with a plaque presented to him by Chafee's brother, Zechariah, who also worked in the U.S. attorney's office.

Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University, said Chafee's focus may not gain traction with voters.

"I think when you're running for the Senate, voters are going to be much more attuned to national rather than local issues," West said. "This is an era when there are big things on the agenda, like the war and the economy."

Both Chafee and Whitehouse oppose the war in Iraq. Chafee was the lone Republican senator to vote against authorizing the war, and pointed out again Monday that Democrats controlled the majority in the Senate when it voted to authorize war.

However, they disagree on what to do now, with Whitehouse calling for a timetable to withdraw troops and Chafee saying he supports a plan to eventually pull out -- but not a specific timetable.

"It's a quagmire. We have tremendous challenges, there's no doubt about that," Chafee said. "Our best formula is to work with the countries around Iraq."

They also both support legalizing gay marriage and abortion rights and oppose Bush's tax cuts.

"We're going to be years digging out from George Bush's deficits," Whitehouse said.

Among those who attended the debate were Joseph Robert Fontes Jr., 52, a Whitehouse volunteer who worked and voted for Chafee when he first ran for election in 2000. Chafee was appointed to the seat in 1999 upon the death of his father, John Chafee, who served more than 20 years in the Senate.

Fontes, an unemployed inventor of golf clubs and a registered Democrat, described both candidates as good men, but said the country needs a change.

"Republicans have mismanaged the budget, they've mismanaged the war," he said. "A year from today, I hope the country's in better shape."

Chafee, Whitehouse Debate Along Familiar Lines (PROJO)

By Steve Peoples

The Providence Journal, October 17, 2006

A live radio debate this afternoon between the two candidates for U.S. Senate in Rhode Island was largely civil -- and largely repetitive.

As he has done for months, Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse did his best to connect his opponent to the Republican Party and President Bush. "We need a new direction in Washington...To change America, we have to change the Senate," Whitehouse said.

And as he has done since winning the Republican primary, Sen. Lincoln Chafee downplayed his ties to the GOP, highlighting his character and his ability to work with people from both parties. "Senator Chafee has the guts to make tough decisions," he said.

Chafee added that it would work to Rhode Island's advantage to have at least one member of its Congressional delegation be in the party in power. Rhode Island's three other delegates to Congress are Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0082392

"Not only have I voted my conscience time and time again, but I've also delivered for Rhode Island," Chafee said.

The race is being watched nationally as Democrats look to regain the majority in Congress.

Chafee did his best to turn the debate to local issues and Whitehouse's actions as a former U.S. attorney in Rhode Island, compared to Whitehouse's repeated efforts to focus on the direction of the country and other national issues such as health care and Iraq.

Chafee sharply criticized Whitehouse's record as U.S. attorney, alleging he failed to pursue charges related to political corruption while in office. "Mr. Whitehouse is guilty of willful blindness" in not pursuing an investigation, Chafee said. "He did not want to step on the toes of his friends."

Again and again, Whitehouse focused on the national implications of the election.

"The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island," Whitehouse said. "We have a chance to put a Democratic Senate in place, and a Democratic Senate can stop the nonsense."

Today's debate was held at WHJJ, 920 AM. Radio host Arlene Violet moderated.

Whitehouse and Chafee will meet this Thursday night for their first televised debate. The Providence Journal and WPRI-TV, Channel 12, are co-sponsoring the hour-long debate, which will air live from Warwick's Toll Gate High School at 7 p.m. on WPRI.

The general election is Nov. 7, about three weeks away.

Allen Touts Conservative Record, Ideas (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen yesterday said that he will be re-elected by sticking to conservative issues, even as national liberals are funneling cash to his Democratic opponent and linking the senator to an unpopular president.

On Thursday, Mr. Allen will appear with President Bush to refuel his campaign coffers in an effort to counter Democrat James H. Webb Jr.'s robust fundraising and to rally his anti-tax and socially conservative base.

"If it's based on issues, stands on issues, solutions, ideas and a proven record of performance, I think we're going to win," Mr. Allen, a Republican, told editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The people of Virginia know me as a senator and as a governor."

The first-term senator said that he wants to make the president's tax cuts permanent and expressed support for privately managed health savings accounts and opposition to activist judges. Mr. Allen was scheduled to appear last night in a two-minute statewide campaign commercial with Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner.

Mr. Webb's call for "more revenue" because of the billions of dollars being spent on the war in Iraq is a "code word for raising taxes," said Mr. Allen, adding that holding the line on taxes is "one of the most salient issues in our campaign."

Mr. Webb supports rolling back some of Mr. Bush's tax credits for the wealthy, giving a 5 percent tax break for military veterans who serve honorably and extending tax cuts for Virginia's families, such as the college-tuition tax credit. "Any tax breaks that benefit a large section of the American people, I am for," the Democratic challenger said last week.

A former Navy secretary under President Reagan, Mr. Webb has not yet accepted an invitation to be interviewed at The Times.

Mr. Allen once held a commanding lead in his re-election bid and seemed poised for a 2008 White House bid.

However, polls show that Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in a race that could determine the control of the Senate come Nov. 7. Stars of both parties are crossing the Potomac River and bringing national money to both men.

Mr. Webb has benefited from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's $1 million ad attacking Mr. Allen and from fundraisers hosted by prominent senators such as Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Former President Bill Clinton will headline a high-dollar fundraiser in McLean for Mr. Webb on the same night that Mr. Bush is scheduled to appear at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond for Mr. Allen.

Mr. Bush's approval rating in Virginia is in the low 40s, and Mr. Webb reminds voters at every stop that Mr. Allen has supported the president 97 percent of the time in general and 100 percent of the time on foreign policy.

"The president is welcome in Virginia," Mr. Allen said yesterday. "We hope it's a good fundraiser for us. We need the funds to battle the national liberal Democrats."

When asked, Mr. Allen said that he has disagreed with Mr. Bush on immigration reform, education and the nomination of Harriet Miers as a U.S. Supreme Court justice.

The president's No Child Left Behind Act forces Virginia to "dumb down" its Standards of Learning, which were created when Mr. Allen was governor, the senator said.

DOJ_NMG_0082393

Mr. Allen also said that he learned too late about the real cost of Mr. Bush's Medicare prescription-drug program, which he supported with the intent of helping the frail afford prescriptions.

"Clearly, the facts were not accurate," he said.

Mr. Allen said that he and Mr. Warner, a fellow Republican and Virginia's senior senator, agree on the fundamentals when it comes to the war in Iraq. Most notably, the two senators say that the country cannot become a haven for terrorists.

"It hasn't gone as well as I wish it had gone," Mr. Allen said yesterday.

Like Mr. Webb, Mr. Allen yesterday said that he is comfortable with women's roles in the military.

The issue has lingered, in part, because of an Allen television ad that criticizes Mr. Webb for writing a 1979 magazine article questioning a woman's place in the military. Mr. Webb apologized for the article's tone and stressed that he opened more operational jobs to women than any other Navy secretary.

As of Oct. 1, Mr. Allen had $5.5 million in cash on hand and Mr. Webb $2.7 million, according to campaign finance disclosures.

Ex-Gov. Warner Puts Weight Behind Webb (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat

The Washington Times-AP, October 17, 2006

Virginia's two most popular politicians jumped full-bore into the state's Senate campaign yesterday, with former Gov. Mark Warner promising to do all he can to get Democrat James H. Webb Jr. elected and U.S. Sen. John W. Warner making a joint televised appearance with Republican Sen. George Allen.

The two Warners are not related.

Mark Warner, who surprised political observers Friday by forgoing an anticipated run for the presidency, campaigned yesterday with Mr. Webb at a Fairfax County retirement community and said many more joint appearances are forthcoming.

"I'll have a little more time now to campaign with him,"Mr. Warner said, referring to his aborted presidential bid. "I'm going to put all my energy behind this effort."

In particular, the former governor said he would campaign with fellow Democrat Mr. Webb in Southside and Southwest Virginia -- two parts of the state where Mr. Warner has worked for years to build up credibility with conservative voters there.

Mr. Warner left office in January with approval ratings above 70 percent. Perhaps the only Virginia politician who rivals Mr. Warner's popularity is Sen. Warner, a Republican who won re-election in 2002 with 83 percent of the vote.

Mr. Allen for the second time in his campaign purchased a two-minute block at 7:58 p.m. yesterday in all of Virginia's broadcast markets -- this time for a taped joint appearance with Sen. Warner.

Still, Mr. Webb yesterday called Sen. Warner a friend and said he thinks his positions hold more in common with Sen. Warner than Mr. Allen's.

Mr. Webb noted that Sen. Warner recently offered a sober assessment of the situation in Iraq and said the Bush administration might need to consider a "change of course" if the Iraqi government cannot stabilize the situation in the next few months. Mr. Webb has consistently criticized Mr. Bush's move to invade Iraq and his handling of the war and subsequent occupation.

Mr. Webb also cited Sen. Warner's support for embryonic stem-cell research, which Mr. Allen has opposed.

"It seems like Senator Warner's positions are actually closer to Jim Webb than to George Allen," Mr. Warner told reporters.

Mr. Allen's campaign did not immediately return calls yesterday afternoon seeking comment.

Mr. Webb and Mr. Warner fielded questions yesterday at a town-hall forum in Greenspring Village, a well-heeled retirement community of nearly 2,000 that is its own voting precinct and routinely has among the highest voter turnouts in the state. Last year, Democrat Timothy M. Kaine carried the precinct by about 20 points, similar to his margin of victory in the rest of Fairfax County.

Most of the questions from the audience of nearly 300 were about Iraq.

When one resident asked if Mr. Webb would impeach Mr. Bush, Mr. Webb responded that he would do "everything in my power to bring accountability to what has happened on a variety of fronts in this administration." When the resident pointed out that Mr. Webb did not answer the question, Mr. Webb simply smiled in response.

Most but not all in attendance were supportive of Mr. Webb.

Suri Khanna, 70, a native of India, said before the event that he supports Mr. Allen in part because of his support of the Indian-American community on issues like visas for high-tech workers. He described as overblown the "macaca" incident, in which Mr. Allen used what is sometimes regarded as an ethnic slur against a Webb campaign staffer of Indian descent.

After yesterday's forum, Mr. Khanna said he heard nothing from Mr. Webb to change his mind.

DOJ_NMG_0082394

"On Iraq, Webb wants to do exactly what Bush is doing," Mr. Khanna said, referring to Mr. Webb's reluctance to immediately pull troops out of Iraq.

Recent polls show the contest between Mr. Allen ahead by between two and 4.7 percentage points.

Boxing's King Throws Jabs For Steele, GOP (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

Boxing promoter Don King yesterday campaigned with Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Prince George's County and Baltimore, telling black voters to support Mr. Steele's U.S. Senate candidacy even though he is a Republican.

"For black people, there can't be a fealty to party. That's not fidelity to truth," said Mr. King, a Republican.

With his trademark hair standing straight up, Mr. King appeared with Mr. Steele at a cafe in Largo Town Center and then on a street corner in West Baltimore. The two then visited a youth boxing center.

Mr. King criticized the state Democratic Party for not promoting black leaders.

"You don't have any black faces on the Democratic ticket," Mr. King said. "John Kennedy said sometimes party loyalty asks too much."

The Democratic nominees for the top four statewide races -- governor, Senate, attorney general and comptroller -- are all white men. Delegate Anthony G. Brown, the Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor, is black.

Mr. Steele is the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1.

Black political, business and religious leaders have noted growing discontent among black voters, who compose about 40 percent of registered Democrats and have been the party's most loyal voting bloc.

Mr. Steele seized on that sentiment yesterday at the cafe in Largo. He displayed a recent photograph of his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, campaigning with Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. All three are white men.

"I see the leadership that's sitting down at the table to talk about the future. I don't see us represented," Mr. Steele said to the predominantly black audience of about 40 people. "You are at my table, friends."

A Cardin spokesman did not respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Cardin's primary criticism of Mr. Steele has been that the lieutenant governor was recruited by President Bush and supports the president's policies.

Mr. King, who campaigned for Mr. Bush in 2004, yesterday said that he "loves" the president for promoting blacks to top spots within his administration.

"I love George Walker Bush for what he did symbolically," Mr. King said.

Mr. King rose to fame and fortune by promoting boxers such as Muhammad Ali and Mike Tyson, but also has had legal troubles that include a manslaughter conviction, for which he served four years in prison. He referred to his checkered past yesterday.

"I must have an indictments list longer than his awards list," Mr. King said, comparing himself with Mr. Steele.

Racial politics in Maryland has focused on the Democratic efforts to secure support among blacks and Mr. Steele's ability to thwart those efforts.

For instance, hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons, who has supported Democratic candidates and causes, endorsed Mr. Steele in August and has appeared with him in campaign ads.

Republican lawmakers in rural parts of Maryland yesterday said that Mr. King's endorsement of Mr. Steele will not turn off white voters.

"[Mr. King] is a successful guy in a very iffy sport," said Delegate Richard A. Sossi, Eastern Shore Republican. "I don't think that's going to be a big issue one way or the other."

Delegate Anthony J. O'Donnell, Southern Maryland Republican, said Mr. Steele "appeals to a broad spectrum of people."

"I represent a very conservative district, and my district loves Michael Steele," Mr. O'Donnell said. "It's a good thing. It may help us get over some of this trash that's been out there for decades."

Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J. (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

One of an occasional series

The same Democratic leaders who have long hoped to regain control of Congress by blasting a Republican "culture of corruption" are in danger of losing their shot at the Senate because of accusations of corruption against Sen. Robert Menendez.

DOJ_NMG_0082395

What was expected to be an easy win for Democrats has become one of the nation's most hotly contested Senate races.

Mr. Menendez, New Jersey Democrat, has been plagued by news reports that he's under federal investigation for a long-standing rental deal with a nonprofit group that received millions in federal funding while he was a House member.

His Republican opponent, Tom Kean Jr., has hammered the Democratic incumbent in negative ads. And the criticism increased last month after the Philadelphia Inquirer reported a taped conversation in which a Menendez ally told a government contractor that he would have "protection" if he hired a doctor with ties to Mr. Menendez.

Democrats say they're not surprised by the Republican focus on accusations of corruption but say Mr. Menendez will win anyway by linking Mr. Kean to President Bush. Polls show that Mr. Bush is unpopular in this liberal state, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans.

"We are confident Bob Menendez is going to be elected," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Tom Kean is a George Bush clone."

The lesser evil

Political observers say the outcome depends on whether voters here get angrier about Mr. Bush and the Iraq war or about state corruption.

"Is this going to be a national referendum or is it going to be a statewide referendum on state corruption?" said New Jersey Republican political consultant Mark Campbell. "If this is national, Menendez wins; if this is a statewide election on the need for reform ... Tom Kean Jr. wins."

"People deserve to know if their senator is the only senator under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said as he took a break Oct. 8 from shaking hands with the tailgating crowd at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.

A Quinnipiac University poll taken Oct. 4 to 10 found 49 percent of likely voters support Mr. Menendez and 45 percent back Mr. Kean. It also found that 57 percent of voters feel the ethics questions about Mr. Menendez are serious.

One of Mr. Kean's latest ads plays part of the 1999 taped conversation in which Menendez adviser Donald Scarinci asks a contractor -- acting as an FBI informant -- to rehire a doctor as a "favor" to Mr. Menendez. The ad says kickback schemes and federal probes are "what you get with Bob Menendez."

In another ad, Mr. Kean promises to free New Jersey from the "clutch of corruption." And yesterday, the 38-year-old state senator cited a press report that Mr. Menendez tried to help a convicted felon transfer to a prison closer to his family.

Mr. Menendez, 52, was appointed in January to fill the Senate seat vacated when Democratic Sen. Jon Corzine was elected governor.

The Democrat said he's being attacked "viciously and falsely" and has repeatedly said he's not under federal investigation, although Republicans note that he told ABC last month that "we welcome" such a probe.

Mr. Menendez has hit back at Mr. Kean with ethics charges of his own. He ran an ad blasting Mr. Kean's campaign for contacting a jailed felon to dig up dirt for the race.

And he charged yesterday that Mr. Kean should be investigated for having a fundraiser with executives from UnitedHealth, which is burdened by a stock-option scandal. Mr. Kean's father sits on the company's board, but the Republican's camp said there was no impropriety and accused Mr. Menendez of making "a baseless attack."

Guilt by geography

Mr. Menendez is a former mayor of Union City with political roots in Hudson County, which has a statewide reputation for corruption. He recently complained to the Associated Press that he's tired of being labeled "guilty by geography."

But in a state where Democrat Sen. John Kerry got 53 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election, the Senate race is too close to call, and New Jersey Republican lobbyist Michael Torpey said, "The issue of corruption is clearly resonating with people."

That resonance surprises some observers.

"It's hard for me to see how the race turns on ethics," said Rutgers political science professor Cliff Zukin.

Some N.J. voters seem indifferent to the ethics issue, while others are clearly turned off. New Jersey Democratic lobbyist Rick Thigpen said Republicans may be running a negative campaign in order to turn off voters and keep turnout low, which would benefit Mr. Kean in this Democrat-heavy state.

"Everybody's disgusted with all of them," said Pat Resciniti, 51, a Bloomfield resident who watched Mr. Menendez and other politicians march by in the Nutley Columbus Day Parade and insisted that she won't vote.

What's in a name?

Democrats contend that the race has been close not because of ethics concerns but because Mr. Menendez was widely unknown outside of his congressional district while Mr. Kean began with the most popular name in New Jersey politics.

That's shifting though, they say, citing recent polls giving Mr. Menendez a slight edge as proof voters are responding to the message that he's the one who will truly fight Mr. Bush -- especially on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0082396

"Obviously, our message is piercing through," Mr. Menendez said after shaking hands Oct. 8 at a Fort Lee community picnic for senior citizens.

Mr. Kean began this race with five years' experience in the state House and state Senate and a family name that evokes memories of the most popular New Jersey governor in recent history.

Tom Kean Sr. is known for his bipartisanship during his governorship and in his more recent role as chairman of the September 11 commission.

"There's a huge allegiance, despite everything, to his dad," said Maria Ramos, 36, a Belleville resident who favors Mr. Menendez.

In speeches, Mr. Kean repeatedly cites both his father and grandfather, a former New Jersey congressman. The Republican has billed himself as a reformer and tried to distance himself from Mr. Bush -- saying he disagrees with the president on stem-cell research, spending and the environment, but agrees with him on permanent tax cuts and anti-terrorism efforts.

Patrick Buldo, 61, of Belleville said he likes what he hears from Mr. Kean and will probably vote for him.

"We need some new blood out there, and his father was good," he said.

Mr. Kean, however, has had to walk a fine line since top Republican stars such as first lady Laura Bush have come to the state to campaign for him.

On the war, Mr. Kean has called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign but doesn't support a strict timeline for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq -- which Mr. Menendez voted for.

Mr. Menendez, who says he is "proud" that he voted against authorizing the use of force in Iraq, repeatedly emphasizes his opposition to Mr. Bush and the war.

The Democrat has tried to steer the debate back to issues where he arguably has the advantage in New Jersey, recently distributing an e-mail video clip of Mr. Kean being confronted by the angry mother of a soldier.

"Tom Kean Jr. fails the test of character when it comes to his support of President Bush's failed war in Iraq," the e-mail said. His newest ad also charges that a vote for the Republican is "just another vote for Bush's agenda."

"George Bush is one of the biggest assets Menendez has," said Mr. Thigpen, who predicts Mr. Menendez will win.

"When he gets to the Senate, he'll just be a rubber stamp," Becky Redington, a 62-year-old Menendez supporter from Montclair said of Mr. Kean.

The security issue

The Quinnipiac poll found that 63 percent of New Jersey voters disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 57 percent disapprove of Mr. Bush as president.

Yet, New Jersey voters are also concerned about anti-terrorism efforts because residents had front-row seats to the September 11 attacks and lost many of their own. Some Republicans say the security issue is why Mr. Bush did better in New Jersey in 2004, improving from 2000, when he got just 40 percent of the vote against Democratic candidate Al Gore.

Both Senate candidates strongly advocated enactment of all the September 11 commission's recommendations, and Mr. Menendez has cited his efforts to prevent a Dubai-based firm from taking over some operations at the port of Newark.

Yet New Jersey voters clearly separate September 11 from the Iraq war effort, Mr. Campbell said. The Republican consultant said a "schism" emerges because top Republicans consistently link the two issues.

The New Jersey race has drawn national attention because a loss by Mr. Menendez would all but doom Democratic efforts to capture the U.S. Senate. That factor has attracted star Democrats like former President Bill Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama to campaign for Mr. Menendez, focusing on opposition to Mr. Bush.

As Mr. Menendez worked the crowd at the Fort Lee seniors' picnic, Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg stood on stage criticizing Mr. Bush's Social Security plan, the war in Iraq, tax cuts, and prescription-drug plan.

"To give [Mr. Bush] a majority in the House and Senate would be a big mistake," the New Jersey Democrat told the seniors, some of whom yelled out their agreement. "I'm here to plead with you -- think of what happens if Bob Menendez doesn't win."

That message clearly got through to some.

"The reason I'm set on Menendez is because he's a Democrat," Lila Breslow, 75, said after the picnic, holding the crockpot she won in a raffle. "I prefer the Democrats to Bush."

The Columnist Who Shut Up To Speak Out (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082397

CLEVELAND At a lively Democratic gathering in a nearby suburb, Senate candidate Sherrod Brown is talking up his wife to the party faithful. He says, as he always does in this part of Ohio, that the crowd probably already knows Connie Schultz as a prizewinning newspaper columnist.

As the seven-term congressman praises her "terrific sacrifice" in giving up the column in the Plain Dealer during the campaign, a spirited voice calls out from the back, "Just win, honey!"

That would be Schultz, who less than a year after winning a Pulitzer Prize tucked away her pen and pad to support her husband in the toughest race of his career -- and one of the most important, most intense, most eyeballed matches of the 2006 campaign season.

The campaign role is new to her. So, for practical purposes, is the marriage. Schultz and Brown met in 2003 when each was long divorced. Now, barely on opposite sides of 50, they are learning to be political partners amid the friction and heat of a grueling race. As friend Jackie Cassara put it, "Why don't you just put them in a centrifuge and spin vigorously?"

Brown is surrendering a safe seat in Congress after seven terms to challenge Sen. Mike DeWine, a two-term Republican incumbent with a campaign treasury that stretches from Cincinnati to Toledo. Schultz is giving up the comfort and satisfaction of her freewheeling newspaper voice.

Some days, the blessing is decidedly mixed. As she arrived to speak to a crowd of 430 retirees at United Auto Workers Local 1250, the union president made a pitch for Brown's candidacy. He then turned to her and said, "I believe he's sent his lovely wife. Connie, is it?"

"The hardest thing," she says, "is I'm always talking for my husband."

Brown, 53, is a doctor's son schooled at Yale. Schultz, 49, is a maintenance man's daughter who became her family's first college graduate. Yet with their progressive philosophy, their passion for the underdog and their gregarious flesh-pressing, there is no mistaking that they are a matched set.

There are plenty of similarities in their rhetoric, too. Schultz, for instance, has publicly accused DeWine of lying about her husband's record and "betraying the working families he was supposed to serve."

Their collective decision to challenge DeWine, a family values conservative with an agreeable public persona in a state long dominated by Republicans, is the biggest political risk of their professional lives. Brown initially said he would not run, because of family concerns.

"I was really the holdout," Schultz says. "We were in a very new marriage. I was not a political spouse. I knew how you could blow a marriage."

As they talked, and talked, she came to see that Brown needed to enter the race or forever regret it. As she puts it, "The stars had aligned, and I was going to be the big, fat moon in the way."

Once Brown entered the race, it was only a question of time before Schultz would quit her column. For reasons of newspaper ethics and spousal devotion -- who would make sure there were mango slices and carrots in Brown's campaign car? -- Schultz realized in February that the time had come.

This would be an adventure, right? Aren't the best adventures a bit scary?

Well, she was scared.

After she told her editors, she opened her journal and wrote in big block letters, "WHAT IS TO BECOME OF ME?"At Home in Avon

It is a Sunday night in a largely Republican housing development in Avon, west of Cleveland, an unlikely choice for arch-liberals Schultz and Brown after their wedding. Schultz is home after two appearances for her book, a collection of columns called "Life Happens, and Other Unavoidable Truths."

Waiting for Brown, she boils a pot of water in the combination kitchen and family room where they installed a floor-to-cathedral-ceiling wall of bookshelves to accommodate their library. Apologizing for the impromptu meal, she grabs a jar of prepared tomato sauce from the cupboard and a bottle of red wine from the attached garage.

Down the hall, across from the desk where she writes, a ping-pong table is set up on the thick carpet of the living room. It was Schultz's second-anniversary present for her husband. Until he suffered a campaign trail double hernia, they played most nights when he was in Ohio.

"We're pretty wound up when we get home," Schultz explains. "We come home, we play ping-pong and we talk. Just to take his mind off it a little bit."

"It's hard. It's really hard," Brown says of running in a state that last elected a Democratic senator in 1992. He mentions the scope, the pressure. Friends say Brown, divorced for 16 years before he married Schultz, believes he has found a true campaign partner.

He told Schultz the previous night that he would not have campaigned as well or as successfully without her.

"When you said that, I was stunned," she tells him.

DOJ_NMG_0082398

"You know that," he answers. "I've told you that a hundred times in a lot of different ways."

Schultz smilingly reports that a woman had advised her to keep an eye on her man, what with the availability in Washington of so many alluring women-not-his-wife. Brown sees many good reasons not to stray, not least Schultz's megaphone -- and her proven willingness to use it.

"I have already said to people," Brown says, "if I ever did anything, she wouldn't just cut my [testicles] off. She'd write about it."Smitten by Her Words

The citation with Schultz's Pulitzer for commentary praised "her pungent columns that provided a voice for the underdog and underprivileged."

Two weeks after she began writing her column in October 2002, she received an e-mail from one "Sherrod Brown, Lorain, Ohio." It read: "Where did the Plain Dealer find you? You are a breath of fresh air; your writing reminds me of that of Barbara Kingsolver, one of my favorite living writers."

Brown read Schultz's first column aloud at the Thanksgiving dinner table. It was about her father, for 36 years an electric company worker. It began, "I want Dad's lunch pail."

"To Dad, it's a daily reminder of the job he hated," wrote Schultz. "To me, it is an enduring symbol of the promise he made to his four young children. 'You kids are never going to carry one of these to work,' he'd tell us, over and over. 'You kids are going to college.' "

Schultz is a mother of two who graduated from Kent State and quit law school after two years. She writes about coat-check attendants whose tips are siphoned by management. She urges respect for valet parkers and better health care for the uninsured. She quotes her mother's admonition: "Don't marry him till you see how he treats the waitress."

She wrote in one column that on the Sunday after Ohio voters banned same-sex marriage, straight members of her congregation wept as more than 50 gay worshipers stood to show they had been affected by the legislation.

"They didn't look angry or defiant," she wrote. "They looked abandoned."

Brown is a self-described battler for the little guy. First elected to the Ohio House at 21, he has been a politician ever since. He fought fiercely against NAFTA and voted against the Iraq war resolution and the Patriot Act. He spotted the makings of a soul mate in Schultz's politics and her tolerant Christian faith -- she belongs to the United Church of Christ; he is Lutheran.

Daughters Emily and Liz saw it right away.

"He would read us her columns over the phone," says Emily, 25, a union organizer on leave to work in the campaign. "Liz and I were, 'Clearly, you should just ask this woman out, Dad.' "

He did and they met for dinner on New Year's Day 2003.

"Within two seconds," says Emily, "they were in love."

Precisely 10 months 26 days later, Schultz told her readers, they married.'Mrs. Brown' She's Not

Plain Dealer readers know much about the contours of Schultz's heart. She wrote of her nervousness, at age 45, about their first date. She told about Brown becoming friends with her cat, and her inaugural trip to buy manure for his tomato vines. Also, their pedometer competition, their "all day long" e-mail exchanges and the night he proposed.

"Falling in love when you're knee-deep in middle age takes some getting used to," Schultz wrote. "For one thing, you feel mighty silly giggling all the time, especially in front of your grown kids."

The character and the cadence of her columns infuse her performance on the hustings. She tells of campaign encounters and describes her working-class roots in Ashtabula, Ohio, where, as she puts it, a couple of nobodies wore themselves out so their children could become somebodies.

But her talk turns tough when she shifts to Republican criticism of her husband.

"We're going to fight back," she told the UAW crowd. "You respond, you pivot, and you deck 'em."

"Connie has never known the luxury of an unexpressed thought. It's into her head and out of her mouth very quickly," says Cassara, a Cleveland Realtor and the close friend described by Schultz as "my sanity in this race."

Total strangers suddenly have expectations, from how she should wear her hair to how she should gaze upon her husband as he speaks. People regularly ask when she will change her name to Mrs. Brown. Answer: She won't.

"You know what the difference is now?" Schultz asks one morning over coffee. "I'm having to rein myself in. I'm less myself."

This is Brown's race, after all, and he must remain the focus.

"When somebody asks a question, I feel I can't immediately answer. I have to say, 'Sherrod's particularly outspoken about this,' " Schultz says. "Thank God we agree on almost everything. If we didn't, I don't know how I'd do this."

Twice, people have pasted DeWine stickers over the bumper sticker on her car, the one that reads, "Well-behaved women rarely make history."

"A little hostility out there?" she asks in mock innocence.

DOJ_NMG_0082399

Then there was her parking lot encounter with the man who pointed to the "Brown for Senate" sticker on her car and said, "I wouldn't be caught dead with that guy's bumper sticker." He told her it was not too late to repent, she remembers.

"It really is too late," Schultz replied.

"Why?"

"I married the guy."The Opponent's Wife

Fran DeWine married her guy, too, 39 years ago. The wedding was two weeks after her 20th birthday, because she believed teenage marriages were doomed. Even then, she had already dated Mike DeWine for longer than Schultz and Brown have known each other.

She takes a softer approach than Schultz when promoting her husband's candidacy. Through 30 years of political life since DeWine won his first race for Green County prosecutor, Fran DeWine says she has overcome an initial shyness. She hands out her trademark 24-page cookbook, paid for by the Ohio GOP, and frequently mentions her eight children and nine grandchildren.

"First of all, I talk about Mike and I, knowing him since we started first grade together," DeWine says by telephone from Northern Virginia as she bakes banana bread for her youngest daughter's cross-country meet.

"I don't go into the details he goes into, but I like to tell what he spends his time doing," says DeWine. She talks of her husband's work on the Senate Intelligence Committee, his role on children's issues and his ability to deliver money to Ohio. "He's my best friend and I help him and we work together, but there is no role, 'Political Spouse.' I think everyone has to decide for themselves."

DeWine would not discuss Schultz's approach or her campaign trail commentary.

"I try not to know," DeWine says. "I want to go ahead and lead my life and I don't want to worry about that."

Schultz, meanwhile, is saying of Mike DeWine at a fundraiser, "Forget that he's lying about Sherrod's record; he's trafficking in a national tragedy for political gain." She is referring to an advertisement, later pulled, that included a doctored photograph: The producers had added more smoke to the burning World Trade Center.

The DeWine campaign stands by its effort to portray Brown as too liberal for Ohio, unable to work with Republicans and unwilling to take essential steps against terrorism.

At the fundraiser, put together by supporters calling themselves Brown-Nosers, Schultz is billed as the star. The first 20 people donating at least $300 are promised a signed copy of her book.

When Schultz begins to speak, she announces a surprise guest, one Sherrod Brown, who has flown in from Washington. As she steps back and he steps up, someone calls out, "We want Connie!"

Brown, who cried when he learned Schultz had won the Pulitzer and sometimes refers to her in e-mails as PPWCS, says a November win would bring a January trifecta: Ohio Democrats in the Senate and the governor's mansion, and Schultz's column back in the Plain Dealer.

"So many people, especially women, are really moved by what she writes about," said supporter Brittany O'Connor, who brought her mother to hear Schultz speak. "I wonder if the Plain Dealer will let her."Hoping to Return

"It does make me uneasy," says Plain Dealer Editor Douglas Clifton. "I'm kind of old-school when it comes to drawing the line between what a reporter can and can't say or do in political campaigns."

After meeting and marrying Brown, Schultz avoided writing about issues he pushed in Congress. But she and Clifton saw that a statewide race would be trickier to navigate.

"I still want to write about what's on my mind, but that is becoming increasingly difficult," Schultz wrote in her final column. "Each passing week brings more limitations on my choice of topics because there is a concern that some will accuse me of using my column to stump for my husband."

As a woman and a feminist, she found the idea that she was "merely parroting" her husband both amusing and offensive, she wrote in that last column. But she was mindful of the appearance of a conflict of interest, as well as problems her presence might cause for colleagues covering the race.

Schultz expects to return. Clifton recently assured her that he wants her back, aware that some readers will view her work through the prism of her campaign efforts.

"In the end," Clifton says, "I have every confidence in her integrity."

Three former journalists who now spend time considering ethical quandaries say the potential conflict is made manageable by the fact that Schultz is campaigning for her husband -- turning down requests from other candidates -- and that she is an opinion writer, not a beat reporter.

"I would be more tolerant of a spouse campaigning for a wife or husband," says former ABC News reporter Bob Zelnick, who teaches journalism ethics at Boston University. He adds, however, that Schultz would be "better advised to be a little bit less sharp and pointed in her attacks on her husband's opponents."

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0082400

There are 21 days to go in the campaign. As the pace quickens and the pitch of television commercials grows sharper, most polls show Brown ahead of DeWine in a race professionals expect to remain close.

Schultz crisscrosses the state, keeping in touch with Brown via BlackBerry and cellphone, grabbing catnaps on long drives to Avon. Every day, she laments columns unwritten. But Schultz is taking notes for a campaign memoir. She will call it "And His Lovely Wife."

Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Candidates are using popular websites Facebook, MySpace and YouTube for the first time to give their campaigns free publicity, reach young voters and bypass traditional media. Once they're online, though, they risk being mocked and losing control of their messages.

Facebook.com created 1,400 candidate profiles that listed names, states, parties and offices. Of those, about 300 are updated by candidates or their staffs, marketing director Melanie Deitch says.

What's online can be embarrassing:

·Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's Facebook profile has many posts from her Green Party rival, Howie Hawkins, who lists reasons he thinks the New York Democrat should be defeated.

·A Facebook search for "Mike DeWine" turns up the Ohio Republican senator's profile as well as links to several self-organized political groups of Facebook members. One group calls itself "Mike Dewine and (Ohio Rep.) Deborah Pryce are tools," a derisive slang for dupes.

·In an ad only on YouTube and Republican congressional candidate Paul Nelson's campaign website, Nelson says Rep. Ron Kind, D-Wis., voted to fund studies of "the sex lives of Vietnamese prostitutes." Matt Sweeney, Kind's campaign manager, says voters will "see through these kinds of sleaze ads."

The power of the sites was highlighted this summer when video of Sen. George Allen, R-Va., calling a rival's volunteer "macaca" showed up on YouTube. It has been seen more than 250,000 times. YouTube has more than 30 million visitors a month.

Campaigns are still finding ways to tap the sites' potential, says Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, who predicts they "will ultimately revolutionize politics."

About 1 million of Facebook's 10 million regular users read politics features, Deitch says. That's an opportunity to reach young voters. In the 2004 election, 17% of voters were 18-29.

MySpace, with 56 million visitors a month, had "a huge uptick" this year in political activity, says spokesman Jeff Berman. "When you can reach people that quickly, that effectively and at no cost, it's just a no-brainer," he says.

With Tactical Itinerary, Mrs. Clinton Skirts Iowa (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 15 — Three years have passed since Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton last set foot in Iowa.

Mrs. Clinton has zigzagged through much of the country in that time, bouncing among Ohio and California, New Jersey and Colorado, Pennsylvania and Michigan, raising tens of millions of dollars and meeting with legions of Democrats. But she has conspicuously bypassed Iowa, whose caucuses will be the first presidential nominating contest, and New Hampshire, the state with the earliest primary, where her last visit was even longer ago.

Mrs. Clinton's strategy is a tacit recognition that crossing the border into a state that will matter early in 2008 would set off a cascade of attention and be tantamount to an official announcement that she is running for president. At every opportunity, her advisers say she is doing nothing more than focusing on being re-elected in New York next month. For now, at least, she can point to her itinerary as evidence that she has not made up her mind about 2008.

Yet depending on how long she waits, her absence from Iowa also risks giving her Democratic rivals an opening to curry favor with voters here. Other candidates are already in a nearly constant march through the state, hiring operatives and seeking commitments from grass-roots organizers. Even Terry McAuliffe, former Democratic national chairman and a close Clinton adviser, acknowledges that "the other candidates are there rounding up donors."

"But beyond that, it doesn't matter at this point," Mr. McAuliffe said. "She's in a unique position."

Then, as all Clinton advisers must, he quickly added that the senator was engaged "in a deliberative process," deciding whether to run. "Anybody who tells you she's running today is crazy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082401

Other strategists agree that if Mrs. Clinton does run, then the moment she begins to devote her attention to a presidential campaign her financial and name-recognition advantages will wash away any memory of the years she declined to visit Iowa and New Hampshire.

Still, at two recent gatherings — the annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner sponsored by the Iowa Democratic Party here Saturday and the annual steak fry picnic last month sponsored by Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa — there was little evidence of an organic pro-Hillary movement.

Even at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, where former President Bill Clinton made what was widely viewed as a proxy appearance for his wife, the most visible show of support for Mrs. Clinton came from Peter Feddo, a 23-year-old who runs a Hillary Rodham Clinton for President Committee from Richmond, Va. Mr. Feddo had flown into Des Moines with thousands of "Hillary for President" stickers and signs that he passed out at the door; the best news, he said, was that some guests asked for two. "So that's a sign of momentum for Hillary," he said. "People not only want to support her, they want to tell their friends."

Numerous Democratic voters interviewed at the two events said that although they admired Mrs. Clinton, they feared she could not win the general election. Several said they had been impressed with Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, who is making a strong push here, and another handful said they were leaning toward former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, who has spent significant time in the state.

"I like Hillary, but I have my doubts about her," said Judy Risvold, a retired accountant from Des Moines who attended the Harkin steak fry last month.

Asked whether Mrs. Clinton should already be courting Iowans if she was going to win here, Ms. Risvold said it was not too late. "She'll come if she's serious," she said.

Michele Barker, a high school teacher, said she considered herself a supporter of Mrs. Clinton but worried about her chances in a general election. "I'm fearful of the response she'd get from the voters," Ms. Barker said, because of a past as a polarizing figure.

Although there are plenty of Clinton supporters here left over from Bill Clinton's campaigns, he did not build the same network here as in New Hampshire, meaning that his wife would still have to hire advisers and line up supporters, work that others like Mr. Edwards, Mr. Bayh and Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts have already begun.

Even former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, who announced last week that he had decided not to run, had invested time and money in Iowa, and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who is considered less likely to run, has two trips here on the calendar this campaign season.

And then there is Tom Vilsack, Iowa's governor, who is laying the groundwork for a possible race and would have a natural advantage in his home state.

The consensus is that Mrs. Clinton, unlike anyone else, can wait as long as she wants before beginning to court Iowans.

"She is the only candidate where it won't hurt her," said Gordon R. Fischer, former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party, "because her name recognition is already sky-high; she already has a lot of money. She's the one person, frankly, the one candidate, who could get away with it."

Still, a recent Des Moines Register poll showed Mrs. Clinton in second place, behind Mr. Edwards (with Mr. Kerry and Mr. Vilsack third and fourth).

"Nationally, she is indeed the front-runner, should she choose to compete," Mr. Fischer said.

But he also said: "I think in Iowa you have to fight for it. There aren't any coronations in Iowa. Rightly or wrongly, we demand the candidates come in early and often, and especially often. We expect them to shake our hands and look us in the eye. We expect to be able to ask questions and have them answered. She's going to have to work for it like anybody else."

States Considering Privatizing Highways Can Study Indiana Toll Road Experience (USAT)

By Theodore Kim

USA Today, October 17, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS — Indiana's experience with privatizing its East-West Toll Road shows that states considering the same move might expect quick financial benefits along with higher tolls and other policies that could rankle some drivers.

A number of states have looked at privatizing major highways to fill budget holes and cover the expense of fixing other crumbling roads.

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey is considering leasing the New Jersey Turnpike and other toll roads, while road privatization has emerged as an election topic in Illinois and Ohio.

Privatization has spurred debate over the impact of such deals on toll rates and operations.

Northern Virginia lawmakers have resisted toll hikes on the Dulles Greenway, which is privately run. Leaders in Harris County, Texas, defeated a proposal this year to privatize toll roads in the Houston area, deciding to run the road themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0082402

The 50-year-old Indiana East-West Toll Road is in its fourth month of private operation.

In July, a private Australian-Spanish consortium took over the 157-mile highway, which runs east from Chicago to the Ohio border.

The consortium will operate, maintain and collect tolls on the road for 75 years. In return, it gave Indiana a one-time, lump-sum payment of $3.8 billion.

Since the hand-over, the private operator, the Indiana Toll Road Concession, has readied the installation of pay-without-stopping tolling technology and announced a $250 million expansion of the road's western end.

State Treasurer Tim Berry said Indiana has reaped more than $55 million in interest from the consortium's payment.

The company has drawn criticism from police and members of other emergency agencies, who said the operator's practice of installing barriers at turnarounds has hindered their ability to respond to traffic accidents.

"We're trying to respond to emergencies here," said Betty Schroeder, director of Steuben County Emergency Medical Service. "I'm like: You've got to be kidding me here."

Matt Pierce, a spokesman for the toll road operator, says the barriers stop illegal U-turns.

As an alternative, the road operator plans to install flexible posts that will deter drivers from using the turnabouts. Emergency vehicles, Pierce says, can drive over the posts.

Schroeder said she remains skeptical.

The consortium plans to install electronic tolling on the road's western end by June. The entire road will have the technology by September.

Motorists without the transponder needed for electronic tolling will have to pay higher tolls. The consortium has not announced the cost of the transponder.

By September, tolls for passenger vehicles without transponders traveling the entire road will rise to $8 from $4.65.

Eventually, even motorists with electronic tolling will pay the higher rates. Rates for commercial trucks have gone up to $18 from $14.55. More increases are scheduled.

Gov. Mitch Daniels, who pushed for the deal despite staunch opposition in some parts of Indiana, said the consortium is off to a good start.

"Everything's running flawlessly as far as I know, and they've announced the first quarter-of-a-billion dollars of improvements," the Republican governor said.

Indiana House Minority Leader B. Patrick Bauer of South Bend, Ind., a Democrat who is critical of the deal, said the early setbacks foreshadow what's to come.

"Ultimately, they are a private company that's going to do what's best for them," he said.

Cloning Double Talk (PTR)

By Robert Novak

Pittsburgh-Tribune Review, October 17, 2006

A new video available on YouTube marks a late attempt by pro-life forces to avert serious defeat in Missouri Nov. 7, with national implications. Cathy Ruse, speaking for Missourians Against Human Cloning, declares: "Amendment 2 is a fraud. It is an attempt to trick Missourians into approving -- in their Constitution -- human cloning, the right of biotech firms to do human cloning in Missouri -- something Missourians oppose by an overwhelming majority."

But Amendment 2 is identified for many Missouri voters by the language at the beginning of the five-page ballot initiative: "No person may clone or attempt to clone a human being." That explains why polls have shown a substantial margin of support for the constitutional amendment, which is also backed by key Republican politicians and business interests. It seems to offer the best of all worlds: government support of stem cell research without fear of cloning.

The problem is that the proposal so narrowly defines cloning as to open the door to any cloning procedure that takes place outside the womb. If this is approved by a state that historically is a barometer of national trends and is considered a pro-life stronghold, it will be a national model for breaking popular resistance to what the scientists and biotech companies want.

A campaign costing an estimated $20 million has helped build a substantial lead for the amendment's advocates. A September statewide poll by the Republican firm McLaughlin & Associates shows a 59 percent to 31 percent advantage. Democrats appear to have no doubt, favoring it 75-22, with 3 percent undecided. But Republicans are split, 40 percent in support and 45 against, with 15 percent undecided.

Big Republican names -- former Sen. John Danforth, Gov. Matt Blunt and party contributor Sam Fox -- all support the amendment. The $2-billion-endowed Stowers Institute in Kansas City, funded by major Republican benefactors, is spearheading the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0082403

That establishment Republican support for Amendment 2, including threats to remove the institute from the state if the proposal does not pass, has created a difficult situation for first-term GOP Sen. Jim Talent, engaged in a re-election campaign. I reported Talent's "defection from the anti-cloning ranks" in February when he took his name off a Senate bill to ban human cloning on grounds it might hamper acceptable scientific research.

Talent at that time was taking no position on Amendment 2, but he has since come out against it. In a recent debate with the Democrat Senate candidate, state Auditor Claire McCaskill, on NBC's "Meet the Press," Talent said the proposal "would create ... an unqualified constitutional right to clone the earliest stages of human life. " But he hastened to add he is not against stem cell research.

McCaskill then sought to cast the debate in terms of whether the candidates are for or against the medical miracles that can be achieved through stem cell research. "My faith directs me to heal the sick," she proclaimed, adding that "I come down on the side of hope, hope of cures and supporting science." But she put this in the framework of the constitutional amendment, which, she said, "strictly prohibits human cloning."

But Amendment 2 bans only cloning that involves planting an embryo within the womb. It prohibits government from interfering with somatic cell nuclear transfer, which involves replacing the nucleus of a human egg outside the womb -- the cloning procedure used to produce Dolly the sheep.

This language, contends the YouTube video, "provides biotech firms a blank check for taxpayer dollars to support unethical and unproven research that Missourians oppose." If government-approved cloning can be sold to the pro-life state of Missouri, it will show up next in other states with major research facilities.

Crime And Punishment (WP)

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

AS THE DEMOCRATIC candidate for mayor of Baltimore in 1999, Martin O'Malley set a goal of cutting the city's annual number of murders to 175; they were then running at more than 300 a year. He failed. Baltimore's homicide tally looks likely to reach or surpass 270 this year, maintaining the city's standing as one of the nation's deadliest.

As the Republican candidate for governor of Maryland in 2002, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. also set a goal: to reform the state's decrepit, Dickensian system of juvenile jails. He also appears to have fallen short, though that record is not as easily quantified.

One may give both men, who face each other as gubernatorial candidates in the Nov. 7 elections, credit for setting ambitious agendas. One may fairly conclude that each made efforts and some progress in the face of daunting obstacles -- Mr. O'Malley cut Baltimore's murder rate and Mr. Ehrlich closed one of Maryland's worst juvenile jails. Still, the bottom line is that neither made good on his campaign promise to solve a painful, long-standing problem.

Messrs. O'Malley and Ehrlich, in the heat of the campaign homestretch, are busy bashing each other over issues of crime and punishment. They are key questions for voters throughout the state, particularly in the high-crime areas of Baltimore and Prince George's County, and they played a prominent role in the candidates' back-to-back debates this past weekend.

Mr. O'Malley, in particular, has been put on the defensive because of Baltimore's stubbornly high murder rate. It's a good bet that he rues the day he promised to cut homicides to 175 annually, calling it a "realistic goal"; during his term as mayor, which began with this decade, they have never dipped below 253. The murder rate did decline sharply in the mayor's first couple of years in office, as he pushed police to take a more focused, aggressive stance in the city's most crime-ridden precincts -- including the routine arrest of loiterers, which has drawn fire from civil libertarians. But progress on homicides stalled after 2002 even as other categories of violent crime fell sharply. And it speaks poorly of Mr. O'Malley's managerial abilities that he has overseen a revolving door of four police chiefs during his nearly seven years in office -- not counting three others who served on an interim basis.

In the case of Maryland's juvenile justice system, state officials insist that they have made progress in addressing staffing problems, including poor pay and qualifications for many of those who work with young detainees. They closed what was the state's most notoriously violent juvenile treatment facility, the Charles H. Hickey Jr. reform school in Baltimore County -- but without a coherent plan for housing its 144 youthful residents.

Signs persist that the problem is far from fixed. Less than two months ago the state's independent monitor of juvenile facilities, Katherine A. Perez, wrote that she remained concerned about inadequate staffing and "the threat to life, health and safety" of youths at Baltimore City's Juvenile Justice Center. In May, Ms. Perez reported that youths were sleeping on the floor at one overcrowded jail and that monitors had seen a male staff member throw punches at a rowdy girl in another.

The hard problems of drugs and gangs are impediments to denting the problems that both men inherited. But the disappointing results in Maryland's juvenile jails and on Baltimore's rough streets raise questions about the managerial abilities of both candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0082404

And The Winner Is ... Me (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Voters in Ohio can be forgiven if they feel they have been beamed out of the Midwest and dropped into a third-world autocracy. The latest news from the state's governor's race is that the Republican nominee, Kenneth Blackwell, who is also the Ohio secretary of state, could rule that his opponent is ineligible to run because of a technicality. We'd like to think that his office would not ultimately do that, or that if it did, such a ruling would not be allowed to stand. But the mere fact that an elected official and political candidate has the authority to toss his opponent out of a race is further evidence of a serious flaw in our democracy.

Ted Strickland, the Democratic nominee, is leading Mr. Blackwell by as much as 28 points, according to one recent poll. In their panic, some Blackwell supporters have hit on the idea of trying to prevent the election from occurring. One of them filed a complaint alleging that Mr. Strickland, who is a member of Congress, does not live in the apartment where he is registered to vote. Mr. Strickland owns a condominium in another part of Ohio, and the complaint alleges that he actually lives there. If Mr. Strickland was not a qualified voter, he would be prohibited from running for governor.

The complaint itself is without merit. No one disputes that Mr. Strickland lives in Ohio, or that he is registered. The only issue is which of his two homes he chose to register from, and the law gives voters with multiple homes broad discretion in choosing among them.

What is more interesting, and troubling, is the way the complaint is proceeding. The county board that heard it broke down 2 to 2, on party lines, about whether to hold a hearing. In the case of a tie vote at the county level, complaints like these get forwarded to the secretary of state's office to be resolved. Mr. Blackwell says he has designated his assistant secretary to handle duties that could conflict with his candidacy. But passing these matters on to a subordinate who is a political ally and owes his job to the candidate hardly removes the conflict.

Election administration should be removed from partisan politics, in Ohio and everywhere else. Decisions like these should be made by nonpartisan bodies or, failing that, by people who do their utmost to insulate themselves from partisan politics. In 2004, Mr. Blackwell chose to become co-chairman of President Bush's Ohio campaign, and then issued rulings that helped the campaign. Now we have the even more bizarre prospect of Mr. Blackwell, or his deputy, potentially participating in the baseless disqualification of his opponent.

We are confident it will not come to that. But however this particular case is resolved, it underscores the need for Ohio, and other states, to find a way to administer elections that is insulated from partisan politics.

Paying For Better Parenting (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

New York is searching for new ways to fight persistent poverty, and Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Commission for Economic Opportunity has recommended useful reforms. To encourage families to participate in these programs, the mayor hopes to recruit private donors to provide parents with a cash incentive to make the right choices for their children — like taking them in for regular checkups and making sure they stay in school.

The idea is based on a highly successful Mexican antipoverty program, known as Oportunidades, that is now being tried by at least 25 other countries. Mexico began Oportunidades in 1997. Today it covers one in four Mexican families, helping virtually all the country's poor. The average family gets $35 a month, about a quarter of the rural household income. Families with many children in school can get up to $153 a month, a ceiling imposed to remove the incentive to have more children.

To get payments for food, mothers must bring their children in for regular health checkups and attend informative talks at health centers. Mothers also get cash if their children attend school at least 85 percent of the time. The payments start after third grade and go through high school, rising each year as dropout rates get higher and a child's forgone earning potential is higher. Because checks go directly from the central government to mothers whose families meet the requirements, administrative costs and the chance of corruption are reduced.

From the beginning, Oportunidades built in rigorous evaluation. Those studies have shown that it does focus its help on Mexico's poorest people, and they are benefiting. Children are bigger and healthier. Oportunidades has also cut child labor and led to more schooling. In rural areas, the number of children starting high school increased by 85 percent.

Even a rich city like New York can envy such success. Mayor Bloomberg is smart to explore a brilliantly simple idea that is fighting poverty now and poverty later around the world. We hope that donors will rally to the effort.

North Korean Fuel Identified As Plutonium (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082405

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — American intelligence agencies have concluded that North Korea's test explosion last week was powered by plutonium that North Korea harvested from its small nuclear reactor, according to officials who have reviewed the results of atmospheric sampling since the blast.

The officials, who would not speak for attribution because it was an intelligence matter, were responding to specific questions about what had been learned about the nature of the weapon.

As administration and intelligence officials watched for indications that the North might be preparing a second test, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that it risked even further isolation if it took such a provocative action.

American officials have reported recent activity at the test site, leading some to believe that another test might be carried out soon.

The intelligence agencies' finding that the weapon was based on plutonium strongly suggested that the country's second path to a nuclear bomb — one using uranium — was not yet ready. The uranium program is based on enrichment equipment and know-how purchased from Pakistan's former nuclear chief.

Nuclear experts said that the use of plutonium to make the bomb was important because it suggested that North Korea probably had only one nuclear program mature enough to produce weapons.

"This is good news because we have a reasonably good idea of how much plutonium they have made," said Siegfried S. Hecker, the former chief of the Los Alamos National Laboratory and now a visiting professor at Stanford University. Mr. Hecker, who has visited North Korea and is one of the few foreigners to have seen parts of its nuclear infrastructure, said that it was his guess that "they tried to test a reasonably sophisticated device, and they had trouble imploding it properly."

The supply of plutonium materials is known from the days when international inspectors kept tabs on the fuel rods in the North's reactor, and intelligence analysts estimate that North Korea has enough material to make 6 to 10 plutonium bombs.

Politically, the results of the test may revive last week's finger-pointing about who is more responsible for the Korean test: Bill Clinton or President Bush.

As president, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal that froze the production and weaponization of North Korea's plutonium, but intelligence agencies later determined that North Korea began its secret uranium program under his watch. The plutonium that North Korea exploded was produced, according to intelligence estimates, either during the administration of the first President Bush or after 2003, when the North Koreans threw out international inspectors and began reprocessing spent nuclear fuel the inspectors had kept under seal.

Unlike the Clinton administration in 1994, the current Bush administration chose not to threaten to destroy North Korea's fuel and nuclear reprocessing facilities if they tried to make weapons.

That threat in 1994 — which was ultimately resolved with an agreement to freeze the weapons program — was made by William J. Perry, who was the defense secretary then. In an interview on Monday, Mr. Perry said: "There was a brief window to catch this plutonium before it was made into bomb fuel. It's gone. It's out of the barn now."

After a week of some lingering doubt about whether the test had indeed been a nuclear detonation, the office of John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, confirmed that much in a statement issued Monday.

"Analysis of air samples collected on Oct. 11, 2006, detected radioactive debris which confirms that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in the vicinity of Punggye on Oct. 9, 2006," said the statement, putting on the record a conclusion that officials first disclosed Friday, the night before the United Nations Security Council voted on sanctions. "The explosion yield was less than a kiloton," the statement added.

It gave no further details, and the officials who described the early findings did not disclose more beyond the conclusion that plutonium, not uranium, was the device's core.

The determination that the blast was nuclear was announced a day before Secretary Rice was to depart for a trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia. She will go to the capitals of the nations that have been engaged in the six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program except, of course, North Korea.

The unanimous resolution adopted by the Security Council last week imposing sanctions on military material and luxury goods was proof of "a strong and firm hand and strong and firm response," Ms. Rice said Monday during a State Department news conference. She said the international community wanted "to leave open a door for North Korea to take a different course if it wishes to do so."

Pressed to respond to analysts' assessment that desires by China and South Korea for continued economic and business exchanges with North Korea might trump demands for a stiff sanctions and inspections regime, Ms. Rice said her goal was to work out the details of putting the Council resolution into effect.

The Associated Press reported Monday from Dandong, China, that customs officials were examining trucks at the North Korean border as China complied with the United Nations sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0082406

However, China's ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, indicated that his nation would not conduct similar searches at sea.

Mr. Wang made clear that China would not halt ships and board them to search for ballistic missiles or for bomb-making equipment or material that can be used to manufacture nuclear, chemical and biological arms.

"This is a resolution we have to implement," he told reporters at the United Nations. "The question was raised whether China will do inspections. Inspections yes, but inspection is different than interdiction and interception. I think different countries will do it different ways."

During the news conference on Monday, Ms. Rice said she was "not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations. I don't think they would have voted for a resolution if they did not intend to carry through on it."

Nations Discuss Second Nuke Test Reports (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

South Korea and Japan warily monitored unconfirmed reports Tuesday of possible preparations by North Korea for a second nuclear test.

Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government has "information" concerning media reports that North Korea could be laying the groundwork for another blast.

"We have information but I cannot speak about its contents," Aso told reporters, without elaborating.

Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Tokyo was working with other unidentified governments on trying to figure out what the North Koreans were up to.

"We are aware that there are various reports. We are closely exchanging information on a constant basis," Shiozaki said. "We should not disclose the content of such exchanges."

A South Korean government official in Seoul said his government also was aware of signs related to possible preparations for an additional North Korea nuclear test. The official said various intelligence reports were coming in about preparations for a possible test, but that it was unclear how reliable they were.

Seoul already has taken measures to be more vigilant for a possible second nuclear test by North Korea, and was bolstering exchanges of intelligence with the United States, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

U.S. government officials have said that they would not be surprised if North Korea were to attempt a second nuclear test sometime soon, following the first one on Oct. 9.

Washington officially recognized Monday that last week's explosion was an underground nuclear test. The test triggered an international outcry, leading the U.N. Security Council to adopt a sanctions resolution on Saturday.

Rice: N.Korea Sanctions Serve As Warning (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that U.N. sanctions are a clear warning the international community is united in opposing North Korea's nuclear ambitions and Iran should take heed that it could face a similar rebuke.

Previewing her upcoming trip to the region, Rice called Security Council sanctions adopted on Saturday "a very strong resolution" that would punish and further isolate the North Korean government.

Rice briefed reporters at the State Department on her upcoming trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia, which begins on Tuesday. "The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies" in the region, she said.

"The world has responded calmly and firmly" to last week's North Korean nuclear test, Rice added.

The U.S.-sponsored U.N. resolution demands that North Korea eliminate nuclear weapons but rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

It calls on countries to block North Korea from receiving equipment or materials to build weapons of mass destruction and other advanced weaponry. It also clamps down on travel for North Koreans involved in the weapons program, and orders countries to freeze many of the international assets of people or businesses connected to that program.

While China has been inspecting cargo trucks headed for its communist ally, there have been questions about how strictly it and South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. Both countries have significant trade relations with North Korea, whose economy is perpetually on the verge of collapse.

Rice's tone at times was conciliatory.

DOJ_NMG_0082407

"Let's give some time to these sanctions to work," she said. "Let's give some time to the diplomacy to work. Let's see if North Korea can be pushed in a different direction. But we've got a much stronger set of tools with which to do that."

She acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis. Countries in the region openly worry that the collapse of North Korea's government could send millions of refugees streaming toward their borders. South Koreans also worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

"I do hear states saying that they want to be certain that it won't ratchet up conflict. We have no desire to ratchet up conflict either. But we'll have some discussions on precisely how this will be carried out," Rice said.

She said her trip was designed to "rally the support of our friends and allies" to pressure North Korea to drop its nuclear effort.

She also said the U.S. will seek to increase international cooperation for efforts like the proliferation security initiative, in which the United States and other countries try preventing weapons of mass destruction from reaching rogue nations. Efforts under that program have so far been limited.

Rice also tried prodding China and other countries, saying, "We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects" of the U.N. resolution.

She said she did not consider North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons irreversible, noting that a handful of other nations like South Africa and Libya had abandoned their nuclear programs.

"If North Korea reverses course and embraces the path of cooperation, if it makes the strategic choice to dismantle its nuclear weapons completely, verifiably and irreversibly, an entirely new and better future would be open to it and to its people," she said.

Rice said the United States was prepared to return to the bargaining table with North Korea and other countries "without precondition," repeating a position the Bush administration has taken frequently. But such talks, she said, "have to lead someplace" and not dwell on tangential issues.

Six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program have been in limbo since last November.

"The nonproliferation regime is under strain but it is not broken," Rice asserted.

Rice denied that U.S. involvement in Iraq was keeping the administration from giving its full attention to the North Korean nuclear problem. "We can certainly do more than one thing at a time," she said.

Rice pointedly challenged Iran to learn a lesson from the international reaction to the North Korean atomic test.

"The greatest challenge to the nonproliferation regime comes from countries that violate their pledges to respect the Non-Proliferation Treaty. The North Korean regime is one such case, but also so is Iran," she said. "The Iranian government is watching and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation."

Rice said she expected the Security Council to begin work this week on an Iran sanctions resolution.

Rice also said her trip was aimed at winning support from U.S. allies in northeast Asia for "a comprehensive strategy" to handle the confrontation with North Korea.

"As President Bush has made clear, the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments to allies like South Korea and Japan," she said. "This trip is an opportunity to reaffirm our reciprocal obligations."

Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that she will push for full implementation of U.N. sanctions against North Korea as punishment for its recent nuclear test when she makes a critical visit to Asia and Russia this week.

The sanctions prohibit trade with North Korea in illicit materials, weapons and luxury items.

"Every country in the region must share the burdens as well as the benefits of our common security," Rice said in comments aimed at China and South Korea, Pyongyang's two largest trading partners. She called on nations to "collectively isolate" North Korea, adding that it "cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce."

Rice also warned Iran -- which faces possible U.N. sanctions over its nascent nuclear enrichment program -- that the Security Council will begin work on a resolution condemning Tehran for not suspending that effort. Iran "can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," Rice said, adding that Iran's current course "could lead simply to further isolation."

DOJ_NMG_0082408

Rice, who departs today, held a news conference on her trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia a few hours after the head of U.S. intelligence agencies announced that analysts had confirmed North Korea's nuclear test through radiation samples detected in the air two days after the blast.

A two-sentence statement released by Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said an analysis of radioactive debris "confirms that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in the vicinity of P'unggye on October 9, 2006. The explosion yield was less than a kiloton."

The extremely small yield surprised U.S. nuclear scientists and intelligence analysts, who had expected a large explosion typical of a first test. The U.S. military dropped a bomb of 20 to 23 kilotons on Nagasaki, Japan, more than 60 years ago.

Although the radiation samples confirm the nuclear test, officials at the CIA, the Department of Energy and national nuclear laboratories are still trying to determine the cause of the low yield. The prevailing theory is that North Korea managed to implode only a fraction of the plutonium during the test.

If the test was less successful than the North Koreans hoped, U.S. analysts believe they will conduct another one to determine what went wrong. Officials said they are on the lookout with satellite imagery and communications intercepts for any signs of a new test.

But some scientists and weapons designers are beginning to wonder whether North Korea tested a sophisticated, miniaturized device.

North Korea's nuclear arsenal is believed by U.S. intelligence to have grown significantly during President Bush's tenure, but little is known about the exact design of the device that Pyongyang may have built. U.S. intelligence has judged, however, that North Korea could be as long as 10 years away from being able to marry a nuclear warhead to a missile delivery system.

Rice told reporters that on her trip she will reassure Japan and South Korea that "the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments." That is a diplomatic way of saying that the U.S. nuclear umbrella will make it unnecessary for those nations to consider developing their own nuclear weapons.

Although Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has flatly rejected building a nuclear arsenal, the country's ruling party policy chief said Sunday that it is necessary to have a debate over whether Japan should obtain the bomb.

U.S. officials are privately concerned that if North Korea is not restrained, Japan in particular might rethink its position on nuclear weapons. During a speech in Shanghai in 2004, Vice President Cheney made an unusually stark public warning that, if faced with a reality that North Korea has a stockpile of nuclear and ballistic weapons, other nations in the region "may conclude their only option is to develop their own capabilities, and then we have a nuclear arms race unleashed in Asia."

Despite Rice's public warning to Iran yesterday, several U.S. and European diplomats concluded privately that any Security Council resolution on Iran would need to be toned down as a result of the action on North Korea over the weekend.

"The DPRK resolution set a standard that the Iranian resolution will be set against, and since Iran hasn't set off a nuclear device, it'll be quite hard to get away with a tougher one than we got on North Korea," said one official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of diplomatic sensitivities. "In any case, Iran just isn't North Korea. Nothing about these issues are the same."

"Iran has really been on the backburner for the last two weeks," said another U.S. government official whose work focuses on Iranian nuclear issues. "Although the secretary said we can walk and chew gum at the same time, in reality we are only taking baby steps and chewing half a piece of gum."

Rice: World United Against North Korea (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

U.S. spy agencies confirmed North Korea's nuclear test on Monday, even as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared that U.N. sanctions prove the world is united in opposing Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions.

Such strong opposition should be a warning to Iran, too, said Rice, who is leaving Tuesday morning for an Asian trip that is expected to be dominated by the nuclear issue. She will visit Japan, South Korea, China and Russia.

Providing the government's first definitive confirmation that North Korea detonated a nuclear device one week ago, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte's office said in a statement that air samples collected on Wednesday showed evidence of radioactivity. That verified North Korea's claims.

"The explosion yield was less than a kiloton," the statement said, smaller than many experts had expected.

Each kiloton is equal to the force produced by 1,000 tons of TNT. An intelligence official said the North Korean device was believed to be roughly the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT, suggesting to analysts that it was probably a partial failure. Experts in and out of government had anticipated a detonation of at least several thousand tons.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive situation with Pyongyang.

DOJ_NMG_0082409

At the State Department, Rice said the world "has responded calmly and firmly" to the test.

"North Korea cannot endanger the world and then expect other nations to conduct business as usual in arms or missile parts," Rice said, previewing her message for the Asia trip. "It cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce."

She said Iran — another government accused of running an illicit nuclear program — should pay attention to the global reaction. That would include the U.N. Security Council's sanctions adopted on Saturday, aimed at making life difficult for the North Korean government and its weapons proliferation business.

"The Iranian government is watching, and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," said Rice, who added that she believes the Security Council will begin working on a sanctions resolution against Iran this week. "The Iranian government should consider the course that it is on."

The United States, North Korea and seven other nations are now believed to have nuclear arms. Yet North Korea's unpredictable behavior and its history of trading weapons and components makes its nuclear advancements particularly worrisome to its neighbors and the international community.

The U.S.-sponsored United Nations resolution on North Korea demands that Pyongyang eliminate nuclear weapons. But it also rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

It calls on countries to block North Korea from receiving equipment or materials to build weapons of mass destruction and other advanced weaponry. It also would clamp down on travel for North Koreans involved in the weapons program and freeze many of the international assets of people or businesses connected to that program.

After the resolution was unanimously passed, North Korea's U.N. ambassador accused council members of a "gangster-like" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

Rice acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis and said she would address that on her trip. Countries in the region worry that the collapse of North Korea's government could send millions of refugees streaming toward their borders. South Koreans also worry about a conventional attack by their neighbor.

"We have no desire to ratchet up conflict," Rice said. "But we'll have some discussions on precisely how this will be carried out."

While China has been inspecting cargo trucks headed for its communist ally, its U.N. ambassador indicated its inspectors will not board ships to search for suspicious equipment or material, raising questions about how strictly it and South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. Both countries have significant trade relations with North Korea, whose economy is perpetually on the verge of collapse.

"Actions are more powerful than words, and we expect the actions will be powerful," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Many in the U.S. government would not be surprised if North Korea were to attempt a second nuclear test sometime soon. The decision to test is considered a political one, and officials say North Korea will be monitoring action at the United Nations and elsewhere.

Rice said a new test "would further deepen the isolation of North Korea."

A key clue on the nature of North Korea's nuclear detonation — its first — came from air samples collected by the Air Force's WC-135 Constant Phoenix, a jet designed to collect particles and gases after a nuclear test. Samples are rushed back to labs in the United States for study before they lose their radioactive properties.

The first reading last Tuesday was negative, but a test on a second sample collected Wednesday was positive, according to the intelligence official.

When scientists evaluate air samples, they are looking for the presence of certain materials and gasses such as xenon, which is released after the fission of uranium or plutonium.

While xenon is one indicator, "you'd like to get a leakage where you have many more fission products — mixed in with plutonium or highly enriched uranium," said David Albright, president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security and a former U.N. weapons inspector.

U.S. intelligence has concluded that the North Korean device likely used plutonium.

Albright, who has followed North Korea's program for two decades, believes its scientists are trying to miniaturize a nuclear device to put it atop a missile. While the test was likely a partial fizzle, those scientists may not have been after a large nuclear blast, he said.

"It doesn't mean that it failed by any means," Albright said. "If it failed, you would see no yield at all."

Rice Adds Moscow Stop To Asia Tour On NKorea Crisis (AFP)

AFP, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082410

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced she would visit Russia later this week as part of a foreign tour focussed on enacting tough UN sanctions against North Korea over its nuclear test.

Rice said she would travel to Moscow following visits to Japan, South Korea and China in the wake of a UN Security Council vote this weekend imposing wide-ranging punitive sanctions against North Korea.

"The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies in Northeast Asia for a comprehensive strategy," she said.

Russia, alongside China, Japan, South Korea and the United States, launched six-party talks with North Korea last year aimed at convincing the reclusive communist state to give up its nuclear weapons program in return for economic and diplomatic rewards.

The six-party talks appeared to have won Pyongyang's agreement last year to give up its nuclear ambitions.

But the talks fell apart when the North withdrew after Washington imposed sanctions on a Macau bank it accused of laundering money and passing counterfeit US dollars for the regime of Kim Jong-Il.

Russia and China were the most reluctant members of the group to support sanctions against North Korea, but both ultimately voted for the US resolution that followed Pyongyang's first test explosion of a nuclear device on October 9.

US And China At Odds Over N Korea Cargo (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

The US insisted on Monday on the right to intercept suspicious North Korean cargo under the authority of the UN Security Council resolution passed on Saturday, setting the stage for a difficult trip to Asia for Condoleezza Rice this week.

As the US secretary of state prepared to leave for talks in Japan, China, South Korea and Russia, US intelligence said air samples it had collected confirmed North Korea's claim to have carried out an underground nuclear test last Monday.

Describing resolution 1718 passed unanimously as "a very powerful tool", Ms Rice said it made possible the "interdiction of dangerous and suspicious cargo".

"We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects of this resolution and we expect the Security Council to aggressively monitor the process," she said.

However, Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, disagreed, telling reporters: "Inspections yes, but inspections are different from interception and interdiction."

He said the resolution did not make it mandatory for all nations to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea. States could carry out such an operation as necessary "in accordance with their national legal authorities", he said.

Kim Holmes, a former senior US official who dealt with North Korea and the UN and is now vice-president of the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington, appeared to concur with the Chinese interpretation, saying the resolution did not approve the use of force needed for interdiction. The resolution speaks of inspection, not interdiction.

China had succeeded in watering down the resolution in a week of debate, by insisting that inspections also required the "co-operation" of North Korea, Mr Holmes said.

Ms Rice said she would discuss how to design "a practical architecture for detecting and screening" dangerous materials.

Dismissing the notion of differences with China, she said: "I am not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations. I don't think they would have voted for a resolution that they did not intend to carry through on."

China had already started checking North Korean trucks crossing its border, Nicholas Burns, under-secretary of state, commented.

Ms Rice repeated that the US was ready to hold talks with North Korea if it returned to the six-party forum mediated by China.

"My goal on this trip is, certainly, to reiterate that we're prepared to return to the talks. But North Korea also needs to understand . . . that they will pay a price here," she said.

North Korea becomes the ninth state believed to possess a nuclear weapon, although it is not widely thought to have perfected the process needed to deliver one by missile.

Iran as a potential customer of nuclear materials is the Bush administration's greatest concern. Senior US officials are visiting Gulf allies this week to prepare for naval exercises testing their joint ability to intercept North Korean ships bound for Iran.

"The Iranian government is watching and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," Ms Rice told reporters.

Later this week the US is expected to table a draft Security Council resolution that seeks to impose sanctions on Iran for rejecting a UN demand that it suspend its nuclear fuel cycle programme. US officials said they expect tough negotiations with China and Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0082411

Yasuhisa Shiozaki, chief cabinet secretary, said Monday Japan had no plans to change its ban on nuclear weapons. Thomas Schieffer, US ambassador to Japan, said that, as long as Japan believed the US remained prepared to "trade New York for Tokyo", an independent nuclear deterrent would not make it any safer. "This is not a new situation for Japan. We have been here for 50 years."

Australia – one of the few western countries to have diplomatic relations with Pyongyang as well as being Washington's most important defence ally in the Asia-Pacific region – said it would go beyond the UN resolution by banning North Korean ships from entering its ports.

Additional reporting by David Pilling in Tokyo and Virginia Marsh in Sydney

China Boosts N. Korea Border Inspections (AP)

By Ng Han Guan And Audra Ang, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 17, 2006

Customs officials examined trucks at the North Korean border Monday as China complied with new U.N. sanctions on Pyongyang for its nuclear test. But China's U.N. ambassador indicated its inspectors will not board ships to search for suspicious equipment or material.

The United States began a new round of diplomacy in Asia to address divisions over how to impose the sanctions, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to arrive in Japan on Wednesday before traveling to South Korea and China. The U.S. announced that air samples gathered last week contain radioactive materials confirming that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion, as it claimed.

China's support is key to whether the measures will have any impact on neighboring North Korea. Beijing's mixed response on implementing the sanctions, approved Saturday by a unanimous U.N. Security Council including China, demonstrates the difficulties U.S. diplomats will encounter as they tour the region.

China and Russia contend that interdicting ships might needlessly provoke the North and at the very least discourage it from returning to talks on its nuclear program — though the U.S. and Britain say most inspections of ships would be done at ports rather than on the high seas. Australia announced it was banning the North's ships from entering its ports, except in dire emergencies.

While China is angry over its communist ally's behavior and is loath to appear out of step with other powers, it has been reluctant to support or implement tough measures. The leadership is concerned that tightening the squeeze on Pyongyang might trigger a collapse of the North Korean regime, sending refugees streaming across the border.

In a sign of Beijing's wariness about refugees, construction of a massive concrete and barbed wire fence along parts of its 880-mile border with the North has picked up in recent days. Scores of soldiers have arrived in communities along the banks of the Yalu River, up from Dandong, over the past week to erect the barrier, farmers and visitors to the area said.

"The move is mainly aimed at North Korean defectors," said Professor Kim Woo-jun at the Institute of East and West Studies in Seoul, South Korea. "As the U.N. sanctions are enforced ... the number of defectors are likely to increase as the regime can't take care of its people."

The sanctions ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used in its ballistic missile and weapons of mass destruction programs. They call for all countries to inspect cargo to and from North Korea to enforce the prohibition, "as necessary," and consistent with each nation's laws.

In some areas of the border, the Chinese seem to have stepped up inspections, though elsewhere a police officer said nothing had changed and inspections were continuing as usual.

At a border-crossing post in the Chinese city of Dandong, about 30 Chinese trucks were seen being checked on Monday morning while 50 empty North Korean trucks waited in line to enter China to pick up cargo.

Customs officers opened the back of each truck and looked at its cargo as it rolled up, though they didn't open individual boxes or bags. By contrast, reporters who visited the border post last week didn't see inspectors open any trucks.

In the afternoon, the officers repeated the process as loaded North Korean trucks returned home. They climbed into the back of the vehicles, but observers couldn't see whether they opened any containers.

Trading companies in Dandong, at the western end of the border, and in Tumen, near the eastern end, said the sanctions were not affecting shipments.

"Today, we just sent a batch of agricultural tools to North Korea by truck," said Huang Kelin, manager of Wanshida Trading Co., a Dandong-based firm that has an office in Pyongyang.

At the Nanping crossing, in an eastern valley surrounded by mountains, inspectors were going through a standard regimen, looking at both cargo and passengers, a police officer said. "The inspections are routine and conducted by quarantine officials," said the officer, Li Canhao.

DOJ_NMG_0082412

Chinese goods reach the North by road and rail, while oil is delivered mainly via pipeline. It wasn't immediately clear what China was doing to inspect rail shipments. A lone locomotive headed into North Korea on Monday afternoon, apparently to pull a cargo train back to China. The North also has a rail link to Russia in the east, though it wasn't clear how that was being policed.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said his country would implement the Security Council resolution and inspect cargo from North Korea for illegal weapons and missiles, but he indicated Chinese inspectors would not board ships. He noted that inspections are not mandatory under the resolution, intended to punish the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

"This is a resolution we have to implement," Wang told reporters at the U.N. "The question was raised whether China will do inspections. Inspections yes, but inspection is different then interdiction and interception. I think different countries will do it different ways."

Wang's remarks represented a change from those he made Saturday after joining the council in voting to impose tough sanctions on North Korea for its Oct. 9 nuclear test. He initially objected to China's conducting inspections because of concerns that cargo checks would raise tensions with the North rather than persuade Pyongyang to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, when asked about interdicting ships, said Monday that "one has to be very careful about it."

"When you go into inspection and things like that, cargo, one has to be very careful to avoid any kind of semblance of provocation," Churkin said.

North Korea's total foreign trade was less than $4 billion last year, though it is growing quickly, according to Chinese and South Korean figures. China accounted for a major portion of that trade, with $1.7 billion in exports and $500 million in imports, according to the Commerce Ministry in Beijing. China also provides up to 90 percent of the North's oil.

There are also questions about how strictly South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. The South has significant trade relations with North Korea and its citizens worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

North Korea's No. 2 ranking leader, Kim Yong Nam, defiantly said the regime would strengthen its military and "achieve a final victory in the historic standoff with the U.S."

The North found a sympathetic ear in Iran, which has also been condemned for its nuclear program. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday rejected the American-initiated measures and accused the U.S. of using the U.N. Security Council as a "weapon to impose its hegemony."

In Washington, Rice warned that U.N. sanctions on North Korea should also be seen by Iran as a strong signal to abandon its nuclear ambitions or face a rebuke from a united international community.

"The Iranian government is watching," she said. "It can now see that the international community will respond" to efforts to acquire nuclear weapons.

Ng Han Guan reported from Dandong and Audra Ang reported from Beijing. AP writer Edith M. Lederer contributed from the United Nations.

U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration confirmed on Monday for the first time that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear test last week. The office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said radioactive materials found in air samples confirmed the test.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed concern that North Korea might be planning a second test. “We're watching it,” she told reporters. “I hope they would not take such a provocative act.”

In a statement, Negroponte's office said the blast was small by standards of nuclear tests; less than 1 kiloton. Each kiloton is equal to the force produced by 1,000 tons of TNT. The bomb the United States dropped on Hiroshima was 15 kilotons.

The confirmation came as Rice prepared to visit Japan, South Korea and China this week to try to shore up efforts by Asian allies to punish North Korea.

A United Nations Security Council resolution passed Saturday calls for nations to prevent North Korea from buying or selling specified weapons and technology. The measure also bans some luxury goods from North Korea and freezes funds outside the country that are associated with weapons programs.

North Korea's neighbors pledged to abide by the resolution. Even China, which had expressed concerns about inspecting cargo bound for North Korea, on Monday checked trucks going to North Korea from the city of Dandong.

DOJ_NMG_0082413

China's U.N. ambassador said Beijing would not stop and board ships, however. “The question was raised whether China will do inspections,” Ambassador Wang Guangya told reporters. “Inspections yes, but inspection is different then interdiction and interception.”

China historically has opposed actions that might destabilize the North Korean regime and send thousands of refugees across the 880-mile border the nations share.

Rice, who is to arrive in Japan on Wednesday, said she was “not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations.”

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Monday that his country was considering more sanctions. Australia said it would also ban North Korea's ships from entering its ports, except in emergencies.

North Korea remained defiant. The No. 2 ranking leader, Kim Yong Nam, said the country would strengthen its military and “achieve a final victory in the historic standoff with the U.S.”

U.S. Expects China's Backing On N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, October 17, 2006

The Bush administration, citing new inspections by the Chinese of trucks bound for North Korea, said Monday it expected China would do its part in enforcing a U.N. resolution punishing its reclusive ally for its nuclear program.

The United States is pressing China for tough action against North Korea ahead of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip this week to Asia.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, pointed to the fact that Chinese customs inspectors had begun inspecting cargo trucks bound for North Korea in the border city of Dandong. Japan and Australia, meanwhile, announced Monday that they might take measures beyond the new U.N. sanctions against North Korea for that country's reported nuclear test.

"We have indications this morning the Chinese are beginning to apply this to their very long land border" with North Korea, Burns said on CBS' "The Early Show." "We also have announcements from Japan and Australia. I spoke to both governments this morning. They are both implementing this."

He said there will be "enormous pressure on China to live up to their responsibility" in enforcing United Nations punishment of its ally, North Korea. "We are all banking on that."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said President Bush had not personally been making any calls Monday on the matter. Snow urged patience before judging China's commitment to the inspections.

"The parties have committed to fulfilling its conditions," Snow said. "Let's see what happens, all right?"

Rice travels to the region Tuesday for a series of talks aimed at easing tensions among countries already on edge from the North's claimed nuclear test.

China, which voted Saturday for the U.N. penalties, has balked at cargo inspections to prevent trafficking of certain banned weapons and technology.

"I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities," Rice said Sunday, adding she was willing to have "conversations" during her trip on how best to enforce the resolution.

The United States' U.N. ambassador portrayed North Korea's detonation last week as a public humiliation for China, which shares a long border with North Korea and is the North's chief ally and supplier of crucial shipments of food and energy aid.

If China were to cut its support, John Bolton said, it "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," the North's capital. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

Rice, who joined Bolton in making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, plans to visit Asian partners this week to consult about the resolution. "I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations," Rice said.

Bolton said the United States' concept of the resolution "is that the overwhelming predominance of the inspections would take place in ports or at land crossings or that sort of thing. But the resolution neither increases nor decreases existing authority to interdict on the high seas."

The U.S.-sponsored resolution demands North Korea eliminate nuclear weapons but rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

After the resolution unanimously passed, North Korea's U.N. ambassador accused council members of a "gangster-like" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said his country "strongly urges the countries concerned to adopt a prudent and responsible attitude in this regard and refrain from taking any provocative steps that may intensify the tensions."

DOJ_NMG_0082414

Meanwhile, a leading Senate Republican urged direct talks with North Korea, as the reclusive nation has sought. "We do need to engage the North Koreans" because the U.N. resolution is weak and limited, said Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, the second-ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

But Rice brushed aside such calls, reaffirming the U.S. commitment to six-nation disarmament talks, which have stalled.

Critics said the U.N. penalties will not curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions and stemmed from what they saw as President Bush's failed foreign policy.

Democratic Sen. John Kerry said the Bush administration is "living in a complete fantasy with respect to the foreign policy they put in place. It is a failure." He said U.S. involvement in Iraq has undermined America's credibility to deal with nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran.

Japan's Pacifism Is Tested Anew By U.N. Sanctions (WSJ)

By Yuka Hayashi

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Efforts to Take Active Role In Steps Against North Korea Pose Constitutional Dilemma

TOKYO -- A United Nations resolution to impose sanctions on North Korea for its apparent testing of a nuclear weapon provides a new test for Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe: how to play an assertive role without straying from the nation's nonmilitaristic constitution.

Saturday, the U.N. Security Council voted to ban trade of most weapons and all luxury goods with North Korea. Yesterday, the U.S. said air samples gathered last week contain radioactive materials that confirm North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in Kilu County, North Hamkyung province.

Amid concern about the lengths to which China would go to enforce the resolution, China's U.N. ambassador said yesterday that Beijing would inspect cargo from North Korea for illegal weapons and missiles. He also indicated China wouldn't stop and board ships to conduct searches.

China already has begun inspecting cargo trucks bound for North Korea, the Associated Press reported, evidence that U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns cited as an encouraging sign.

Meanwhile, Japan is trying to figure out how to participate in a provision of the resolution -- pushed for by Washington and Tokyo despite opposition from China and South Korea -- that allows nations to board North Korean ships suspected of carrying banned items and inspect their cargo.

Preparing to depart for Japan today on an Asian trip focused almost completely on addressing the North Korea situation, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she plans to confirm U.S. commitments to help defend both Japan and South Korea in the face of any threats. While in Seoul and Beijing, Ms. Rice also plans to urge China and South Korea to participate in sharing intelligence and interdicting suspect shipments of arms or nuclear material to or from North Korea, as sketched out in the U.N. resolution.

Japan's pacifist constitution would make it difficult for it to inspect any ships. Japan limits its military forces to self-defense only and is allowed to dispatch troops overseas only for peacekeeping or disaster relief or when Japan encounters serious threat of attack. If Japan sent soldiers aboard a North Korean ship and they were attacked, the current rules provide no clear guidelines on how they should respond.

Officials are considering invoking for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that allows its self-defense forces to provide support functions to the U.S. military under a special situation: if Japan faces an emergency situation in the Asian region in which a direct military attack on the country seems imminent.

Foreign Minister Taro Aso says the current situation is indeed an emergency, since Japan could be the first target of any potential North Korean attack. "We are being asked to take cooperative action" by the U.N., Mr. Aso said in a talk show televised on Sunday. "Naturally, we will respond by doing everything we can." For example, Japan may be able to use its surveillance system to alert the U.S. of the approach of suspicious North Korean ships, he said.

Japan's attempt to play an active role in condemning North Korea reflects an attempt by the 52-year-old Mr. Abe, who became prime minister last month, to give Japan greater influence in East Asia. Mr. Abe has visited China and South Korea in an effort to improve its relations with neighboring countries.

It also is the latest example of Japan's effort to have its military, known as Self-Defense Forces, take on greater responsibility outside its borders. In the aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks in the U.S., Japan passed a special law that allowed its forces to assist U.S. ships patrolling the Indian Ocean by providing fuel and transporting supplies. In the most dangerous and largest overseas deployment of its forces since World War II, Japan in 2004 sent 550 troops to southern Iraq to rebuild infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0082415

J. Thomas Schieffer, the U.S. ambassador to Japan, reiterated yesterday that he expects Japan to make a substantial contribution in the sanctions against North Korea. Japan's pacifist constitution means that "it's not as easy for them to participate in a sanction regime," he told reporters. "But I'm confident that the Japanese will be able to figure out a way to participate in a meaningful way."

In addition to the U.N.-approved measures, Japan has imposed sanctions of its own, including closing its ports to all North Korean ships.

--Neil King Jr. in Washington contributed to this article.

Russia Demands U.S. Lift Sanctions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Russia demanded Monday that the United States lift sanctions against two Russian companies accused of making deals with Iran involving sensitive technology and hinted that a U.S. refusal could affect negotiations on a U.N. sanctions resolution against Tehran.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said the sanctions against state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and top aircraft maker Sukhoi for allegedly violating a U.S. law known as the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000, create a "predicament" for Moscow.

If Russia is asked to vote on a Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment at the same time that Russian companies are subject to U.S. sanctions, it would be voting on a measure "which at least by implication supports sanctions which have already been imposed on us," he said.

"So it is a somewhat ridiculous, bizarre political predicament," Churkin said. "The other side of it is that we don't know why those sanctions were imposed on the two organizations back in Russia."

Churkin said Russia wants the sanctions lifted off the two companies, whether or not U.N. sanctions are leveled against Iran. He made his comments as France, Britain and Germany were consulting on elements for a U.N. sanctions resolution against Iran.

The U.S. alleges the Russian companies have made deals with Iran involving sensitive technology.

Russia has objected to the U.S. law, and both Russian companies deny any violation.

Iran insists its uranium enrichment program is purely for peaceful means — to provide nuclear energy — but Washington and its European allies suspect Tehran's real goal is nuclear weapons.

Under the sanctions imposed against the Russian companies in early August, the U.S. government is prohibited from dealing with them. The sanctions also suspend any export licenses to the companies for certain products considered sensitive, and prohibit issuance of new licenses.

In late August, U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Moscow and Washington disagreed over the facts in the case and that he agreed to have the matter reconsidered.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Churkin had not spoken to him about lifting U.S. sanctions against the two Russian companies. "We are going to be moving this week on the Iran sanctions question and I suppose I'll hear it at that point," he said.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said he was told that the French might share their ideas of possible elements for a Security Council resolution against Iran by the end of the week. Diplomats said the elements would likely be presented by both France and Britain.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said Monday the European Union would back imposing sanctions against Iran while keeping the door open to future negotiations to resolve the nuclear standoff.

Churkin softened his stance somewhat when asked if Russia would block an Iran sanctions resolution if U.S. sanctions against the two companies weren't lifted.

"I don't want to make any strong statements to that effect," he said.

Churkin also signaled that Moscow is in no hurry to adopt a resolution against Iran.

Unlike North Korea, which conducted a nuclear test, he said, "the current state of things" with Iran doesn't require a vote within days.

U.S. Eases Push For Egypt Reforms (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 17, 2006

CAIRO — Last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice canceled a visit to Cairo to protest the arrest of an Egyptian opposition leader, Ayman Nour.

DOJ_NMG_0082416

A few months later, she gave a speech at the American University of Cairo in which she called on Egypt to "put its faith in its own people" and enact democratic reforms.

When Rice visited here earlier this month during a tour of the Middle East, not much had changed: Nour was back in jail, along with thousands of other political prisoners; and political reforms seemed to be on hold.

Critics, including two Egyptian political analysts, say Egypt has retreated on the democracy front since it permitted several candidates to run for president last year. Last week, the government accused Talaat Sadat, a member of parliament and nephew of slain Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat, of defaming the Egyptian military by alleging that officers were involved in his uncle's 1981 assassination. Gonzalo Gallegos, a State Department spokesman, said the Bush administration "is keeping an eye on the case and will see how things progress."

"The mood here is very despondent," said Hani Shukrallah of the Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

The most populous nation in the Arab world, with a history that goes back thousands of years, Egypt has been a political and cultural trendsetter in the region. In the 1950s, a military coup led by army Col. Gamal Abdel Nasser overthrew a British-backed monarchy and established an authoritarian government. Similar coups followed in Iraq and Syria. When Nasser died, he was succeeded by his vice president, Anwar Sadat.

The current president, Hosni Mubarak, was Sadat's vice president and took power in 1981 when Sadat was assassinated by Muslim extremists opposed to Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

Shukrallah said many Egyptians believe Mubarak, 78, elected to a fifth six-year term last year, will orchestrate his succession within the next few years. His preferred replacement: his son, Gamal, 42.

Asked about the succession, Rice said it was "not something that the U.S. should, can or will have an opinion" about.

Shukrallah said U.S. reluctance to challenge the younger Mubarak reflects the U.S. need for Egyptian cooperation to try to restart the Palestinian-Israeli peace process and deal with the rising challenge from Iran.

"There is a sense that the inheritance of power will happen, and nothing is happening in terms of political reform," he said.

Amr Hamzawy, an Egyptian scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, said Gamal Mubarak took a leading role in a recent convention of Egypt's ruling National Democratic Party.

The younger Mubarak gave a major speech in which he said Egypt would develop nuclear power. Hamzawy said this was an attempt to attract popular support. "There is lots of speculation that President Mubarak will resign in 2008," he said.

The Bush administration, like its predecessors — Republican and Democratic — has supported Egypt with an annual $2 billion in aid since Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel. In the aftermath of 9/11, however, President Bush began calling for democratic reforms in Egypt and the wider Middle East, arguing that U.S. support for authoritarian governments helped foster the rage and frustration that produced al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

Rice says that there has been no change in policy. She spoke in Cairo about "the non-negotiable demands of human dignity, which means the right to choose those who will govern you, the right to worship as you please, the right to educate your girls and your boys, the right to be free from the arbitrary power of the state."

Recent events in the Middle East, however, have complicated U.S. efforts to push democracy here. The United States does not want to annoy allied governments at a time when the region is increasingly unstable, says Rashid Khalidi, director of Middle East studies at Columbia University.

Iraq is increasingly chaotic and violent despite having several successful elections. Iran is growing in influence, partly because of its support for Shiite militias in Iraq and its backing of Hezbollah, which battled Israel last summer in Lebanon. Elections have strengthened the militant Hamas movement in the Palestinian territories and the Muslim Brotherhood, a veteran fundamentalist group, in Egypt. The United States refuses to deal with either group, branding them as terrorists.

Khalidi says the U.S. government has quietly "shelved its democracy-promotion efforts" because it now understands that "democracy would put in power policies and groups opposed to almost everything the administration stands for."

The Muslim Brotherhood, although outlawed, won 88 of 444 seats in parliamentary elections earlier this year by running independent candidates — the strongest showing ever by an Egyptian opposition group. Abdel Moneim Abul Fottouh, a member of the brotherhood's 15-member leadership council, said the party would have done even better had the government allowed truly free elections. More than 90 members of the organization remain in jail of thousands arrested during the elections, he said, even though the group renounced violence more than a decade ago.

Secular parties in Egypt are weaker. Nour was one of a handful of opposition candidates allowed to run against Mubarak last year. He was jailed after the elections. Founder of a party called "Tomorrow," Nour was sentenced to five years in prison on charges he forged petition signatures to register the party.

Rice said the Bush administration has not given up on democratic reforms but that each country has to move at its own pace. "The process of democracy has its ups and its downs," she said. "It remains a part of our agenda. Ultimately we believe that a democratic Middle East is going to be a more peaceful Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0082417

Israeli Premier Says He Would Talk To Lebanese And Palestinians (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 16 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Israeli Parliament on Monday that he was willing to meet the leaders of Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority in an effort to ease regional tensions, though no such meetings appear imminent.

It was the first day of Parliament's winter session, and was marked by the absence of the president, Moshe Katsav, who would normally address legislators.

The Israeli police recommended Sunday that Mr. Katsav face charges of rape and sexual assault committed against women who worked for him. With the attorney general now reviewing the case to determine whether to file charges, Mr. Katsav canceled plans to attend Monday's session at the Knesset, or Parliament, in Jerusalem.

Israeli prime ministers often use the opening of Parliament's winter session to set out a diplomatic agenda, and Mr. Olmert raised the possibility of talks with Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

"I want to take this opportunity to call on Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to meet with me face to face," Mr. Olmert said.

Mr. Olmert has broached the possibility on several occasions, and Mr. Siniora has shot it down each time, and did so again on Monday.

In Beirut, Mr. Siniora's office issued a statement saying that he had "announced more than once that Lebanon will be the last Arab country to sign a peace deal with Israel."

"I pledge to work tirelessly to take advantage of any opportunity, any crack, any possibility of holding negotiations that will lead to real dialogue with responsible representatives of the Palestinian people," Mr. Olmert said.

But he reiterated that no real progress was possible until Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier was released. He was captured by Palestinian militants on June 25. The Palestinians, in turn, are seeking freedom for a large number of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel.

In a wide-ranging speech, Mr. Olmert made no mention of his plan to withdraw from some Jewish settlements in the West Bank. That was the dominant theme of his election campaign in the spring.

But since then, Mr. Olmert's popularity has fallen sharply, with many Israelis critical of his handling of the war in Lebanon. His failure to mention the West Bank withdrawal plan appeared to confirm the widespread belief that it was on hold indefinitely.

On other issues, Mr. Olmert said he believed that moderate Arab countries were building closer ties to guard against what he called threats from Iran and Islamic militants.

He also repeated his call for the international community to act against Iran's nuclear program. Israel says that Iran is aggressively seeking nuclear weapons, which Iran denies.

Mr. Olmert will travel to Russia on Tuesday and is expected to raise the issue with President Vladimir V. Putin. Russia has helped Iran develop its nuclear program and has opposed sanctions.

Meanwhile, Mr. Katsav, who has served in the mostly ceremonial position of president since 2000, is facing increasing pressure to step down.

"There is a sense that corruption has reached the highest level of Israeli society, and that this must be cleaned up," said Shlomo Aronson, a political science professor at Hebrew University.

Nahum Barnea, a leading newspaper columnist, wrote in Yediot Aharonot: "The man Moshe Katsav is innocent as long as it has not been proven otherwise. But the man is one thing and the president another. President Moshe Katsav cannot continue in his position much longer."

Israel Rejects Syrian Offer On The Golan Heights (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, October 17, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria - The first and last thing that Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem looks at each day at work is a large map of the Middle East with the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights shaded in distinctive brown.

"This is my territory," Moallem said as he pointed to the land at the heart of chilly relations between Syria and Israel. "This is my life."

DOJ_NMG_0082418

In the wake of this summer's war in Lebanon, the Golan Heights have re-emerged at the center of the latest land-for-peace proposal that some see as a chance to reshape regional dynamics. In an unexpected move, Syrian President Bashar Assad has offered to end his conflict with Israel if it gives back the disputed territory it's held for nearly 40 years.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and influential U.S. diplomats have rejected the proposal as a meaningless feint from a weak authoritarian ruler. But others, including a growing number of influential Israelis, see the offer as an opportunity to jump-start dormant negotiations at a time when the Middle East is drifting towards further instability.

Israel's defense minister, internal security minister and some of its veteran peace negotiators have urged Olmert to use the opening to lure Syria away from its alliance with hard-line groups that they think pose a greater threat to regional stability.

"I believe it is imperative for Israel to penetrate and shatter the vicious triangle comprised of Iran, Syria and Hamas by creating an impenetrable channel of communication," Uri Savir, Israel's chief negotiator of the Oslo peace accords with the Palestinians, wrote in The Jerusalem Post.

Assad surprised Israel with the offer. Only weeks earlier, as Israeli soldiers began withdrawing from Lebanon after a stalemated fight with the militant group Hezbollah, Assad delivered a derisive speech in which he hailed Hezbollah and said it had "shattered the myth of an invincible army."

Now the 40-year-old Syrian president is offering to sit down with Israel and talk.

In an interview with McClatchy Newspapers, Moallem said Syria was willing to normalize relations with Israel for the first time in history if Israel returned the Golan Heights, a vast swath of mountains that it captured during the 1967 Six Day War.

"Between Syria and Israel, the issue that stands between us is the Golan Heights," Moallem said. "After each war there is a narrow window of opportunity for peace, and it depends on what effort and message you do to enlarge it."

Moallem said the Syrian offer was likely to stand for only a few months, and Assad has warned that he may consider attacking Israel if his entreaties are rebuffed.

"My hope for peace could change one day," Assad told the German magazine Der Spiegel late last month. "And when hope disappears, then maybe war really is the only answer."

That threat has kept Israel's military on alert along the Syrian border, although few expect Syria to attack anytime soon, if at all.

Assad's offer has been rejected by Olmert, who wants to see Syria sever its links to Hezbollah and the militant group Hamas before they agree to peace talks.

On Monday, Olmert repeated his rejection in a speech before the Israeli parliament.

U.S. officials also have rejected Assad's gesture.

"We ask him to step outside his office and do something about the situation in his capital city, where there are enemies of peace who operate freely from Damascus and conduct terror activities in the Palestinian territories and in Israel," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David C. Welch told the U.S.-backed Alhurra Television network last week. "If his desire and vision for peace are accurate and real, he would do something about those things."

Moallem dismissed such demands as the unrealistic rhetoric of an American administration that's done nothing but destabilize the Middle East with its uncompromising policies.

"When the Americans are moderate, Syria will be moderate," he said.

Even if Israel were to launch talks with Syria, the initiative could be derailed quickly by the probe into last year's assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. A preliminary investigation suggested that high-level Syrian officials were behind the attack, which forced Assad to pull his troops out of Lebanon.

Still, coming at a time when there are few peaceful options in the simmering Middle East, a growing number of Israeli officials, Western diplomats in the region and intellectuals see a chance to isolate Iran further and undermine militant groups.

"A peace accord with Syria would deal a mortal blow to the current regime in Tehran and would bring its end closer," Israeli commentator Sever Plocker wrote. "A Syrian-Israeli peace will pull the rug out from beneath the feet of the terrorist organizations that are based in Damascus, will help the Palestinians regain their sanity and will serve as leverage for a comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace."

Assad's offer is Syria's latest attempt to settle the long-standing dispute over the Golan Heights. The president made a similar offer three years ago, which was greeted with the same skepticism. Perhaps the best chance to settle the issue came in 2000, when U.S.-brokered negotiations broke down over whether Israel would give Syria access to the Sea of Galilee.

Suicide Bomber Kills 94 In Northern Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082419

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 16 — A suicide bomber rammed a truck packed with explosives into a military convoy on Monday, killing at least 94 people and wounding 150. The explosion, about 100 miles northeast of the capital, was one of the deadliest attacks since a 2002 cease-fire between the government and separatist Tamils.

The government blamed the rebels, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, for the attack, a charge the group neither acknowledged nor denied. The vast majority of those killed and wounded were sailors, but a military spokesman said some civilians were caught in the explosion.

"This is a barbaric terrorist act," said Keheliya Rambukwella, the government's military spokesman. "It clearly shows that peace is not on the agenda of the L.T.T.E. and they don't care about international opinion."

But he said the government still planned to attend peace talks with the rebels, which are being brokered by Norway and are to resume Oct. 28 in Geneva after an eight-month hiatus. The separatists have said they may back out of the talks.

Monday's attack was yet another sign that the four-year-old cease-fire was no longer being observed, even though neither the government nor the rebels have publicly disavowed it. It was also part of an increase in violence over the last year: more than 2,000 people, half of them civilians, have been killed in fighting since April, according to the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission.

The explosion occurred on the day that Japan's special envoy to Sri Lanka, Yasushi Akashi, met with President Mahinda Rajapaksa to shore up support for the peace talks. Norway's envoy, Jon Hanssen-Bauer, and an American assistant secretary of state, Richard A. Boucher, are to arrive later in the week to try to ensure that the talks go ahead.

Mr. Hanssen-Bauer is to meet with separatist leaders on Thursday to encourage them to attend; the rebels said they would give their final answer then.

The truck bomber on Monday crashed into a convoy of 24 buses carrying unarmed navy personnel going on leave or returning to duty. The convoy was stopped at a transit center outside Habarana. About 340 navy personnel were at the center.

Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, a military spokesman, said he believed that the attack was an act of revenge against the navy, which he said had succeeded in many recent attempts to stop the rebels from smuggling arms and explosives. On Sunday, the navy sank a suspected Tiger vessel that it said was transporting weapons off the northwestern coast.

Hours after the attack, Kfir fighter jets attacked a northern rebel stronghold, said Air Chief Marshal Donald Perera, head of Sri Lanka's armed forces.

Tamil rebels say they need their own state because the Sinhalese majority discriminates against Tamils.

Attack Kills 93 Sailors In Sri Lanka (WP/AP)

By Krishan Francis

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 16 -- Suspected Tamil rebels rammed a truck packed with explosives into a convoy of military buses Monday, killing at least 93 sailors in one of the deadliest insurgent attacks since a 2002 cease-fire.

The military said more than 150 were wounded in the attack near the town of Dambulla, about 90 miles northeast of the capital, Colombo.

President Mahinda Rajapakse's office said in a statement that the attack "was further proof" that the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam had an "unmitigated commitment to violence to achieve its ends."

The rebel group, the president's office said, is "in total disregard of international demands for it to abandon violence and seek peaceful means to achieve its goals."

The attack came as a Japanese envoy met with the president Monday amid intensified diplomatic efforts to strengthen the peace process between the government and rebels ahead of scheduled talks between the two sides this month in Switzerland.

It was not clear what effect the attack would have on those talks. There was no immediate comment on the attack from the rebels, although they routinely deny involvement.

The Japanese envoy, Yasushi Akashi, was also scheduled to travel to the rebels' stronghold in the north to talk with the Tiger leadership. A Japanese Embassy spokesman said he had no information yet on whether those plans would change following the attack.

Thorfinnur Omarsson, a spokesman for the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission, urged the government and rebels to keep their commitment to the peace talks.

"Obviously, this is a brutal attack and a serious threat to the peace process," Omarsson said. "But the people of Sri Lanka deserve that the talks will take place as planned."

Norwegian peace envoy Jon Hanssen-Bauer was scheduled to return to the island this week. U.S. envoy Richard Boucher will make a two-day visit to Sri Lanka starting Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0082420

Sri Lanka recently has seen some of the bloodiest fighting since a Norwegian-brokered cease-fire was signed in 2002, temporarily ending nearly two decades of civil war. Heavy battles last Wednesday on the northern Jaffna Peninsula left hundreds of combatants dead, despite commitments by both the government and rebels to return to the negotiating table.

The rebel Tamil Tigers have been fighting since 1983 for a separate homeland for the Tamil minority in the north and east, citing decades of discrimination by the majority Sinhalese. About 65,000 people were killed before the 2002 cease-fire.

Venezuela Is Denied Security Council Seat (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Juan Forero, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

New Vote Scheduled Today as Intensive Campaign Fails to Win Two-Thirds of Ballots

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 16 -- Venezuela was stymied Monday in its bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council, a result that shocked diplomats who had expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage.

Guatemala finished ahead of Venezuela in nine of the first 10 rounds of secret voting held by the U.N. General Assembly. But neither secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina on Jan. 1 in the open Latin American seat on the 15-nation council.

Voting will resume Tuesday.

Delegates at the United Nations had predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat, but the opening ballot showed Guatemala ahead 114 to 74. Venezuela gained votes through the day but never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly.

The result came as a relief to the United States, which had lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala. Chavez's government, U.S. officials warned, would play a destructive role on the council, lending its support to those countries, including Iran, Sudan and North Korea, that have defied the United Nations.

It also represented a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East.

Chavez may have undercut his country's chances with a provocative speech last month before the General Assembly, in which he described President Bush as "the devil." And once-solid support for Venezuela in South America, from countries including Chile and Paraguay, wavered after Chavez's government entered into a military pact with Bolivia, which has lost territory to both those countries.

The United States, Britain, China, Russia and France enjoy permanent membership on the 15-member Security Council. The other 10 seats are distributed regionally for two-year terms; a vote by the General Assembly fills five seats each year. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions.

But the deadlock over the Latin American seat raised the prospect of a long election and that a compromise candidate -- possibly Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay or Chile -- might enter the race. Mexico and Cuba received single votes on some ballots Monday.

Chavez has been hostile to Washington for years, but he has been particularly antagonistic since the White House offered tacit support for a 2002 coup that briefly removed him from power. Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cardenas, characterized the race as a challenge between a fearless champion of the developing world and the world's lone superpower.

"We are not competing with a brother country. We are competing with the biggest power on the planet," he said.

Some delegates said Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol.

For those who view the General Assembly chamber as "a very sacrosanct place," Chavez's performance exhibited "bad taste," said Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga. "It can be a platform for the battle of ideas but not for the vilification of one country."

Mahiga said, however, that Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and "swayed" others to vote against it.

"It's a double-edged sword," he said. The race was "perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela."

Alberto Garrido, an author and analyst in Caracas who has written several books on Chavez, said the vote is a serious setback for Chavez's campaign to project Venezuelan influence beyond Latin America.

Venezuela has bought foreign debt from Argentina, sold crude oil at cut-rate prices to smaller Caribbean islands and provided aid to Africa -- all efforts designed, in part, to counter U.S. influence.

DOJ_NMG_0082421

"This is a big setback in Chavez's strategy," said Garrido, whose latest book, "Chavez's Wars," deals with the president's conflicts with the Bush administration and other foes. "He had a plan to become the institutionalized voice of the south, if he had gotten that seat. This is a blow, perhaps the biggest blow in his geopolitical strategy."

In Venezuela, the government's failure to secure a seat was called "an embarrassing defeat" by Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election. The president retains the support of a majority of Venezuelans, recent polls have shown, but opponents accuse him of ignoring spiraling crime, chronic unemployment and poverty while he focuses on making a name for himself abroad.

Chavez has spent much of his presidency outside Venezuela. But since July, as the Security Council campaign has built, his travel schedule has become feverish, with trips to Russia, China, Vietnam, Iran and Belarus.

The Venezuelan government's argument that it would be a voice for those countries suffering at the hands of U.S. imperialism did not strike a chord with enough nations, said Milos Alcalay, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations.

"To argue that Venezuela would go to the Security Council to be the counterweight against imperialism didn't mesh with the philosophy that this is a body that aims to find things in common," said Alcalay, who resigned his post because of opposition to Chavez's policies.

"This was firstly a rejection of combative language, but it was also a rejection of Venezuela's claim to be the voice of those who do not have a voice, of Africa, the nonaligned," he said. "And really, they do have a voice. Africa elected South Africa as its spokesman."

Forero reported from Quito, Ecuador.

Venezuela Slips In Voting For U.N. Seat (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 16 — Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year suffered a setback on Monday when Guatemala, backed by the United States, established a wide lead and maintained it after 10 ballots.

Neither country obtained the necessary 125 votes — two-thirds of those voting — to win the seat outright, but Guatemala ended the day with a lead of 110 to 77.

The balloting, which at one point had the countries tied with 93 votes each, resumes Tuesday and could last days, until one prevails or the Latin American group decides to bring forth a compromise candidate.

The initial outcome was a distinct blow to the ambitions of Hugo Chávez, the fiery populist leader of Venezuela, who has turned the contest into a focus of his campaign against Washington, and traveled widely and spent his country's oil largess liberally to promote its candidacy.

Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said his country was not battling Guatemala, which he called "a brother country," but "fighting against the owners of the universe."

A Venezuelan victory, he said, would give small and impoverished nations "an independent voice needed on the Security Council to fight against the power of money."

A Security Council seat would also give Mr. Chávez a global platform to vent his grievances against Washington, a reason why the United States has conducted its own vigorous lobbying against the idea.

Mr. Chávez gave a histrionic preview of what could be expected when he addressed the opening of the General Assembly last month and called President Bush "the devil," adding that he could still smell sulfur on the podium where Mr. Bush had spoken the day before.

While the real power on the 15-nation Security Council is exercised by the five permanent members with vetoes — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — Venezuela could be a spoiler in the Council's efforts at consensus and its ability to draft its frequent policy statements, a process that requires unanimity.

While potentially disruptive, Venezuela's presence would have little real effect on resolutions, which need only nine votes (and no vetoes) to pass.

Monday's vote was held to fill the seat being vacated by Argentina, one of the five elected members of the panel finishing their two-year terms at the end of the year.

In uncontested races on Monday, South Africa was named to replace Tanzania, and Belgium and Italy were endorsed to replace Denmark and Greece. Indonesia defeated Nepal for the seat held by Japan.

United Nations rules permit marathon ballots, and a battle between Cuba and Colombia in 1979 continued for two months and 155 rounds until the election of a third candidate, Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0082422

"In the year 2000, I was in Florida for 31 days," said John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, recalling the post-election fight of President Bush to win the presidency that year. "This has just begun."

Guatemala, Venezuela Even For U.N. Seat (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Venezuela and Guatemala hit a deadlock Monday in their battle for a seat on the powerful U.N. Security Council, after 10 rounds of voting failed to anoint a winner to fill the spot reserved for Latin America.

Guatemala led in nine of the 10 ballots, but could not get the two-thirds majority necessary to win. Nonetheless, the results were a defeat for Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who had campaigned by railing against the United States and promised to use his nation's voice on the 15-member council to counter Washington's influence.

The other four seats that will come open on the council were filled easily. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium will start their terms on the council on Jan. 1, replacing Tanzania, Japan, Denmark and Greece.

Neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election, which resumes on Tuesday with another round of balloting. Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas complained the United States has pressured countries worldwide to prevent Venezuela from winning the two-year rotating seat.

"Venezuela will not withdraw — we're fighting until the end," Cardenas said. "We are fighting against the first power of the world, the owners of the universe. We're happy, we're strong and we will continue."

The voting pattern fluctuated through the day. In the early rounds, Guatemala got 116 votes and Venezuela just 70. Then, in the sixth round of voting, they tied at 93 each. On the last vote, Guatemala led again, with 110 to Venezuela's 77. That was still short of the 125 needed to win.

Diplomats said Chavez may have hurt his nation's chances with a bombastic speech at the General Assembly debate in September, when he railed against the United States and called President George W. Bush "the devil" — a speech criticized even by U.S. politicians who had reached out to Chavez.

Yet the vote also reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, the preferred American candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public American campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala.

After the voting ended Monday, Rosenthal said his nation was an "independent voice" that would vote according to its own policies.

"We are an independent country and frankly we resent it a bit being told we are going to toe the line of not only the United States but any other power," Rosenthal said. "We make our own decisions."

Diplomats said it was far too early to think of a compromise candidate to come forward to fill the seat that Argentina will vacate at the end of the year. Peru holds the other seat reserved for Latin America until Dec. 31, 2007.

The record number of ballots for a Security Council seat occurred in 1979, when the General Assembly held 154 unsuccessful votes to choose between Cuba and Colombia. Mexico was then put forward and won in the 155th round.

"Experience here in New York has been that in some cases they've done over 100 ballots," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "We've done 10 today, that's just really beginning to get your adrenaline going a little bit, we'll just see how it goes."

After that, Latin American states could agree to put forward a new candidate — but only if the other two agree to step down. Rosenthal acknowledged that the deadlock could not last forever.

"If this goes on for several days and we can see that there's no movement in either of the candidates being able to get two-thirds of the vote, we probably would have to think of a third consensus candidate for the region," Rosenthal said. "But we think the time hasn't come for that yet."

Possible other candidates include Uruguay, Costa Rica, Mexico or Chile, though Chilean Foreign Minister Alejandro Foxley has said his nation is not seeking a spot on the council. That does not rule out Chile being put forward by someone else.

Venezuela has served four times on the Security Council. Guatemala, emerging from years of a brutal U.S.-backed dictatorship, has never had a seat but is a leading contributor of troops to U.N. peacekeeping missions.

In recent months, Chavez has collected pledges of support as he visited about a dozen countries from eastern Europe to Africa. Venezuela's opposition leaders have accused Chavez of squandering millions of dollars on his Security Council campaign while neglecting domestic problems such as rampant crime and acute poverty.

The 10 non-permanent seats on the council are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by the veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Associated Press Writer Christopher Toothaker in Caracas, Venezuela, contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0082423

Link To Chávez May Have Hurt Ecuadorean Candidate (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 16 — Rafael Correa, the charismatic economist who garnered a surprisingly weak showing Sunday in the first round of voting for president, finds himself in a situation that has plagued leftists in other Latin American elections this year: defending his ties to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

Álvaro Noboa, a conservative banking and banana magnate, surged ahead by attacking Mr. Correa's admiration for Mr. Chávez and his advocacy of nationalistic economic proposals that seemed inspired by Mr. Chávez's policies. The two candidates are expected to compete in a runoff election on Nov. 26.

"Noboa saw the advantage of running against Correa but also against Chávez," said Simón Cueva, an economist and political analyst at the Corporation for Development Studies, an Ecuadorean research institute.

Mr. Noboa won about 27 percent of the vote and Mr. Correa 22 percent, with about 70 percent of the votes counted on Monday. Mr. Correa challenged the results and said fraud might have marred the count, which suffered from delays. Election officials suspended a contract with the Brazilian company overseeing electronic tabulations.

Mr. Noboa called Mr. Correa a "friend of terrorists, a friend of Chávez, a friend of Cuba." Mr. Correa said Mr. Noboa would rule Ecuador like a "banana plantation."

It has been a challenging week for Mr. Chávez. Venezuela failed to win enough votes on Monday for a seat on the United Nations Security Council, possibly depriving its president of an international platform he desires.

The unexpected results in the election here, meanwhile, point to growing unease in some parts of Latin America with political projects whose ambitions coincide too closely with those of Mr. Chávez.

"Daniel Ortega must be a little nervous," said Michael Shifter, an analyst at Inter-American Dialogue, a policy institute in Washington. Mr. Ortega, who is considered the front-runner in Nicaragua's presidential election next month, has been endorsed by Mr. Chávez, who has been relatively quiet about Mr. Correa's campaign in Ecuador.

The perception of support from Mr. Chávez has been a mixed blessing in other recent elections. Alan García, whose first term as Peru's president ended in hyperinflation, mounted a comeback this year to defeat Ollanta Humala, an ultranationalist former army officer who had been endorsed by Mr. Chávez.

Venezuela's relations with Mexico remain tense after Felipe Calderón, a conservative, defeated Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a leftist, for the presidency this year. Mr. Calderón used images of Mr. Chávez in television ads during the campaign to criticize Mr. López Obrador.

Now Mr. Noboa, a billionaire who controls more than 100 companies in Ecuador and other countries, signaled that he would end diplomatic relations with Venezuela and Cuba if elected. "I'm not a hypocrite," he said in televised comments. "I don't like the double standard."

Issues other than Venezuela have also dominated Ecuador's presidential race. Mr. Noboa wants to negotiate a trade agreement with Washington and favors extending an agreement that would allow American soldiers to remain in Manta, an air base used by the United States military for drug surveillance flights.

Mr. Correa, like most of the other Ecuadorean presidential candidates, disagreed with Mr. Noboa on those issues. Drawing inspiration from Argentina, Mr. Correa also said he wanted to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt, a move that worried foreign banks about dealing with another messy default.

Mr. Noboa and Mr. Correa both campaigned as populists, as did Gilmar Gutiérrez, the brother of a deposed former president, who finished third. Mr. Noboa campaigned from the right as a God-fearing businessman, promising cheap housing and handing out free wheelchairs to handicapped supporters.

Mr. Correa promises a "citizen's revolution" by rewriting Ecuador's Constitution. He also evoked an affinity with Mr. Chávez by professing admiration for the Venezuelan's "Bolivarian" ideals.

Mr. Correa said during the campaign that Mr. Chávez was a friend and acknowledged meeting with him in Venezuela as recently as August. He repeatedly denied receiving campaign financing from Venezuela's government.

Almost until the voting on Sunday, the election seemed Mr. Correa's to lose. One opinion poll by Cedatos/Gallup put his support at 37 percent at the start of October, within grasp of winning the 40 percent necessary for a first-round victory. He would also have needed a 10 percentage point lead to win.

Mexican Leftist Suffers Setback In Local Race (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082424

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 16 — The leader of the Mexican left, who has refused to accept his defeat in the summer's presidential race, saw his party take a beating over the weekend in a governor's race widely viewed as a referendum on his charisma and power as a populist.

Though aides to the leftist leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, dismissed the loss as a minor setback, his detractors noted that it was the latest in a string of signs that he is losing public support, even in his home state, Tabasco.

Mr. López Obrador has charged that the July 2 presidential election was fraudulent and declared himself "the legitimate president," after a show-of-hands vote among his supporters at a mass rally last month. The gathering came after Mr. López Obrador's supporters had blockaded major avenues in the capital for six weeks to demand a recount.

The courts, however, awarded a narrow victory to Felipe Calderón, a conservative from President Vicente Fox's party. Leftists loyal to Mr. López Obrador have vowed to keep Mr. Calderón from taking office on Dec. 1, while the leftist leader has promised to set up a parallel government.

But Sunday's election for governor in Tabasco, in the south, suggested that Mr. López Obrador's ability to sway voters has waned since the presidential race. Returning to his home state, Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, campaigned hard for weeks on behalf of his party's candidate, César Raúl Ojeda. He often upstaged the candidate during the final days of the campaign.

Many Mexicans saw the race as a test of Mr. López Obrador's strength. But with 96 percent of the precincts counted on Monday, the candidate of the centrist Institutional Revolutionary Party, Andrés Rafael Granier, was winning by 10 points.

The election was ugly, however, and leaders of Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party said they would challenge the results. Supporters of the rival candidates engaged in street battles and fired guns at the houses of influential politicians as a scare tactic. The voting was also plagued by allegations of vote buying.

Some political analysts said the results showed that the public was fed up with Mr. López Obrador's stubborn reluctance to concede defeat and his reliance on street protests.

"It seems to me to be a catastrophe for him," said Raymundo Riva Palacio, a political columnist for the newspaper El Universal .

Óscar Luis Rodríguez, a longtime member of Mr. López Obrador's party in Tabasco, put it more bluntly. "Andrés Manuel has lost credibility," he told the daily newspaper El Sol. "He has lost respect. Here Andrés Manuel was born, and here he has been buried."

César Yáñez, a spokesman for Mr. López Obrador, said such political obituaries were premature. Mr. López Obrador still plans to hold a faux inauguration on Nov. 21 and then tour the country as an alternative president, he said.

Daniel Lund, a pollster and political analyst, said the loss owed more to Mr. Ojeda's weakness as a candidate and to the low turnout than to Mr. López Obrador's fall from favor.

There have been other signs of cracks in the support for Mr. López Obrador. The party's founder, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, has repudiated him, and its four governors have refused his request not to recognize Mr. Calderón as president.

Most politicians and strategists here still expect some kind of mass protest from Mr. López Obrador's supporters in December, and a steady drumbeat of criticism in the future. But few now predict that Mr. Calderón will be unable to take office or govern.

"From my point of view, the protests that the deputies and senators of the P.R.D. carry out will be more symbolic than real," said Jaime Sánchez Susarrey, a conservative columnist.

State Race Signals Big Defeat For Mexican Leftist (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY

Andrés Manuel López Obrador jolted Mexico City when he moved protesters to close down main streets in the wake of the nation's disputed July 2 presidential election. The dissent reached its peak when supporters named the defeated leftist president of a "parallel government" at a mass demonstration this fall.

But a month later, his supporters have packed up their tents, traffic is flowing, and many are wondering if his protest movement - which emerged amid allegations of massive electoral fraud - is now losing steam.

This weekend, a gubernatorial race in Tabasco - which voted heavily for Mr. Obrador, a native of the southern state - ended in defeat for the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) candidate, despite Obrador having campaigned hard for his fellow party member. The loss is being viewed as a referendum on the future of Obrador's national protest movement.

DOJ_NMG_0082425

"This is a reflection of his losing track with voters," says Rafael Fernandez de Castro, dean of international affairs at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico. "The consequences are not going to be very good for [Obrador] or his movement."

The July 2006 presidential election was the closest in the nation's history, with the two main candidates split by half a percentage point. In September, after a lengthy and tense court review and partial recount, electoral officials finally certified Felipe Calderón, of President Vicente Fox's conservative National Action Party (PAN), as the official president-elect. Parallel government?

Leading up to the certification, Obrador and his supporters, who halted downtown traffic for seven weeks, pledged never to accept Calderón as president. Calling him a "usurper," they voted last month to establish their own government, causing columnists to question the stability of the country.

But these days even Obrador's supporters doubt that his parallel movement will amount to much. Although Mario Gutierrez, a valet in Mexico City, says he believes in Obrador's ideals and voted for him in the election, he also believes the movement is petering out. "It's a lost cause," he says. "They aren't going to gain anything."

Asked whether he believes a parallel government will be effective in helping the nation's poor, he says matter-of-factly: "I don't think there will be a parallel government."

Indeed, the defeat in Tabasco state could hinder efforts to forge a national movement. Obrador won 56 percent of the presidential vote in Tabasco, and spent recent weeks with PRD candidate César Raúl Ojeda. When the Monitor went to press, 94 percent of the votes had been counted and Andrés Granier, of the long-ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) had 53 percent of the vote compared with 42.8 percent for Ojeda, making it statistically impossible for Ojeda to win. Ojeda alleges fraud and is threatening to challenge the results.

Obrador himself seemed to anticipate a loss ahead of the elections by telling reporters: "If the PRI wins Tabasco, then our adversaries will laugh at us and say that we even lose in our own land."

Obrador spokesperson César Yañez disputes the fact that a defeat in Tabasco spells trouble for the movement. "Its success does not depend on a state election," he says, "no matter what state it is."

But some say Obrador's protests after the presidential vote this summer may have hurt Ojeda's chances, and could deter others from linking themselves to his movement. "It will make some of the PRD leaders start distancing themselves from [Obrador]," says Mr. Fernandez de Castro.

Mr. Gutierrez says he believes Obrador's barricades in Mexico City backfired. This sentiment is backed by polls, such as one in the newspaper Reforma this summer that showed that if the election had occurred in the midst of Obrador's mass sit-ins, Calderón would have won the race easily.

According to the Associated Press, Oscar Luis Rodriguez, a founding member of the PRD in Villahermosa, the capital of Tabasco, told the local daily El Sol de Tabasco: "[Obrador] has lost credibility. He has lost respect. Here [he] was born, and here he has been buried."

There will be a second tally of the vote Wednesday, standard procedure in Mexico, which could change results, but for most here, the writing is on the wall.

"The PRD's loss in Lopez Obrador's home state clearly undermines his public image and will make some in the party more likely to challenge him on specific issues, says Andrew Selee, director of the Mexico Institute at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington, D.C., "but it is far too early to discount [Obrador] as a significant political force in Mexico." Some supporters remain hopeful

Indeed many PRD members say the movement will survive. "The movement can't be over because of an election loss; it will prevail because of the reality of inequality in the country," says Juan Vazquez Patilla, the sub-secretary for social movements within the PRD at his family taco stand in Mexico City over the weekend. "Those who say it's now dead are the same people who don't want change."

But specific plans of what Obrador hopes to accomplish as a parallel president remain uncertain, and Mexico City residents out on a Sunday afternoon, say they have no idea what to expect.

Mr. Yañez says Obrador will begin a national tour next month, not "to show muscle," but to inform the country of his plans ahead of November 20, when he is to be inaugurated as the "legitimate" president-elect of the country. That will be his movement's next big test.

Then comes the official inauguration of Calderón on Dec. 1, which PRD members, like Vazquez Patilla, have promised to protest.

Tabasco Defeat Deals Setback To Lopez Obrador (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez

DOJ_NMG_0082426

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The defeat of the gubernatorial candidate handpicked by leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador to run in his home state of Tabasco has dealt a serious blow to Lopez Obrador's emerging opposition movement.

After spending a month stumping for candidates, Lopez Obrador, who lost the recent Mexican presidential election by less than a percentage point, saw his Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, trounced in Sunday's election.

Gubernatorial candidate Cesar Raul Ojeda was beaten by 10 percentage points, according to preliminary results, and the PRD gave up five of its 11 mayoral offices.

Just as with the presidential election, Ojeda and the PRD are expected to file legal challenges to Sunday's results.

Lopez Obrador had campaigned with Ojeda, promising that an Ojeda victory would also be a victory for Lopez Obrador and his campaign to raise up Mexico's poor.

Lopez Obrador supporters warned against putting too much stock in the Tabasco results because Ojeda had lost two previous races for governor.

Ojeda won about 43% of Sunday's vote against Andres Granier of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. Granier, a biochemist by training and a popular former mayor of the state capital, said voters could expect only trouble from Lopez Obrador and his movement.

Lopez Obrador broke into national politics after losing a controversial 1994 Tabasco governor's race, and Sunday's election appears to be another turning point. But rather than a career springboard, this one appeared closer to a bookend.

After gaining notoriety for his protests against cheating in the 1994 race, Lopez Obrador made his greatest political advances during the late 1990s with a string of election victories while serving as the PRD's national president. In 2000, he was elected mayor of Mexico City before stepping down last year to run for president of Mexico.

Mexico City Mayor Alejandro Encinas, a close ally of Lopez Obrador, said Monday that the party needed to reexamine its electoral strategy.

The idea that Tabasco's gubernatorial election would be a referendum on Lopez Obrador took root early among political analysts and newspaper columnists. For one thing, it came only weeks after the electoral court dismissed PRD allegations that President-elect Felipe Calderon won by fraud.

Lopez Obrador himself took the message center stage.

"They robbed us of our victory, but your support will not be in vain," he said during a campaign appearance last week. "The movement continues … if it fractures, there will be no more hope for millions of Mexicans."

Ojeda had joined Lopez Obrador's postelection protests this summer, and he had also denounced Calderon's victory. Granier, on the other hand, said he could work with Calderon of the National Action Party.

Lopez Obrador and Ojeda had hoped to boost voter turnout in Tabasco with their joint appearances. Instead, turnout fell 8 percentage points from the July 2 presidential election, in which 56% of Tabasco voters cast ballots for Lopez Obrador.

Ojeda alleges that Granier received illegal state government help and tried to buy votes with money and giveaways. Ojeda won a similar challenge in the 2000 election, and an elections tribunal ordered a new election in 2001, which he also lost.

Ojeda had worked on the Lopez Obrador presidential campaign, which was built on the idea that Mexico's decade-long embrace of the free market had paid off for the wealthy and well-educated, but left half the country in poverty and lousy jobs.

While still polling strongly among the poor and working-class, Lopez Obrador began to bleed support from left-leaning middle- and upper-class voters when his postelection protests closed capital streets and disrupted thousands of businesses over the summer.

Lingering civil unrest in Oaxaca by striking teachers and their leftist supporters may also have frightened some people who generally agree with Lopez Obrador, according to interviews with voters last week in Tabasco.

Ojeda's victory would have avenged Lopez Obrador's 1994 gubernatorial loss to Roberto Madrazo, whose PRI campaign illegally overspent millions of dollars, according to evidence later delivered to Lopez Obrador and federal authorities.

Instead, Sunday's election was an embarrassing defeat that could not come at a worse time for Lopez Obrador. He's planning an event in the capital next month to install himself as the country's "legitimate" president. Rather than a crowning moment for his movement, the ceremony now risks ridicule.

"He can still fill a plaza, but with increasingly desperate companions," said Benito Nacif, a political analyst at Mexico's Center for Economic Research.

In Colombia, A Dubious Disarmament (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Demobilized Paramilitaries Are Sidestepping Justice, Critics and Victims Say

DOJ_NMG_0082427

BARRANCABERMEJA, Colombia -- In the midst of a relentless conflict, Colombia's government and its ally, the Bush administration, are hailing the demobilization of 32,000 fighters from right-wing paramilitary groups -- a disarmament that authorities here say is larger than any of those that closed out Central America's civil wars in the 1990s.

But another, far more critical picture of the disarmament has emerged in recent months, drawn from the accounts of rights groups, victims of Colombia's murky, drug-fueled conflict, and even a report from the Attorney General's Office. Paramilitary commanders, according to these accounts, have killed hundreds of people in violation of a cease-fire, trafficked cocaine and stolen millions of dollars from state institutions they had infiltrated.

A handful of lawmakers on Capitol Hill have also voiced concerns about the disarmament, which is partly funded by the United States.

"The demobilization process has been as much about avoiding justice and consolidating ill-gotten gains as it has been about disarming the paramilitaries," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the ranking member of the subcommittee on foreign operations. "The government needs to stop appeasing the leaders of these outlaw militias and listen more to their victims."

Critics acknowledge that the disarmament has yielded benefits. It has removed a loose confederation of paramilitary militias from a 42-year-old war, leaving the state facing one powerful Marxist rebel organization and a second, much weaker guerrilla group. It has also lowered Colombia's homicide rate, officials here say, and given President Alvaro Uribe's government leverage in its efforts to prod the guerrillas to the negotiating table.

Now, two months after the last paramilitary fighter laid down his weapon in a carefully choreographed ceremony, Colombian officials are pledging to conduct exhaustive investigations of paramilitary atrocities and launch trials of the militias' most bloodthirsty commanders. They say the proceedings will bring justice and recompense for thousands of families who lost relatives or land to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, known by its Spanish initials, AUC.

But in communities hit hard by paramilitary violence, including this grimy, oil-refining city in northern Colombia, victims are incredulous about the government's lofty claims. Once fearful that speaking out could get them killed, they are increasingly organized and assertive. And they are sharply criticizing a process that they say is tilted more toward whitewashing crimes than punishing perpetrators.

"The victims haven't had a voice," said Jaime PeÃ±a, whose son, Jaime Yesid, 16, was killed by paramilitaries during a 1998 massacre here. "How can there be reparations and reconciliation if we don't know the truth and if there isn't any justice?"

Across Colombia, victims and rights groups have been shaken by revelations in the press about paramilitary-related outrages, from wealthy commanders patronizing elegant stores in shopping malls to disclosures of paramilitary ties to Colombia's Congress.

In the latest scandal, one of the more powerful paramilitary commanders, Rodrigo Tovar, recruited peasants to play the part of paramilitary fighters in demobilization ceremonies, according to a 29-page internal investigative report by the Attorney General's Office. The report, based on records that were kept in Tovar's computer and that detailed crimes committed by his paramilitary unit, was first disclosed in El Tiempo, the country's leading newspaper.

According to its findings, a special bank account was set up to disburse money to unemployed peasants so they could "pass themselves off as militiamen, the more the better."

Tovar, the report continues, "gives instructions so that they are ready for demobilization day, that they know how to march, sing the hymn [of the AUC] and respond to prosecutors' questions." At the same time, Tovar ordered underlings to make sure some bands of fighters remain armed to guard "vulnerable zones."

Tovar's hit men killed 558 people in one coastal province, Atlantico, at the same time he was participating in disarmament negotiations, according to the report. The victims included shopkeepers who failed to deliver extortion payments, leftist activists, common criminals and even a university professor. The report says that "men, women, children and passersby from all social and professional levels have become victimized."

Tovar kept detailed records of cocaine shipments to the United States and Europe, the Attorney General's Office said. The office's report also recounted how rogue police units took payoffs to permit cocaine deliveries and how Tovar helped senators and congressmen close to him win reelection.

In this city in a key region of the mighty Magdalena River, paramilitary fighters entered with fury in 2000, rooting out guerrillas and killing their supporters. Caught in the crossfire were villagers and the residents of Barrancabermeja, where lush neighborhoods filled with fruit trees and tropical birds sprawl over the hillsides.

In a massacre here in 1998, paramilitaries kidnapped 32 people at gunpoint. Twenty-five disappeared, and seven were later found dead. PeÃ±a still chokes up as he recalls how he looked out his window to see two gunmen abducting his son.

A neighbor, Luz Almanza, tears up as she recounts how her husband, Ricky Nelson GarcÃ-a, was also led away for good that night. Luz Marina LÃ³pez, a shop owner, can barely keep her composure when she tells how her 20-year-old twins, a son and a daughter, were killed in the same incident.

All that the victims' relatives ever learned was that the paramilitaries suspected the neighborhood of close ties to the guerrillas.

"What I want from the state is to know what happened to these people," Almanza said. "What we want is for them to tell us the truth."

Under the government's Justice and Peace Law, approved by Congress last year, generous benefits were granted to commanders accused of atrocities in exchange for disarming units of fighters. The government also announced that those who participated in the process would not be extradited to the United States on drug-trafficking charges -- the paramilitary commanders' greatest fear.

In the face of international outrage, Colombia's highest court struck down some provisions in May and made the terms more stringent. Most of the commanders, including Tovar, also turned themselves in and are now housed in a spacious facility in Antioquia province.

Under the revised law, commanders must pay reparations to victims out of both their legal and ill-gotten gains. And they must confess to their crimes -- losing benefits if prosecutors later determine that they lied or omitted information.

"What we want is that there be a recognition of the victims' right to truth, to justice and reparation," said Eduardo Pizarro, who heads the government's reparations commission. "And to guarantee that it won't happen again."

Still, the law shields the commanders from serving time in prison, and they remain protected from extradition.

Though officials in Uribe's government pledge to come down hard on commanders, the state appears ill-prepared to follow through, said Sergio Jaramillo, director of the Ideas for Peace analysis group in Bogota. There are only 20 prosecutors to investigate 2,695 paramilitary commanders who are believed to have committed atrocities.

Asked about the capacity of his office to investigate, Mario IguarÃ¡n, the attorney general, said in an interview: "You'd have to say it's not sufficient. The Justice and Peace Law did not create positions for prosecutors."

The sheer complexity of the cases helps paramilitary commanders not only to sidestep criminal investigators but to shield their properties. The commanders have already claimed that they own far less than authorities believe they do. Determining the truth is a formidable task, since the properties they own are registered under third parties' names.

Though there are no exact figures, government officials have calculated that Colombian paramilitaries and drug traffickers control a swath of territory three times the size of New Jersey.

"The government has no clue about what these guys own, how they've operated for all these years, who's supported them, where their assets are, and it hasn't really set up an effective system to figure that out," said Maria McFarland, who tracks Colombia for New York-based Human Rights Watch.

In Barrancabermeja, groups such as the Popular Women's Organization, which runs soup kitchens and works on human rights issues, have no illusions about what the process with the paramilitaries will deliver.

Paramilitaries have slain three members of the group, including one this year, and its president, Yolanda Becerra, said that threats continue. Becerra, a slight woman who races around town meeting with members, said her group is still poised to lead protests and lobby for a tough approach to the paramilitaries.

"We're doing what we've always done -- maintain a hope for a new country," she said. "A people can save themselves when they're united."

Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China (NYT)

By David Barboza And Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

SHANGHAI, Tuesday, Oct. 17 — Wal-Mart Stores, the largest retailer in the United States, is laying the groundwork to become the biggest foreign chain in China with the $1 billion purchase of a major retailer here, according to people briefed on the deal.

The move represents a large step for Wal-Mart's strategy in China, allowing the American retailer to more than double its presence in a country that, despite its size and growing middle class, remains largely untapped by foreign retailers.

Though the size of the acquisition — of a Taiwanese-owned supermarket chain called Trust-Mart — may be modest for Wal-Mart, it is a critical one because the Chinese market is becoming much more pivotal in the retailer's overall international strategy. For Wal-Mart, China represents an opportunity to tap a vast and fast-growing market abroad at a time when the company's sales are lagging elsewhere and it has run into obstacles to expansion at home.

"China is the only country in the world that offers Wal-Mart the chance to replicate what they have accomplished in the U.S.," said Bill Dreher, an analyst at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Wal-Mart expects to close the deal for Trust-Mart by the end of the year, but it still needs approval by Chinese authorities, according to a person briefed on the transaction.

DOJ_NMG_0082429

The acquisition is likely to trigger an intense battle among foreign and domestic retailers to gain a strong foothold in the world's fastest-growing economy.

The deal puts Wal-Mart neck-and-neck in China with Carrefour, the giant French retailer, which also bid for Trust-Mart. Wal-Mart, which has only 66 stores in China compared with Carrefour's more than 200, outbid not only Carrefour, but also Tesco of Britain and one of China's large retailers, Lianhua.

The purchase also highlights the staggering reach of the $300 billion Wal-Mart empire. The company started in rural Arkansas 45 years ago and has become the largest foreign retailer in Mexico and Canada. In numerous other foreign markets, however, Wal-Mart has been stymied, pulling out of Germany and South Korea, or has met strong challenges, as in Japan, where it has struggled to gain a share of the market.

By acquiring Trust-Mart, Wal-Mart will not only be able to match Carrefour, but also to compete with much bigger Chinese retailers, like China Resources and the Shanghai Brilliance Group, which are the country's largest retailers with more than $3 billion in sales and more than 8,000 stores combined.

Trust-Mart has more than 100 stores with 30,000 employees in more than 20 Chinese provinces, but it operates mainly at the low end of the supermarket chains. One challenge for Wal-Mart will to determine where it will position itself in the retailing market.

China's economy is expanding at a rate of 10 percent to 11 percent a year, making it by far the world's fastest-growing major economy. Retail sales are even more robust, jumping by about 15 percent a year for the last several years.

Big retailers are fairly new in China, which for decades has been dominated by small regional chains. Indeed, China has no dominant national players in the retail market, which is why Wal-Mart and other international retailers are battling aggressively to expand there.

"China's a very fragmented market and very diverse," says George Svinos, head of Asia Pacific retail at KPMG's office in Australia. "So in order to get any penetration into that market you'd need to make a big move."

China, however, is a tricky market for American retailers. Chinese consumers spend less than Americans when they go into stores, but they shop more frequently.

The average Chinese shopper spends about $4 at Wal-Mart, compared with $20 for the average American, according to Wal-Mart.

But Wal-Mart and other retailers hope to lure the middle-class Chinese, one of the fastest-growing segments of the population. Already, middle-class shoppers crowd into Carrefour, Wal-Mart and Ikea.

Other retailers, like Toys "R" Us, Home Depot and Best Buy, have just announced plans to open outlets in China.

The government has opened its retail market to foreigners, but at the same time, it has also encouraged Chinese companies to merge. In one example, the Shanghai Bailian Group struck a deal with Dashang, which operates the second-largest chain store group, to create new stores.

Moreover, China's biggest state-owned retailers and a handful of aggressive entrepreneurs are pushing to create national chains, like Beijing-based WuMart and Gome, the country's largest consumer electronics store, which is owned by one of the country's wealthiest men.

Carrefour, which is the largest foreign retailer in China by sales, with more than $2 billion, has been expanding much more aggressively than Wal-Mart. Carrefour plans to open 100 new superstores this year, which will raise its total to more than 300.

Analysts say that Wal-Mart's expansion has stepped up only in recent years. Up until now, they say, the retailer has not had great advantages over its bigger competitors. It has had high costs in China because systems for purchasing, transportation and distribution are clogged and complicated in a country that is still largely inefficient and without a strong national highway grid.

Wal-Mart appeared to smooth the way for expansion in China in July when, for the first time, it allowed employees to form a trade union, the company's first in China. The retailer has long battled unions in the United States, arguing they will make the company less efficient.

In the United States, where Wal-Mart has more than 4,000 mostly suburban stores, its performance has begun to trail that of major competitors, like Target, particularly in sales at stores open at least a year. And Wal-Mart has encountered growing resistance to locating new stores in urban areas.

A Wal-Mart spokeswoman, Beth Keck, declined to comment on the Trust-Mart transaction.

Wal-Mart entered China in 1996 with a supercenter under its own name and a Sam's Club in Shenzhen, near Hong Kong. In a departure from its practice of buying domestic chains with strong local name recognition, Wal-Mart started by building its business in China on its own.

But the pace of Wal-Mart's growth in China has been slow. A decade after arriving, it has just 66 stores, failing to crack the list of the country's top 20 retailers; hence, the move to acquire Trust-Mart.

DOJ_NMG_0082430

Wal-Mart operates stores in 13 countries, including Brazil, Japan, and England, but foreign sales represent just $64 billion, or 20 percent, of its more than $300 billion in annual sales.

In several countries, it has discovered its American formula for success — rock-bottom prices, zealous control of inventory and a wide array of products — simply does not translate.

In Germany, for example, Wal-Mart never established comfortable relations with the powerful unions, which dominate retail in the country. In South Korea, it failed to satisfy the tastes of finicky local consumers.

Thus, in a stinging admission of defeat, Wal-Mart pulled out of Germany and South Korea this year after failing to turn around poor sales.

Wal-Mart, however, remains committed to Japan, where it operates stores under the name Seiyu, despite lackluster performance.

A major obstacle overseas for Wal-Mart has been building a big enough network of stores to compete with local chains and to secure low prices from suppliers. That may explain, in part, why Wal-Mart is eager to grow in China.

Mr. Dreher, of Deutsche Bank, expects Wal-Mart to expand aggressively there. By the year 2010, he predicts the company will have as many as 400 stores in China.

Wal-Mart Closing In On $1bn Deal For China's Trust-Mart (FT)

By James Politi And Lauren Foster

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Wal-Mart appeared close to sealing a $1bn (£539m) acquisition in China last night.

The world's largest retailer emerged as the leading bidder in a year-long auction for Trust-Mart, China's second-largest hypermarket chain. People close to the talks said Wal-Mart had edged out France's Carrefour and local competitors but warned that details remained to be finalised and the deal could collapse..

A purchase of Trust-Mart, which is privately owned byTaiwanese entrepreneurs, would represent one of Wal-Mart's largest recent acquisitions. It highlights how China has become an important battleground for international supermarket chains as its rapid urbanisation and rising living standards create a new consumer class.

Although Wal-Mart recently exited Germany and South Korea, it considers China a priority for its international expansion. It owns 66 stores in China.

Amy Wyatt, a Wal-Mart spokeswoman, called the deal "speculation" and declined to comment. Regulatory approval by China's Ministry of Commerce could delay the acquisition.

Many international retailers have been looking to expand in China to take advantage of the country's rapid economic growth.

Office Depot, the US office products retailer, said last month that it planned to take a controlling stake in AsiaEC, one of China's largest dealers of office supplies and services. This year Best Buy, the US consumer electronics retailer, took a controlling stake in Jiangsu Five Star, a Shanghai-based store chain. Home Depot, the second-largest US retailer, has also been looking for partners in China.

Meanwhile, it was disclosed that Wal-Mart was in talks to buy Koc Holding AS's supermarket chain, Turkey's biggest retailer.

France In Denial (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

We've argued many times that Turkey must come to grips with the crimes of its past and stop prosecuting writers who mention the Armenian genocide of the early 20th century. But we found it as absurd and as cynical when the French National Assembly voted overwhelmingly last week to make it illegal — on pain of a fine and imprisonment — to deny that there was an Armenian genocide.

France's Senate still has a chance to throw out this outrageous bill, and we hope it does. We hope, too, that the Turks do not retaliate with something similarly nutty, like making it a crime to deny French colonial atrocities in Algeria, as some legislators have suggested. Enough damage has already been done.

There is no doubt that the sooner Turks confront their past the better. They are beginning to, in large part because of the lure of membership in the European Union. That does not excuse the way French politicians are trying to exploit anti-Turkish feelings while playing up to the large Armenian-French constituency.

There are a lot of reasons why this is wrong. It could further fan anti-Muslim feelings in France, and we've already seen the potential for a violent backlash. It is also a blow to freedom of expression — not exactly the standard that E.U. members want to set while they lecture the Turks about being more respectful of human rights and democratic norms.

DOJ_NMG_0082431

Yes, France is one of a dozen European countries that have laws against denying the Holocaust. There is an argument that they, too, violate freedom of expression. But those laws at least are based on the threat posed by die-hard anti-Semites who still subscribe to Hitler's racist theories. The Armenian question poses no dangers in France. Playing politics with it trivializes not only the Holocaust, but also the Armenian genocide.

DOJ_NMG_0082432

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, October 18, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, October 18, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061018.pdf; agnb061018.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Signs Terror Detainee Bill Into Law 3
Federal Investigators Want To Interview Richard Reid 5

Homeland Response:

GAO Says DHS Plan To Deploy Nuclear Detection Equipment Can't Be Justified 5
Group Sues For Information On Profiling Of Arabs 5
TSA Considering Machines To Screen For Liquid Explosives 6
LAPD's Bratton Opposes Calls For MI5-Style US Agency 6
Judge Rejects NYC Effort To Dismiss Ground Zero Lawsuits ..6

War News:

Bush Makes Case For "Promoting Liberty" To Fight Terrorism 6
NATO Commander In Afghanistan Admits 2001-02 Strategic Mistakes 7
State-DOD Turf Battles May Have Hindered Initial US Response To Iraq Insurgency 7
Bush Administration Reportedly Pressuring Maliki To Issue Broad Amnesty 8
McCain Claims US Still Has "Capacity To Win" In Iraq 8
Kerry Alleges Bush Made "Gigantic Blunder" Committing US Troops Indefinitely 8
Thirty-Six Deaths Reported On "Relatively Calm" Day In Iraq ...8
US Troops Assist Iraqi Forces In Balad 8
Iraqi Interior Ministry Denies Two Officers' Transfer Is Due To Militia Purge 9
Methodology Of Survey Claiming 655,000 Iraqi Deaths Disputed 10
Friedman Likens Current Iraq Fighting To Tet Offensive 10
Military Honors Seen As Evolving To Reflect Changing Front 10
WPost Likens Somalia To Afghanistan In 1990s 10

DOJ:

Writer Expresses Concern About Taylor As DC US Attorney ..10
DOJ Among Department Missing Senator's Deadline For IT Projects List 11
DOJ Task Force Will Examine Privacy Issues 11

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Vacates Lay Conviction 12
UnitedHealth Options Practices May Lead To Federal Charges 12
Board Issues Guidance On Auditing Value Of Stock Options 13
NYTimes Supports Justice Department Review Of Buyouts ..14

Criminal Law:

Page Board Examining Trip Kolbe Took In 1996 With Two Pages 14
Trandahl Seen As Key Figure On Foley Scandal 14
Report Says Cunningham Used Intelligence Panel To Aid Contractors 15
Weldon Campaign Suggests Democrats At DOJ Leaked Probe 16
US Charges New York Labor Leader With Racketeering 17
Missouri Mayor Expected To Plead Guilty To Bribery Charges 18
Former GBI Agent Sentenced To Year In Prison For Taking Kickbacks 18
Alleged Pennsylvania Mobster Accused Of Soliciting Murder Of Witness 19
FBI Arrests Florida Man For Making Child Porn With 15-Month-Old Daughter 19
Grand Jury Hands Up Eight Count Indictment To Capitol Intruder 19
Ohio Fundraiser Called Coin Funds An ATM, Former Aide Testifies 19
Mueller Calls For ISP User Tracking 20
Crawford Pleads Guilty To Charges In Stock Case 20
Trial Over Bogus Degrees Delayed 21
Man Pleads Guilty To Three Idaho Slayings 21

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To New Jersey Stock Scam 21
Florida Crime Rate Drops, Except For Murder 22
Federal Judge Again Strikes Missouri's Lethal Injection Procedure 22
Federal Prosecutors Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Insurer Case 22
Man Convicted Of Murder In New York Drunk Driving Case .. 22
DC Mayor Seeks $11 Million To Continue Anti-Crime Measures 23

Civil Law:

DOJ Review Finds Agencies' FOIA Administration Improving 23
Federal Government Won't Pay Death Benefit To Studds' Same-Sex Spouse 23

Civil Rights:

DOJ Probing California Letter On Immigrant Voting 23
Georgia Election Board Approves New Letter To Misinformed Voters 24
FBI Forwards Results Of Arkansas Police Beating Probe To DOJ 24
Study Finds Racial Disparities In Breast Cancer Death Rates 24
Comedian's Mother Claims She Was Discriminated Against At Restaurant 24

Antitrust:

DOJ Gives Antitrust Nod To Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Of Gold Kist 25
Kucinich Wants DOJ Antitrust Probe Of Giant Eagle Ohio Store Purchase 25
SCOTUS To Weigh DOJ's Ability To Renege On Immunity Deals 25
Chicago Mercantile Exchange To Buy Chicago Board Of Trade 26
Tata Steel Seeks To Buy Corus For $8 Billion 26
Eli Lilly Agrees To By Icos Corp 27
Vivendi Sues Two Internet Companies Over Video File Sharing 27
Record Labels See Marketing Opportunity In Music Piracy... 27
GM's Wagoner Called Corporate America's "Comeback Kid." 27

Environment:

Nuclear Plant Security Union Criticizes New DOE Policy..... 28
Studies Find Benefits Of Eating Fish Exceed Risks 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Criticizes FBI Sentinel Staffing Priorities 28
San Francisco Marijuana Dispensary Director Released On $1 Million Bond 28
Illinois Drug Investigation Nets Eighth Guilty Plea 29
Nevada To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana 29
US Anti-Narcotics Official Notes Increasingly Pure Heroin, Warns Of Price Drop 29
IG Report Finds Prisoner Flights Expensive 30
Washington Women Crossed Line From Environmental Activism To Arson 30

Immigration:

White House Wants Congress To Send Border Fence Bill For Bush Signing 30

Tax:

Snipes Indicted For Conspiracy, Tax Fraud 31

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Defense Spending Bill, Details Reservations About Specific Provisions 32
Bush Signs Updated National Space Policy 32
Bush Officials Say Faith-Based Initiative Critic Kuo Got It Wrong 32
SCOTUS Sees Increase In Sealed Filings 33
Bush To Tout NCLB At North Carolina School 33
Reid To Repay Campaign For Condo Staff Tips 34
Lewis Spent $750,000 On Legal Fees 34
Election Angst Boosted Textile Industry Priorities In Congress 34

Other News:

Economic Data Suggest Cooling Economy 35
Gasoline Tax Hike Considered Unlikely Despite Economists' Support 35
Chicago Sued Over Red Light Cameras 36
LATimes Endorses Judges For Reelection 36
Study Finds Widespread Risk Of Reactions To Some Medicines 36
Blue Cross Of California To Settle Lawsuits Over Illegal Cancellations 37
Pirro, Cuomo Clash In Final Debate 37
Both Parties Mulling Impact Of Potential GOP Congressional Loss 37
Rove "Confident" GOP Will Hold Onto Both House, Senate ... 38
GOP Incumbents Running Short On Campaign Funds 39
Flake Says GOP Reliance On Earmarks Leave Majority At Risk 40

DOJ_NMG_0082435

Democratic Ads Link Minimum Wage, Congressional Pay Raises....40
Taxes Seen As GOP Fallback Issue For Midterm Elections....40
NYTimes/CBS Ohio Poll Shows Brown, Strickland Ahead By Double Digits....41
Pro-GOP Ads Said To Distort Truth On Iraq....41
Investigators Probe Whether Beauprez Camp Used Federal Database....42
WPost Endorses Webb In Virginia Senate Race....42
Menendez, Kean Touch On Familiar Themes Of Iraq, Corruption....42
Steele Accuses Hoyer Of Racial Insensitivity....42
Lieberman Says Democrats Must "Change The Tone" In Washington....43
Obama Reportedly Mulling Presidential Run In 2008....43
Laura Bush To Stump For GOP Texas State Senate Candidate....43
Dowd Accuses McCain Of "Dissembling" About Drinking Incident With Clinton....43
WSJournal Says Organized Labor Is Behind Anti-Wal-Mart Campaign....44
NYTimes Praises Disney Effort To Promote Healthy Food Choices To Kids....44
Rice Heads To Asia Amid Talk Of Possible Second North Korean Test....44
Envoy Rejects Linkage Of Iran's Nuclear Program With North Korea's....45
Bush Boosts Croatia Bid For NATO Membership....45
Abbas Threatens To Dissolve Hamas Government....45
Blair Calls Veils A "Mark Of Separation."....46
Stalemate Continues Between Venezuela And Guatemala In Bid For Security Council Seat....46
Increasing French Fertility Rates Linked To Government Spending....47
NYTimes Urges UN Rights Monitors For Sri Lanka....47
WSJournal Warns Investors China Bank IPO May Not Be As Safe As Expected....47

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages....47

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington....48

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Signs Terror Detainee Bill Into Law. The CBS Evening News (10/17, story 3, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush today got one of the weapons he wanted for the war on terror. He signed that detainee bill. The new law sets the rules for interrogating and trying foreign terror suspects, and it could pave the way for Kahlid Sheikh Mohammed and other accused 9/11 plotters to be tried by military tribunals." NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 2, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) said that "while the new law was being signed, about a dozen or so protesters were being arrested, some of them wearing prison-style suits to look like terror detainees."

ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "At today's signing, the President…described the legislation as one of the most important tools in fighting the war on terror." Bush was shown saying, "It allows for the clarity our intelligence professionals need to continue questioning terrorists and saving lives." USA Today (10/18, 2.27M), meanwhile, reports Bush also said "interrogations have yielded valuable information that has helped prevent terror attacks." Said the President, "It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives." The American Civil Liberties Union, however, called the bill "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history."

Some media reports portray the signing ceremony as part of a Republican PR effort geared toward the upcoming elections. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, A1, Schmitt, Barnes, 918K), for example, says "the new law…became both part of the administration's final campaign push to preserve its congressional majority in the midterm election." The enactment of the law "was good news for Bush as casualties have mounted in Iraq and his handling of the war on terror has come under intensifying criticism." The signing ceremony "was part political rally for a GOP that is struggling to retain control of Congress three weeks before a pivotal midterm election."

The New York Times (10/18, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "With the midterm elections three weeks away, Mr. Bush hoped to use the bill signing to turn the political debate back to the war on terrorism, a winning issue for Republicans, and away from scandals like the Mark Foley case, which have dominated the news in recent weeks." The President "said he was signing the measure 'in memory of the victims of September the 11th.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082436

The AP (10/18, Pickler) reports, "Bush has been criticizing Democrats who voted against the law, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, during campaign appearances around the country. He has suggested that votes against the law show that Democrats would not protect the country from another terrorist attack." Republican House leaders, "in a tough battle to maintain their majority, echoed those criticisms Tuesday in an attempt to get some political points out of the legislation they supported. 'The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives,' House Speaker Dennis Hastert said."

In an interview that aired on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor last night (10, 17, O'Reilly), Bush said, "The intelligence community believes strongly that the information we got from the detainee questioning program yielded information that made America safer, that we stopped attacks. Secondly the courts -- I believe it is necessary to have military tribunals because I ultimately want these people to be tried. And it took a while to get these tribunals in place. The Supreme Court ruled that the president didn't have the authority to set up these courts on his own, that he needed to work with congress to do so and we did. What is interesting about these votes that took place in the Congress is the number of Democrats that opposed questioning people we picked up on the battlefield. And I think that is an issue that they are going to have to explain to the American people." Bush was also asked why he thinks the criticism of his stance regarding the handling detainees has been "so fierce," Bush responded, "I don't know. … As you know we picked up a fellow named Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Intelligence folks believe, or suspect, that he was the person that masterminded the 9/11 attacks. I want to know what he knew in order to prevent another attack. Now maybe there are some in this country that say they are not coming again and therefore all this is unnecessary. I believe they are coming again and I believe it is the responsibility of the federal government to protect our people."

Later in his interview on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly), Bush said that although he would "never…question anyone's patriotism" he thinks "the American people got a choice to make this November. And I believe that the choice is stark and clear. I believe that my party and our candidates…will be better positioned to put policies in place that will enable us to protect the American people from attack."

The Washington Times (10/18, Dinan, 88K) notes the bill "passed the House by a 250-170 vote and the Senate by a vote of 65-34. In both chambers, most Republicans voted in favor and most Democrats against." However, said ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M), "there were only a few Democrats that released statements critical of the bill. One of them, Senator Russell Feingold saying, 'We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history.'" Another Democrat who spoke up against the bill was Rep. Charles Rangel. Asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly) why he voted against the bill, Rangel answered, "There's no question in my mind not only is it unconstitutional, but it was brought up on the eve of the election to give some type of feeling that Republicans were tough on terrorism. … It may sound corny, but I swear that I love it country so much it would just seem to me that we should have those principles that involve habeas corpus. Whether you call them combatants or prosecutors of war, the standard should be not set by the president but the standard should be set either by the Geneva Convention" or the "the Military Code of Justice."

The Washington Post (10/18, A4, Fletcher, 748K) quotes Democratic Sen. Pat Leahy saying, "It is a sad day when the rubber-stamp Congress undercuts our freedoms, assaults our Constitution and lets the terrorists achieve something they could never win on the battlefield." Congressional Republicans, meanwhile, "immediately seized on the new law, which was opposed by most Democratic lawmakers, as evidence of their commitment to protect the country against terrorist attacks." House Majority Leader John Boehner said, "Capitol Hill Democrats have yet to offer any solutions or formulate any serious national security policy on how to keep America safe in a post-9/11 world."

A number of stories also suggest portions of the bill will not survive the legal challenges ahead. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Savage, 918K) reports that while debate on the military tribunals bill signed by…Bush focused on trials at Guantanamo Bay, "the new law also takes away from noncitizens in the U.S. — including more than 12 million permanent residents — the right to go to court if they are declared 'unlawful enemy combatants.' No one has suggested that the Bush administration plans to use its newly won power to round up large numbers of immigrants. But before Tuesday, the principle of habeas corpus meant that anyone thrown into jail in the US had a right to ask a judge for a hearing. They also had a right to go free if the government could not show a legal basis for holding them. … Many legal scholars predict the law's partial repeal of habeas corpus will be struck down as unconstitutional."

DOJ_NMG_0082437

ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said "legal experts say huge questions about the law still remain. Central to it all, interrogations." Eugene Fidell, National Institute of Military Justice: "This legislation doesn't say what you can do. What it says is you can't torture. But the Administration may have a different view of what torture is that you or I might have." Raddatz: "And it is, indeed, up to the President to interpret what constitutes torture." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "The government will not give you precise techniques." Raddtaz: "The language is so vague, say some lawyers, you could drive a truck through it. Others say, it's just wrong."

McClatchy (10/18, Hutcheson) reports, "The Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed two challenges to the law on behalf of detainees, said it would fight the changes 'at every turn, using every tool at our disposal, until we reverse this affront to the rule of law.'" Legal experts" said the anticipated court battles make it unlikely that any of the roughly 435 detainees at the US naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, would face trial before a military commission anytime soon."

Bloomberg (10/18, Runningen) reports, "Shortly after Bush signed the measure, the Justice Department sent a letter to a U.S. appeals court in Washington saying the new law strips hundreds of other Guantanamo detainees of their right to a court hearing to challenge their confinement. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit is considering whether to dismiss the suits by detainees who haven't been charged with war crimes. … In addition to setting up military commissions to try suspected terrorists, the law gives the president wide latitude to interpret the Geneva Conventions in deciding what interrogation techniques would be permissible."

Federal Investigators Want To Interview Richard Reid. Federal investigators told a judge yesterday that they want to interview attempted show bomber Richard Reid because he likely has important information about terrorist activities. The AP (10/18) reports, "Prosecutors said in US District Court they don't believe Reid is entitled to a public defender now that his criminal case is over. … Assistant U.S. Attorney James Farmer said investigators want to talk to Reid without an attorney present to develop a 'personal rapport,' which would be difficult to do with an attorney or any third party in the room." The AP adds, "US District Judge William Young said he would keep in place the orders continuing Reid's representation by public defenders, noting that under those orders, the government can contact Reid only after giving notice to his lawyers and having them present for any interviews with him."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Says DHS Plan To Deploy Nuclear Detection Equipment Can't Be Justified. The Washington Post (10/18, A12, Hsu, 748K) reports, "The Department of Homeland Security's plan to spend $1.2 billion deploying next-generation nuclear-detection equipment at US ports and border crossings cannot be justified, given test results that showed the devices are unreliable, congressional investigators warned yesterday." According to the GAO, DHS "ignored its own tests showing the new monitors could not meet a standard of detecting enriched uranium 95 percent of the time." DHS "also understated the project's costs by up to $181 million, GAO officials wrote to the leaders of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees. The department's cost-benefit 'analysis does not justify its recent decision to spend $1.2 billion to purchase and deploy" the new radiation portal monitors, the GAO reported. Homeland Security "relied on potential future performance to justify the purchase,' the agency said."

Group Sues For Information On Profiling Of Arabs. The New York Times (10/18, MacFarquhar, 1.21M) reports that a civil rights group filed a suit yesterday against the Homeland Security Department and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement in an effort "to establish whether the government is using prohibited profiling methods against Arab-Americans and Muslims." The suit, by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, "asked the Federal District Court in the District of Columbia to compel the immigration agency under the Freedom of Information Act to release the nationalities of 237 people arrested for immigration violations in October 2004." The Times adds,

DOJ_NMG_0082438

"Arab-Americans and American Muslims have widespread suspicions that the spotlight is focused on them regarding accusations of terrorism, particularly around any election season, to spread concern among other voters and to intimidate them from speaking out."

The AP (10/18, Takruri) reports, "The Washington-based group believes the operation improperly used the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System - a government database created after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorists attacks to track visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries - to profile Arab and Muslim visitors to the United States. The domestic registration system required males from 24 Arab and predominantly Muslim countries and North Korea to register with immigration authorities. The registration requirement has since been phased out, but the database of information still exists. …. The 2004 operation became known as the 'October plan' after the FBI sent an e-mail advising its field offices and Homeland Security agencies of 'extraordinary measures' from the first week of October 2004 through the presidential inauguration."

TSA Considering Machines To Screen For Liquid Explosives. USA Today (10/18, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports that "in a potential strategy shift," Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley says the agency "may screen carry-on bags with new three-dimensional X-ray machines that are better at spotting liquid explosives, guns and other weapons." Hawley said the machines are "a step beyond where we are today." The technology "would improve security and could ease the liquid restrictions" that have been in place since August, according to aviation consultant Richard Roth. At issue is whether the TSA will "buy upgraded X-ray machines for $75,000 to $200,000 each or…wait possibly two years for better machines costing about $400,000. The TSA had planned to wait for the more expensive machines, which have the highest level of explosives detection. But, Hawley said, 'if it's going to be two years, maybe it makes sense economically and security-wise to put an intermediate step in between.'"

LAPD's Bratton Opposes Calls For MI5-Style US Agency. In a Washington Post (10/18, 748K) op-ed titled "We Don't Need Our Own MI5," LAPD Chief William J. Bratton recounts the 2005 arrests of suspected terrorists in Torrance, Calif., and notes, "my efforts were linked seamlessly with the Los Angeles office of the FBI and its Joint Terrorism Task Force and Field Intelligence Group. This is the new normal." Bratton adds that supporters of creating a new US counter-terrorism agency argue "that the 'FBI culture' is that of a criminal investigative agency driven to make arrests and bring prosecutions and that the bureau does not have the instinct to draw back and look at the wider picture as a purely intelligence-driven agency might. I disagree. … America's police departments have achieved a higher level of synergy with the FBI on intelligence and investigations than at any other time in history. If it's not broken, let's not try to fix it."

Judge Rejects NYC Effort To Dismiss Ground Zero Lawsuits. The New York Times (10/18, DePalma, 1.21M) reports that a federal judge has rejected New York City's claim "that it is protected by law from being sued over the way it handled rescue and recovery operations at ground zero. The ruling opens the way for lawsuits by thousands of workers who say they were made sick by exposure to toxic substances during the 10-month cleanup. Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of United States District Court in Manhattan rejected the city's motion to dismiss the lawsuits. In a 99-page decision released yesterday afternoon, he stated that state and federal statutes do provide some immunity for the city, its private contractors and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey for actions undertaken in response to an enemy attack. However, the judge said that protection is not universal and varies by time and place, making it necessary to hear the details of individual cases."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Makes Case For "Promoting Liberty" To Fight Terrorism. After discussing the persistence of the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly), President Bush described, at length, his view of the "big ideological debate of the 21st century," which he said is "extremists, Islamo-fascists…radicals aiming to topple modern people. It is a massive challenge for the free world and for Muslims who…want to leave in peace. By far the vast majority of people want to have a peaceful existence." Bush added, "The biggest issue that we face is how do you protect yourself and our strategy is twofold. One is get on the offense and stay on the offense and bring them to justice. Secondly, defeat their ideology by helping moderate people, particularly in the middle-east, to come up with competing systems that speak to people's hopes and aspirations. And I have been widely criticized for promoting liberty but I believe it works as an antidote to the dark visions of these radicals. And I know this, that [if] the United States becomes isolationist and pulls out, a generation of those people will say 'they lost their way. They forgot what caused America to be created in the first place. They lost their faith in liberty.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082439

Bush Defends Musharraf. During his interview with Bill O'Reilly on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17), Bush was asked why Pakistan's President Musharraf can't "wipe out" the Taliban in Pakistan. President Bush replied that he had "a very good discussion with President Musharraf and President Karzai at the same dinner table and…we discussed how we deal with Taliban leaders who may be hiding in Pakistan and the answer is good intelligence sharing and President Musharraf made the commitment that on good actionable intelligence that he will take care of the leaders of the Taliban." Bush added that Musharraf "has already done a lot" and "has been very effective on al Qaeda. … He understands it doesn't do his country any good to have extremists and radicals fomenting violence, whether it be inside Pakistan or outside Pakistan."

Gingrich Praises Bush's Performance In O'Reilly Interview. On Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17), Bill O'Reilly asked Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to critique Bush's appearance. Gingrich responded, "I don't remember very often seeing the President as comfortable and as engaged as he was. I think he got stronger the more he talked with you. And I'm looking forward to tomorrow night's segment because it seems you managed to get him not with talking points and kinds of speeches but talking from the heart."

NATO Commander In Afghanistan Admits 2001-02 Strategic Mistakes. The AP (10/18, Jelinek) reports, "The U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan failed to follow through as it should have after ousting the Taliban government in 2001, setting the stage for this year's deadly resurgence, the NATO commander in the country said Tuesday. The mistake consisted of adopting 'a peacetime approach' too early, British Gen. David Richards told Pentagon reporters. He said the international community has six months to correct the problem before losing Afghan support, reiterating a warning he issued last week. 'The Taliban were defeated. ... And it looked all pretty hunky-dory,' Richard said of the environment at the end of 2001. 'We thought it was all done ... and didn't treat it as aggressively as ... with the benefit of hindsight, we should have done.'"

The Washington Times (10/18, Scarborough, 88K), in an article titled, "British general faults U.S. for Taliban resurgence," reports Richards "told reporters at the Pentagon that the Taliban was able to regroup because American forces remained somewhat isolated. The Afghan army was not established to the point that it could fill security roles in Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace, and other southern towns. … He said there also was a 'disconnect' in what the U.S.-led humanitarian and reconstruction effort could provide and what the Afghan people expected. 'The Taliban exploited it,' Gen. Richards said. 'They exploited this sense of frustration amongst the people who just didn't see all the good things that have been talked about.'"

UK Troops Exit Pacified Province; 44 Taliban Killed Across Afghanistan. The New York Times/AP (10/18, Press) reports, "British troops pulled out of a once restive district [Musa Qala] in southern Afghanistan on Tuesday after reaching an agreement with tribal elders for Afghan forces to take over security. NATO also announced a new countrywide military operation with Afghan troops intended to maintain pressure on Taliban fighters during the fall and winter and pave the way for long-promised development after the most bitter fighting in five years. Officials said on Tuesday that fighting across Afghanistan had killed 44 suspected Taliban militants." Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, "said the soldiers were leaving because there had not been a major clash in the district in 35 days."

State-DOD Turf Battles May Have Hindered Initial US Response To Iraq Insurgency. PBS' Frontline (10/17), in a harshly critical examination of the Bush Administration's pre-war planning, reports, "The Pentagon had spent more than a year preparing for the war. But it was only eight weeks before the war began that Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld hired a retired Army General to handle postwar Iraq." Ret. Lt. Gen. Jay Garner said, "Everybody was focused on the war. They were focused on regime change. And that took all of their energy. And so, I wasn't a central focus of them at that time, because the spotlight wasn't on me yet." After "Garner arrived at the Pentagon, there was no plan and no staff. And when he began to hire one, he walked into a political buzzsaw." Ambassador Barbara Bodine from the Office of Humanitarian Assistance: "I was very surprised at how bitter and nasty the relations were between State and DoD. It was not one of differing views to serve the President; it was a full-scale war."

DOJ_NMG_0082440

Bush Administration Reportedly Pressuring Maliki To Issue Broad Amnesty. The Financial Times (10/18, Khalaf, Dinmore) reports the Bush administration "is pressing the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki to issue a 'broad' and 'painful' amnesty for insurgents in spite of intense opposition to the proposal from politicians both in Iraq and the US, according to a senior administration official. … The US is advocating more determined moves towards a national reconciliation with the Sunni community that dominates Iraq's insurgency. It also wants a tougher line on the Shia militias. 'You need the government to move forward with a programme – it should include an amnesty in a broad fashion, a comprehensive amnesty proposal,' the senior US official, who asked not to be named, told the Financial Times. The official was not explicit about the terms of the proposed amnesty, but he said: 'No successful amnesty is not painful or sweeping.'"

Senior Sadr Aide Arrested. The New York Times (10/18, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Iraqi and American troops arrested a senior aide to Moktada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric. The aide, whom the military did not name but who was identified by a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, was arrested on suspicion of having directed kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunnis and Shiites, and of attacking Americans. … The arrest of Mr. Sadr's aide, which took place in the early hours of Tuesday, enraged Mr. Sadr's followers, who called for citywide demonstrations on Wednesday. A spokesman for Mr. Sadr identified the man as Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, the head of Mr. Sadr's office in the poor Shiite neighborhood of Shuala."

McCain Claims US Still Has "Capacity To Win" In Iraq. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/18, Schultze, 259K) reports Sen. John McCain "said Tuesday the United States should 'accelerate as much as possible' the Iraqi government's assuming a lead role in the Iraq war and taking over many of the responsibilities handled by American soldiers. … 'The consequences of failure in Iraq are catastrophic,' McCain said during a campaign appearance for state Assembly Speaker John Gard of Peshtigo, the Republican candidate for the 8th Congressional District seat. 'We cannot lose it, and I believe we still have the capacity to win,' said McCain."

Kerry Alleges Bush Made "Gigantic Blunder" Committing US Troops Indefinitely. The AP (10/18, Glover) reports Sen. John Kerry said President Bush "committed 'a gigantic blunder' by giving top Iraqi officials assurances that U.S. forces would remain indefinitely in the war-torn country. Kerry argued that" Bush "should have pressured Iraqi leaders to set aside their differences and focus on making progress in assuming responsibility for security, a move that could lead to a reduction in U.S. troop levels. 'The absence of pressure I find is an enormous blunder that gives the Iraqi politicians a free pass to continue the status quo that most Americans understand is a failure, that's not working,' Kerry said. 'I'm amazed by it.'"

Thirty-Six Deaths Reported On "Relatively Calm" Day In Iraq. ABC World News (10/17, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, a sign of just how difficult things have become. Bombings and shootings killed 36 Iraqis, mostly in Baghdad today. And that made it a relatively calm day, compared to the recent violence."

Four US Soldiers Killed By IED Yesterday. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "four U.S. soldiers were killed Tuesday morning when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, disclosing no further details."

US Troops Assist Iraqi Forces In Balad. ABC World News (10/17, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "North of Baghdad, US forces patrolled the streets of Balad, trying to restore order, after dozens of people were killed in the last few days of sectarian violence." CBS Evening News (10/17, story 2, 1:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "In Balad it was all-out civil war between the country's two main ethnic groups, sparked by the beheading of 19 Shiite laborers in a neighboring Sunni town Friday night. With no US troops present because they turned the town over to Iraqi forces last month, Shiite militiamen were free to hunt down Sunnis to kill. Five days of bloodletting left close to 100 people dead, bodies piled on top of each other filled the local morgue. The incident highlights once again how powerless Iraq security forces are to stop the sectarian violence. … But residents also blamed American forces at this base located right next door to Balad for failing to intervene. US officials said they couldn't act until asked to do so by Iraqi leaders." USA Today/AP (10/18, 7A, Hurst) reports, "Iraq's 4th Army, which took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, had been unable to stem recent bloodshed in Balad."

DOJ_NMG_0082441

McClatchy (10/18, Youssef) report, "American forces began returning to the city Saturday and are patrolling there, though it was unclear Tuesday whether Balad and the surrounding area have been pacified." Balad residents reported the city "and the nearby town of al Dulyiyah remained under the control of armed groups that had targeted the residents and may have killed as many as 100 in four days of violence." The Washington Post (10/18, A16, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) reports, "Police and black-clad Shiite militiamen toting machine guns sealed off the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday, guarding against attacks by Sunni insurgents. … Calm largely returned to Balad by Tuesday." US troops "patrolled the city and guarded one end of a Tigris River bridge that links Balad with Duluiyah. … On the Duluiyah end of the bridge, angry Sunni insurgents gathered in force, clutching their PKC machine guns and rocket launchers, standing their tense watch."

The AP (10/18, Hurst) reports, "As the violence in the Balad region was reaching full pitch on Saturday, the AP asked the U.S. military in Baghdad if American forces were involved in trying to quell the killing. 'As of this time, the (U.S.-led force in Iraq) has not been asked to provide any assistance,' the military said in a return e-mail. … In response to the same question on Monday, the military responded that U.S.-led forces were 'partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad.'" The AP adds, "By late Tuesday, the military had not responded to questions about when the U.S. military first was asked to intervene and how many American forces were involved."

McClatchy (10/18, Youssef) report that "the decision to send American troops into Balad…was another setback for U.S. hopes that Iraqi forces will be able to take control of security for the country. Violence has increased steadily throughout Iraq despite an increase of tens of thousands of American-trained Iraqi soldiers and police, and U.S. officials concede that their strategy of training Iraqi troops to replace Americans hasn't worked."

CBS Evening News (10/17, story 2, 1:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "When asked if this was a setback for Iraqi security forces, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld admitted for the first time that areas turned over to Iraqi control may have to be taken back by US forces who thought their job there was done."

Army Program To Train Iraqis Runs Into Hitches. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A1, Jaffe, 2.03M) reports in a front page 2,771-word article on the problems afflicting US "advisers to the Iraqi army." President Bush "has touted such advisory teams as key to the U.S. strategy for stabilizing Iraq and bringing American troops home," but the program has drawn "scathing" and "biting reviews" from the soldiers who went through it. Army records and "interviews with dozens of advisers show that, thus far, the Army hasn't treated the advisory program as a priority. The job has often fallen to the military's less seasoned second team: reservists, guardsmen and retirees called back to active duty. ... The teams have had to scrounge for equipment that is routinely allocated to big combat units." The Army is striving for improvements, which might require "sweeping institutional change": "One option under consideration is to double the number of advisers to about 7,000, from about 3,500, by tearing apart some traditional combat brigades and assigning officers and senior soldiers to advisory teams."

Iraqi Interior Ministry Denies Two Officers' Transfer Is Due To Militia Purge. USA Today/AP (10/18, 7A, Hurst) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is "under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and for violence elsewhere. The Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week." Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih "were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal had anything to do with militia activity. … The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence."

The New York Times (10/18, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Senior American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, have issued stark warnings to the Maliki government of growing American impatience, especially at the government's failure to stop the scourge of death squads operating with the knowledge or support of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police."

DOJ_NMG_0082442

Methodology Of Survey Claiming 655,000 Iraqi Deaths Disputed. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/18, 2.03M), Steven E. Moore, who trained Iraqi researchers for the International Republican Institute from 2003 to 2004 and conducted survey research for the Coalition Forces from 2005 to 2006, writes, "After doing survey research in Iraq for nearly two years, I was surprised to read that a study by a group from Johns Hopkins University claims that 655,000 Iraqis have died as a result of the war. … The Johns Hopkins tally is wildly at odds with any numbers I have seen in that country. Survey results frequently have a margin of error of plus or minus 3% or 5% -- not 1200%." Moore continues, "In their 2006 report…the Johns Hopkins team says it used 47 cluster points for their sample of 1,849 interviews. This is astonishing: I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points."

Friedman Likens Current Iraq Fighting To Tet Offensive. In his column for the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M), Thomas Friedman writes, "What we're seeing there seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive. ... The jihadists want to sow so much havoc that Bush supporters will be defeated in the midterms and the president will face a revolt from his own party, as well as from Democrats, if he does not begin a pullout from Iraq. The jihadists follow our politics much more closely than people realize. ... It would be depressing to see the jihadists influence our politics with a Tet-like media/war frenzy. But there are only two reasons now for the U.S. to remain in Iraq: because it thinks that staying will make things better or that leaving will make things drastically worse. Alas, it is increasingly hard to see how our presence is making things better. ... While leaving would no doubt exacerbate the civil war, staying in Iraq indefinitely to prevent even more Shiites and Sunnis from killing one another is not going to fly with the U.S. public much longer."

Military Honors Seen As Evolving To Reflect Changing Front. The Washington Post (10/18, White, 748K) reports, "The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan not only have changed the methods U.S. troops use to fight an urban insurgency, they also have caused the U.S. military services to change the way they look at honoring troops who are fighting on the difficult battlefields." For example, the USMC "changed the rules that determine which Marines are eligible for the Combat Action Ribbon, an honor that previously required troops to both receive and return fire against an enemy," so that "anyone who has been exposed to the detonation of" IEDs is now eligible. The Army in turn "introduced its Combat Action Badge, which recognizes soldiers who are exposed to enemy action but are not officially in combat roles. That badge was designed to honor soldiers such as military police, truck drivers and fuel specialists who daily face the dangers of war -- such as roadside bombs -- in Iraq's urban battlefield."

Comrades Say Goodbye To DC Native Killed In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Paley, 748K) reports on the death of Airman 1st Class LeeBernard E. Chavis, who "was killed by a sniper as he tried to keep civilians away from a suspected roadside bomb." The highly emotional article describes the grief of his comrades at a "patriot detail," which "is rarely observed by anyone outside the military -- not by the president, not by members of Congress, not by the children or spouse of the fallen service member."

WPost Likens Somalia To Afghanistan In 1990s. The Washington Post (10/18, 748K) editorializes, "Four months ago an Islamic fundamentalist movement gained control of Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, after defeating an alliance of local warlords backed by the United States. Since then the Islamic Courts Union, as the alliance is called, has expanded its control over much of southern Somalia, including the port city of Kismaayo. It has alternatively negotiated and skirmished with a rival, internationally backed government that clings to a base in the western town of Baidoa. It has come to the brink of war with neighboring Ethiopia, which reportedly has sent troops into Somalia, and has won the support of Ethiopia's hostile neighbor, Eritrea. … What is the United States doing about this dangerous combination of an emerging terrorist base and possible regional war in East Africa? The sad and alarming answer is next to nothing." Somalia, adds the Post, "is looking more and more like Afghanistan in the late 1990s -- dominated by an Islamic fundamentalist movement that shelters al-Qaeda; prone to the meddling of neighbors; virtually ignored by the United States."

DOJ:

Writer Expresses Concern About Taylor As DC US Attorney. In a column for the Washington

DOJ_NMG_0082443

Examiner (10/18), Harry Jaffe writes, "Meet Jeffrey Taylor, who is suddenly and without much fanfare the most powerful law enforcement official in D.C. Taylor is a 41-year-old lawyer. He was born and raised in small towns in Northern California. He played high school football and got A's. He went to Stanford University and got a law degree from Harvard. He served as a prosecutor in San Diego, worked for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah — where he helped write the U.S. Patriot Act — and did a stint with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. Most recently, he was counsel to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. … Now he's our top lawman." Jaffe continues, "What, among his stellar credentials, qualifies Taylor to become the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia? He has experience in fighting terrorists, but can he battle the terrorists who shoot up corners in Anacostia and shake down D.C. residents in Georgetown? … These are some of the questions Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton will have on her mind today when Taylor is scheduled to have his first meeting with our representative in Congress. … 'He will be essentially a district attorney,' says Norton, who was not consulted on Taylor's appointment. 'The great majority of his cases will be criminal cases from the District of Columbia.'" Jaffe adds, "I have not met Taylor, who lives with his wife on Capital Hill. I am not passing judgment on him. But it worries me when the top prosecutor in town has never worked our streets. … Taylor succeeds Ken Wainstein, who moves up to run the Justice Department's new National Security Division. Wainstein was terrific for D.C. Like Taylor, he was a favorite at Main Justice, and he also held a top job at FBI headquarters; but Wainstein also worked as a line prosecutor here in D.C. for years. He locked up murderers. He knew our turf, he put his prosecutors in the community, he sent them after gang-bangers and local hoodlums. Jeff Taylor made his mark as an elite terrorist hunter. He helped create the Patriot Act. A few weeks ago he was Alberto Gonzales' top counselor on terrorism and national security. … My fear is that he will favor national security prosecutions over keeping D.C. residents secure. When Bill Clinton was president, Eleanor Holmes Norton helped select federal judges and the U.S. Attorney. George W. Bush appoints with little regard for D.C.'s needs."

DOJ Among Department Missing Senator's Deadline For IT Projects List. The Federal Times (10/18, Friedman) reports, "Seven departments have missed a deadline to detail their most expensive information technology projects for a Senate subcommittee." The Times continues, "Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., last month directed all agencies to submit lists by Oct. 13 of IT projects worth more than $250,000 to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on financial management, which he chairs. … 'A non-response raises the level of concern . . . that there may be inefficiencies,' said John Hart, a spokesman for Coburn. 'The only way those questions can be answered is a complete response.'" The Times adds, "For each project, Coburn requested that agencies note the project's vendor, when work began, the project's original estimated cost and how much money has been spent so far. The letter also asked whether cost overruns have occurred, if a new cost estimate has been made and what that estimate is. .. As of Oct. 16, the Agriculture, Energy, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Justice, State and Veterans Affairs departments had not responded, according to Hart. All other departments had either submitted the information or requested an extension, he said. Coburn has not yet reviewed the lists that were received, Hart added. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department contacted the senator's office on Oct. 16 and is creating a list."

DOJ Task Force Will Examine Privacy Issues. Federal Computer Week (10/18, Moore) reports, "A task force has issued a series of recommendations regarding privacy in justice information systems." FCW continues, "The Privacy Technology Focus Group was chartered to examine the exchange of personally identifiable information, focusing on justice and public safety data. Last November, the Justice Department brought together a group of public- and private-sector specialists to look into privacy technology. The group's working teams covered areas such as access and authentication, data aggregation and dissemination, and identity theft." FCW adds, "A report issued earlier this month that stemmed from the focus group's activities offers suggestions. Some relate to the Global Justice Extensible Markup Language Data Model (JXDM). For example, the report recommends reviewing and creating privacy metadata in Global JXDM. That metadata would describe sensitivity, use limitations and other characteristics of data."

DOJ_NMG_0082444

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Vacates Lay Conviction. CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Velshi) reports that Ken Lay's "conviction has been erased. Judge Sim Lake, who supervised the case, has today, just a little while ago, erased Ken Lay's 10-count conviction. He cited a 2004 precedent that said that because Ken Lay was convicted but died before he had a chance to appeal, the government could not go forward and punish him or his estate. … Ken Lay's family moved immediately after he died to get the conviction erased. They've actually made a move to get the bond money back. This, of course, means that the $44 million that the Department of Justice was trying to claim from his estate will not be claimed. The convictions, the 10 fraud and conspiracy convictions against Ken Lay, have been erased from the record entirely."

USA Today (10/18, Farrell, 2.27M) reports that Lake's ruling has been widely expected since Lay's death. As a matter of law, "a conviction against a criminal defendant is not final until the defendant has had the chance to appeal the verdict. Therefore, Lay's death short-circuited the full legal process to which he was entitled."

The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Jones, 2.03M) reports, "According to Judge Lake's opinion, the government had argued that Mr. Lay's estate shouldn't get to keep the proceeds of fraud that would otherwise be subject to forfeiture and distribution to victims of the crimes. Judge Lake rejected this argument, citing precedent stating that an individual who suffered a loss may pursue reimbursement in civil court. Although the government had asked Judge Lake to defer his ruling so it could seek retroactive legislation in Congress to let the conviction stand, he said 'the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent.'"

The New York Times (10/18, Murphy, 1.21M) reports that the decision "prevents the government from trying to seize more than $43.5 million from Mr. Lay's estate that prosecutors claimed he stole from Enron before it collapsed in 2001."

The Washington Post (10/18, D1, Johnson, 748K) reports, "With the judge's order, Lay's conviction on 10 criminal charges will be erased from the record. … But governance experts said Lay's name forever will be linked with the era's most complex and far-reaching corporate fraud."

The Houston Chronicle (10/18, Fowler) reports, "The Department of Justice had argued against vacating the conviction, saying it would unjustly enrich Lay's estate by preventing criminal forfeiture proceedings to recover restitution for victims of Enron's downfall. … The government even proposed a law that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in such circumstances. That effort didn't succeed." The Chronicle adds, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has a civil proceeding against Lay that it brought in 2004, but prosecutors could also file their own case. … The Justice Department hasn't said if it will go after Lay's assets via a civil proceeding. A statement from Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra on Tuesday, however, seems to indicate that's a possibility. … 'We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron,' Sierra said. 'Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial.'"

The AP (10/18, Lozano) reports, "Prosecutors offered no counter legal argument in the case, but asked Lake to hold off on a ruling until next week so Congress could consider legislation from the Justice Department that changes federal law regarding the abatement of criminal convictions. Congress recessed for the elections without considering the legislation. … In their motion to Lake last month, prosecutors Sean Berkowitz and John Hueston wrote that certain provisions of the proposed legislation would apply to Lay's case, including 'that the death of a defendant charged with a criminal offense shall not be the basis for abating or otherwise invalidating either a verdict returned or the underlying indictment.' … 'Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent,' Lake wrote." United Press International (10/18) also reports on the ruling.

UnitedHealth Options Practices May Lead To Federal Charges. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/18, Phelps) reports, "The sheer size and persistence of stock-option backdating at UnitedHealth Group Inc. could be the basis of a criminal investigation, former federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The Tribune continues, "Particularly vulnerable is Chief Executive William McGuire, the prime beneficiary of the backdating that allowed top executives to reap additional millions of dollars in profits by granting their options at times when UnitedHealth's stock was at low points. … 'Because of the scale of the options granting, this has to be put in the egregious category, and that makes criminal prosecution more likely,' said Christopher Bebel, a Houston securities attorney who once prosecuted white-collar cases for the U.S. attorney's office in Minnesota." The Tribune adds, "McGuire's unexercised options totaled more than $1.6 billion at the end of last year. … He resigned as chairman Sunday and will depart as CEO by Dec. 1 as the result of an independent investigation into the company's backdating practices. … UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay said the company has seen no indication from authorities of any criminal investigation." The Tribune notes, "The company previously has acknowledged that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department through the office of the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, best known for prosecuting Wall Street and securities matters. … Minneapolis attorney Doug Kelley, a former assistant U.S. attorney, said the involvement of the Southern District is a signal that criminal issues are being pursued. The SEC also can make recommendations to the Justice Department if it thinks criminal prosecution is appropriate, Kelley said."

DOJ_NMG_0082445

Departing CEO To Be Paid $5.1 Million A Year For Life. The AP (10/18, Freed) reports, "After being forced to step down over the company's compensation practices, UnitedHealth chief executive William McGuire will retire on $5.1 million a year, according to the calculations of a watchdog group." The AP continues, "McGuire has agreed to retire by Dec. 1, and he stepped down from his post as chairman on Sunday. The move came after a company-sponsored investigation determined that many of the company's stock options were backdated to make them more favorable for the recipients, including McGuire, other executives, and thousands of UnitedHealth employees. … McGuire's retirement benefits include a $6.5 million lump sum, according to Portland, Maine-based group The Corporate Library, which has criticized McGuire's pay before. … McGuire has stock options that were worth $1.78 billion as of the end of 2005. Their current value is not known. Investors have sold off UnitedHealth shares since questions about options backdating arose in March. Then, on Sunday, UnitedHealth said McGuire would re-price his options to the highest point in the year they were granted to remove any possibility that he got a favorable price."

Murray Says Compensation Committees Should Have Truly Independent Directors. Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A2), "A shocker in Sunday's report on the options heist at UnitedHealth Group Inc. is that Chief Executive William McGuire had an inside man on the company's board: William G. Spears, graduate of Choate and Princeton, a Harvard M.B.A., and the founder of a New York investment-management firm that bears his name. … In theory, Mr. Spears was an 'independent' director. But the investigation, led by former SEC enforcement chief William McLucas, discovered he had close financial ties to Dr. McGuire. He served as trustee for two trusts benefiting the CEO's children and managed between $15 million and $55 million of the McGuire family fortune. … Lawyers for Mr. Spears argue all this was duly disclosed. … Trouble is, no one on the board remembers being told of the relationship." Murray adds that "the UnitedHealth mess suggests there is more to be done. Sarbanes-Oxley put strict requirements on audit committees, but not on compensation committees. They should consist of truly independent directors and should work with truly independent compensation consultants."

Pearlstein Faults UnitedHealth Over Options Scandal. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (10/18, D1), "Anyone with health insurance from UnitedHealth Group knows what happens if you fail to fill in every box on the form, or attach the requisite back-up material, to get reimbursed for a $40 prescription. You're not going to see a dime until you've been put on hold for 30 minutes, faxed the paperwork twice to somebody in Minnetonka, Minn., and demanded to talk to a supervisor. … Isn't it odd that a company could be so persnickety when it comes to pinching pennies from doctors and patients, and so cavalier when it comes to lavishing executives with hundreds of millions of dollars of shareholders' money? … In response to these revelations, you'd think UnitedHealth directors would at least have had the manners to apologize to shareholders, if not to resign. Instead, they've followed the well-worn path of insisting they did nothing wrong while taking steps to ensure it won't happen again."

Board Issues Guidance On Auditing Value Of Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A10, Hughes) reports that the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board has issued "long-awaited guidance for auditing the value of employee stock options. … In its guidance, the PCAOB reminds auditors that because companies typically must estimate the value of employee stock options because the prices generally aren't set in a market, there is a risk of producing misleading figures. As a result, the board said that auditors should be aware of possible pitfalls, such as how changes in assumptions can affect the fair value of the options." The audit oversight board "also offered guidance on when to use the Black-Scholes model, and when to use what is known as a lattice model. The Black-Scholes model for valuing employee stock options is more standardized, but a lattice model 'might more fully reflect the substantive characteristics' of the employee stock option, the board said. In a lattice model, there are more variables, which means companies could more specifically tailor the value of stock options to factors that are specific to their companies."

DOJ_NMG_0082446

NYTimes Supports Justice Department Review Of Buyouts. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "Buyout firms are engaged in an unprecedented feeding frenzy, gobbling up publicly traded companies like never before. While buyouts can set lagging businesses back on the right track, regulators and shareholders must be watchful to ensure that managers demand fair value for the companies." The Times adds, "The Justice Department reportedly is looking into whether the old-boy network of private-equity firms has gotten a little too chummy, examining whether firms are colluding to keep prices low. It is a move we support. Too often public stockholders end up getting the raw end of these deals."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Page Board Examining Trip Kolbe Took In 1996 With Two Pages. The AP (10/18, Margasak) reports, "House page program overseers this week discussed a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took with two former pages and others in 1996, a congressional official said Tuesday. The trip is under review by the Justice Department. The five-member House Page Board, three lawmakers and two House officials, took no action and did not have any information beyond recent news accounts of the trip, the official said." The AP notes Kolbe is "the only openly gay Republican in Congress." The AP adds "the discussion about the Kolbe trip "indicates that the board is moving beyond the overly friendly e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages that ex-Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., sent to former male pages."

The Washington Post (10/18, A9, Weisman, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "Members of the Page Board sought the review after news reports last week that the Justice Department had opened a preliminary inquiry into a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) took with male former pages in 1996. That report sparked a conference call Monday among board members." But because "the Page Board, which consists of three House members and two senior House officials, does not have the authority to investigate members of Congress, the matter was turned over to the House ethics committee, formally known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct." The Post adds it is "not clear what allegations the board was concerned about."

Kolbe Allegedly Had "Inappropriate" Contact With Page. The Washington Post (10/18, A9, Weisman, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "The Washington Post has learned of a potentially inappropriate incident involving Kolbe and a male page. The man recently told the House clerk's office and the FBI about an encounter with the Arizona Republican that occurred about five years ago when he was 16, according to someone familiar with the man's account. The page told authorities that he was 'uncomfortable with a particular social encounter' that involved physical contact when he and Kolbe were alone, the source said yesterday."

GOP Debating "Big Tent" Inclusion Of Gays. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Neuman, 918K) reports the Republican Party has "broadened its appeal with a 'big tent' strategy of reaching out to voters who might typically be Democrats. But a debate is now growing within the GOP about whether the tent has become too big -- by including gays whose political views may conflict with the goals of the party's powerful evangelical wing." Some conservative Christians, "who are pivotal to the GOP's get-out-the-vote effort, are charging that gay Republican staffers in Congress may have thwarted their legislative agenda. There are even calls for what some have dubbed a 'pink purge' of high-ranking gay Republicans on Capitol Hill -- and in the administration." The "long simmering tension between gays and the religious right within the GOP has erupted into open conflict at a sensitive time, just weeks before a midterm election that may cost Republicans control of Congress."

Trandahl Seen As Key Figure On Foley Scandal. The New York Times (10/18, Zeleny, 1.21M)

DOJ_NMG_0082447

reports former House clerk Jeff Trandahl "has emerged as a central figure in the case of how the House Republican leadership dealt with the conduct" of former Rep. Mark Foley. As the House ethics committee "pursues its investigation, few accounts are more crucial than Mr. Trandahl's in determining whether Republican leaders acted with enough urgency. He is scheduled to testify to the committee on Thursday, when he could corroborate — or contradict — accusations that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's behavior at least three years ago." The House clerk, "a vestige of the patronage system, serves at the pleasure of the speaker and, in recent years, Mr. Hastert's influential chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. House investigators are trying to deduce whether a deteriorating relationship between Mr. Van Der Meid and others in the Capitol, particularly Mr. Trandahl, had a role in the handling of the complaints about Mr. Foley." Over the years, "people who worked with him on the Hill said, Mr. Trandahl received periodic complaints that Mr. Foley was acting too friendly to the pages or interns." The House ethics committee is "trying to determine whether Mr. Trandahl simply passed along the information to Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley, or whether he alerted the speaker's office that Mr. Foley's overfriendly behavior had grown beyond idle gossip."

Contributors Want Foley Campaign To Return Funds. The Hill (10/18, Young) reports former Rep. Mark Foley's campaign held a fundraiser on September 26, three days before his resignation attended by a small number of lobbyists who "had no idea that some of them would soon be scrambling to get those checks returned." The lobbyists "are not the only contributors looking to distance themselves from the Foley scandal and recoup the thousands of dollars they gave to help the incumbent, who did not face a competitive challenger, return to the House for his seventh term." A "number of corporate and trade association PACs also have sent word to Foley's campaign that they want refunds." By Friday, Sept. 29, "some of them were placing calls to Foley's campaign office in Florida or to the Washington, D.C.-based Catalyst Group, which administered his fundraising: they wanted their money back." The Hill "contacted more than a dozen PACs that ranked among the biggest contributors to Foley's campaign and to his leadership PAC this election cycle." Most "did not return calls," and some "declined to comment." But others "disclosed that they have or plan to deliver letters to Foley's campaign treasurer Donna Winterson, also his sister, asking that their money be returned."

Foley To Name Alleged Abuser. CBS Evening News (10/17, story 6,0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Former Congressman Mark Foley plans to tell the Archdiocese of Miami the name of the Catholic clergyman who he says abused him as a teenager. The Foley lawyer says the clergyman is still alive but can't be prosecuted because the statute of limitations ran out a long time ago."

The New York Times/AP (10/18) reports Foley attorney Gerald Richman "said the clergyman was still alive. An archdiocese spokeswoman said the church had urged Mr. Foley to identify his abuser. Mr. Richman said the statute of limitations on sexual assault had expired long ago."

House GOP Aides Coordinating Message To Deflect Foley Scandal. The Hill (10/18, O'Connor) reports, "Desperate to talk about something other than scandal, House Republican leadership staffs are coordinating a messaging blitz in an attempt to shift some emphasis back to national security and the economy before the Nov. 7 election." With less than "three weeks for the GOP to salvage its majority, the new media campaign is the first formal coordination between leaders' offices since they were fractured by the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley." Aides "to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) met yesterday in the Lincoln Room of the Speaker's Capitol suite to plan ways to help embattled Republicans sidestep national media and target local press."

Foley Scandal Prompts Parents To Monitor Kids' Internet Use. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, D1, Vascellaro, Athavaley, 2.03M) reports the "fallout from the Foley scandal has sent shockwaves through Congress and rattled employees across the country who are increasingly on edge about whether their boss is tracking their every online move. And, as new evidence about the vulnerability of kids online emerges in spurts, it is also jolting parents into better monitoring what their children say and do at their computers." In "recent weeks, more parents are turning to pricey software programs that record not only what Web sites their kids visit, but also the content of their emails and instant messages."

Report Says Cunningham Used Intelligence Panel To Aid Contractors. The AP (10/18, Shrader) reports former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "parlayed his seat on the Intelligence Committee into at least $70 million in business for two contractors who in turn paid him millions in bribes, an investigator hired by the panel has concluded." The report, released by ranking Democrat Jane Harman, "found that Cunningham had exploited weaknesses in the system for monitoring secret federal spending." It said that Cunningham "and at least one associate secured the cooperation — or at least the acquiescence — of many people. They included members of Congress and their aides who handled bills that directed money to certain programs, Pentagon officials who awarded the contracts and officials at agencies where the contract work was done." In a "sign of partisan divisions on the committee," Harman "unilaterally released the five-page document after months of disagreement with the committee's chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. Together, the two had initiated the investigation, led by special counsel Michael Stern, and had hoped to release the findings jointly."

DOJ_NMG_0082448

The Washington Times/UPI (10/18, Waterman) reports Cunningham "inserted up to $80 million worth of earmarks for the contractors who bribed him into classified intelligence authorization bills between 2000 and 2006, bullying staff who became concerned, according to an interim report from a special House investigation." The report "says that over six years, Cunningham and co-conspirators Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes 'repeatedly sought to use [the committee] to facilitate the objectives of the conspiracy, particularly through requests for congressional funding ... that benefited Wilkes, Wade and other companies,' which it does not identify."

The New York Times (10/18, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Cunningham "pressured and intimidated staff members of the House Intelligence Committee to help steer more than $70 million in classified federal business to favored military contractors." The investigation found that Cunningham "repeatedly abused his position on the committee to authorize money for military projects, often over the objections of staff members who criticized some of the spending as wasteful. The inquiry also found that despite numerous 'red flags' about the propriety of a particular contract for work on a controversial Pentagon counterintelligence program, committee staff members for three years 'continued to accept and support Mr. Cunningham's growing requests for this project.'"

The Hill (10/18, Tiron) reports Intelligence Committee staff were "fully aware that the funds were intended for a specific recipient and 'either actively cooperated with or did not resist Cunningham's efforts to steer the funds toward that recipient,' according to the report." Panel Chairman Pete Hoekstra "took immediate offense to ranking member Rep. Jane Harman's (D-Calif.) decision to release the summary, saying that the move shows 'blatant disregard' for a bipartisan agreement they had made to fully review the Cunningham matter and charging her with politicizing the inquiry."

The Washington Post (10/18, A19, Pincus, 748K) reports Cunningham "channeled more than $70 million in Pentagon and intelligence agency contracts to two companies that paid him bribes, and required the 'cooperation or at least the non-interference of many people' to pull that off, a congressional investigation has found." Since Cunningham "had no authority to award contracts, he needed the acquiescence of some members of Congress, congressional staff members and Defense Department officials, according to the executive summary." The summary "discloses for the first time that the government is investigating the CIA's award of 'several large contracts' that involved Kyle Dustin 'Dusty' Foggo when he was No. 3 at the agency under then-Director Porter J. Goss. Foggo was a longtime friend of contractor Brent R. Wilkes, who federal investigators say was one of Cunningham's co-conspirators along with contractor Mitchell J. Wade."

Weldon Campaign Suggests Democrats At DOJ Leaked Probe. The AP (10/18, Dale) reports, "A day after the FBI raided the offices of a lobbying firm run by Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and his close friend, the Republican's campaign blamed publicity about the Justice Department investigation on 'the left-wing, liberal attack machine.' … Weldon's campaign spokesman said there are Clinton-era holdovers among the civil-service employees in the Justice Department. 'I don't mean to impugn the motive of the Justice Department, but there may be partisan motives for leaking word of this inquiry three weeks before the election,' the spokesman, Pete Peterson, said." The AP adds, "Weldon has clashed with the Bush administration and others in Washington," most recently over the Pentagon's "Able Danger" program.

On Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (10/16), correspondent Major Garrett reported, "Weldon told Fox he's done nothing wrong and neither has his daughter." Weldon: "They go to my daughter's house and treat her like she's a common thug. I mean, my daughter has done nothing wrong." Garrett: "Weldon also casts doubt on the timing of the investigation and intense media scrutiny it sparked," and "Fox asked Weldon if he was accusing the FBI of being a pawn." Weldon: "And there's no conspiratorial thing here or paranoia – it is what it is. And we will cooperate fully with the Justice Department and we already have said that."

DOJ_NMG_0082449

The New York Times (10/18, Johnston, 1.21M) says that "Weldon is describing a federal investigation…as an election-season ploy that will find that 'I engaged in no wrongdoing.' 'I am extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress,' Mr. Weldon…said in a statement issued Monday evening. 'The timing of this situation is deeply concerning.'"

Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Under Probe. The Washington Post (10/18, A8, Smith, Leonnig) reports, "Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade were surprised three years ago to be invited to a luncheon in honor of visiting Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), hosted by Bogoljub Karic, a wealthy Serbian businessman who had been barred from visiting or trading with the United States because of his close ties to former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic." The Post continues, "Weldon 'was visiting solely because of Karic,' whom he was trying to get off the U.S. blacklist, a former senior embassy official familiar with the visit concluded. 'It seemed odd' at the time, because Karic had no obvious tie to Weldon's district outside Philadelphia, and Weldon should have known the embassy was shunning contacts with him, the official said. … What the embassy apparently did not know is that the Karic family that year signed a contract with Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner that called for monthly payments of $20,000 for 'management, government and public relations,' according to a copy of the March 2003 contract. In all, the family paid Karen Weldon's firm $133,858 that year for efforts she undertook to set up a foundation for it." The Post adds, "Curt Weldon's visit and that deal are under investigation by the FBI, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the probe. His efforts to assist clients of his daughter's consulting firm in their dealings with the federal government are the focus of that probe, according to sources familiar with it . … FBI raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida on Monday, including one of Karen Weldon's home and another of her consulting and lobbying firm, were part of the bureau's search for evidence of whether the lawmaker used his influence to benefit himself or his daughter's firm, according to the sources. … A grand jury has been impaneled as part of the investigation, and it has obtained evidence gathered via wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers, the sources said."

Meanwhile, The Hill (10/18, Schor) reports, "As President Bush prepared to announce a new energy cooperation pact with Russia in May 2002, Rep. Curt Weldon…and 10 fellow lawmakers sat down in Moscow with executives of oil and gas trader Itera Group, praising the company as a prime prospect for U.S. partnerships. Itera had fallen under scrutiny at the time for its ties to Gazprom," and "Itera is facing new questions this week after federal agents raided the company's Florida office as well as the homes of Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton." The Hill notes, "Despite Weldon's hints of a politically motivated probe, nonpartisan ethics groups point out that the Justice Department has conducted itself under a Republican administration."

NYTimes Says GOP Leadership To Blame For Lack Of Ethics Reform. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) notes the Kurt Weldon, Mark Foley, Bob Ney and Randy Cunningham scandals – with a brief aside about William Jefferson and Harry Reid – and says, "The G.O.P. leaders have themselves to blame for their multiple millstones. If they had passed actual ethics reform, instead of deep-sixing it in bromides, there could have been a believable independent corruption office to take some of the heat off their current plight as compromised self-investigators." The Times adds, "Congressmen caught in wrongdoing at this time of year like to complain that they're the victims of election-eve politics. If the looming elections inspire whistleblowers, we say bravo. The prospect of voting day fills the vacuum created by the absence of an actual set of enforceable ethics rules in Congress."

US Charges New York Labor Leader With Racketeering. The New York Times (10/18, Hartocollis, Greenhouse) reports, "Brian M. McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman who as head of the nation's biggest municipal labor council personified New York City's politically powerful labor movement, was arrested yesterday on federal racketeering charges involving embezzlement, receiving bribes, fraud and money laundering. Conviction on all 43 charges could send him to prison for decades." The Times continues, "A 186-page indictment charges Mr. McLaughlin, 54, with illegally obtaining $2.2 million from taxpayers, labor unions and contractors over the last decade since he became president of the New York City Central Labor Council, a federation of 400 union locals with one million members." The Times adds, "The accusations range from the Dickensian (stealing $95,000 from Little League baseball teams to pay his rent) to the brazen (creating two no-show jobs on his legislative payroll and keeping part of one salary), according to the painstakingly detailed racketeering indictment unsealed yesterday. … Mr. McLaughlin surrendered early yesterday. He pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in Federal District Court in Manhattan before Magistrate Judge James C. Francis IV, and was released on $250,000 bail."

DOJ_NMG_0082450

The AP (10/18, Milton) reports, "In a 186-page indictment unsealed Tuesday, McLaughlin and others are accused of engaging in racketeering from 1995 through 2006 by using money collected for union activities to instead pay personal expenses, including credit card bills, rent and home improvements. … The indictment alleges McLaughlin committed mail fraud, embezzlement, money laundering and labor bribery by diverting money from various funds he controlled. … Among the funds identified were McLaughlin's political campaign committee, union accounts meant to provide benefits for union members and even contributions meant to support a Little League baseball program." The AP adds, "The indictment also alleges McLaughlin and others misappropriated funds from the state by creating fictitious jobs on his legislative staff and submitting false expense forms. … Among the expenses named in the indictment were more than $4,100 to maintain a boat in Tuckerton, N.J., and $4,200 for Long Island country club membership dues."

The New York Sun (10/18, Berman) reports, "The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District, Michael Garcia, said Mr. McLaughlin's alleged crimes 'add new meaning to the term "hand-in-the-till."' … A 186-page indictment alleges a complex scheme that Mr. Garcia called 'stunning in its breadth and its scope.' Prosecutors charge that Mr. McLaughlin, 54, accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from city street lighting contractors, installed his cronies in fictitious positions with the state Assembly and the labor council to funnel cash to himself, and laundered money to hide his crimes and evade law enforcement." The Sun adds, "No one else was named in the indictment, but Mr. Garcia said the investigation was ongoing and did not rule out further charges. … Mr. McLaughlin did not comment in response to the accusations. 'The case is now in the court of law, so we're going to save our comments for the courtroom,' his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, said after Mr. McLaughlin was arraigned before federal Magistrate Judge James Francis IV yesterday. Two of the 44 counts are filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which some have criticized when it is used in cases that don't involve traditional organized crime families."

Newsday (10/18, DeStefano) reports, "The alleged theft was done so McLaughlin 'could support his own version of lifestyle of the rich and famous,' said Rose Gill Hearn, head of the city's Department of Investigation. McLaughlin is accused of using union members while they worked on regular shifts for their bosses to do chores for him that included shoveling snow, changing light bulbs, cleaning out a barn and capturing rodents in the basement of his house, investigators said. According to the indictment, women who had a 'personal relationship' with McLaughlin also reaped some financial benefits from his actions. McLaughlin is married and has five children." The New York Daily News (10/18, Zambito, 729K) notes, "No one was immune from his greed, not union members -- not even Little Leaguers."

Missouri Mayor Expected To Plead Guilty To Bribery Charges. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/18, Hahn, 300K) reports, "St. Peters Mayor Shawn Brown is expected to plead guilty Friday in his bribery case, authorities said Tuesday." Assistant US Attorney Tom Albus "would not confirm whether a plea agreement had been reached but said it was customary to have one under these circumstances." The Post-Distatch notes, "Brown was indicted in August on a charge of soliciting and accepting a $2,750 bribe from Redflex Traffic Systems Inc., which in June got the contract to install red-light cameras in St. Peters. Brown is accused of telling a Redflex employee he would veto the measure approving the system's installation unless the company paid him off. Redflex told the FBI and cooperated with the agency in giving Brown a check, authorities said."

Former GBI Agent Sentenced To Year In Prison For Taking Kickbacks. The AP (10/18) reports, "A former special agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation was sentenced Tuesday to one year and a day in federal prison for receiving illegal kickback payments and failing to maintain firearms records." James R. Garmon "brokered the sale of more than $5,000 worth of firearms that had been seized by Bartow County deputies to a local pawnshop, the U.S. attorney's office said. GBI Director Vernon Keenan said his agency cooperated with the FBI's investigation." The AP notes Garmon "received at least $1,600 from the pawnshop for brokering the deal, prosecutors said."

DOJ_NMG_0082451

Alleged Pennsylvania Mobster Accused Of Soliciting Murder Of Witness. The AP (10/18) reports, "An alleged mobster facing drug charges planned to kill a witness against him while out on bail, federal prosecutors said Tuesday. A new indictment against William D'Elia, 60, of Hughestown, who reputedly heads the Bufalino crime family, charges him with solicitation of murder, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, violating bail conditions, money laundering and other offenses. D'Elia told an informant in August that he would give him photographs of a witness who cooperated with prosecutors and told him to wait for a signal to kill the man, according to the 18-count indictment issued Tuesday." The AP notes, "D'Elia has been linked to organized crime by the FBI, the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, and former Philadelphia and South Jersey mob boss Ralph Natale."

FBI Arrests Florida Man For Making Child Porn With 15-Month-Old Daughter. The AP (10/18) reports, "An Orange County man was arrested by federal agents after he sent sexual pictures of himself and his 15-month-old daughter over the Internet, authorities said. The man was ordered to be held without bail at a court appearance in federal court Monday. He faces child-pornography charges, and has been assigned an assistant federal public defender." The AP notes, "An Internet sting conducted by the Central Florida Innocent Images Task Force, which includes a Seminole County sheriff's detective, led to his arrest. The man 'admitted to producing three videos of himself and his daughter engaged in sexual activity,' FBI agent Keith Scott wrote in a charging affidavit. … He also chatted online with a Tennessee-based FBI agent posing as a 13-year-old."

Grand Jury Hands Up Eight Count Indictment To Capitol Intruder. The Hill (10/17, Kucinich) reports that Carlos Greene was indicted yesterday by a grand jury for breaching "Capitol Police security last month and" leading "officers on a three floor chase inside the U.S. Capitol before he was apprehended on the basement floor." The charges against Greene are "fleeing a law enforcement officer, two counts of destruction of government property, assaulting, resisting or impeding certain officers or employees and unlawful possession of five grams or more of cocaine." In addition, Greene charges of "firearms violations such as possession of a gun on Capitol grounds and carrying and possessing a firearm during drug trafficking offense."

Ohio Fundraiser Called Coin Funds An ATM, Former Aide Testifies. The Columbus Dispatch (10/18, Niquette) reports, "Coin dealer Thomas W. Noe once described the $50 million state investment he managed "as having access to an ATM," Noe's former administrative assistant said yesterday in testimony against her former boss. … 'What he went on to say was, when he needed it, he would tap the coin funds,' Sue Bahn told the jury during the second day of testimony in the trial of Noe and his handling of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation coin investment." The Dispatch continues, "Bahn, who worked for Noe for about two years at his Maumee coin shop and was trusted to pay his bills and balance his personal checkbook, said Noe made the comments in June 2005 after she questioned him about the controversy swirling around the investment at the time. … Prosecutors say Noe stole millions from the coin funds to pay debts and 'to support the lifestyle that he felt he deserved.' … Noe denies all charges, including theft, saying his contract gave him broad authority over the state funds."

The AP (10/18, Seewer) reports, "Metzger said she met with her boss in the summer of 2005 after allegations of wrongdoing surfaced and asked Noe whether he took the money, she testified. … 'He described it as having access to an ATM,' she said." The AP continues, "The investment scandal has battered Republicans who control the state, raising Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office for the first time since 1990. Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland has a wide lead over Republican Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, in gubernatorial race polls. … Prosecutors say Noe was deep in debt when he got the money, and he quickly used it to pay off his creditors."

The Toledo Blade (OH) (10/18, Wilkinson, Eder) reports, "Tom Wersell, the director of investigations for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified that the bureau's chief legal officer asked him to show another executive how to delete e-mails in the weeks after the Tom Noe coin scandal erupted. … Mr. Wersell said he did not know why John Annarino made the request but that he showed former chief investment officer Jim McLean how to 'double delete' e-mails. … Mr. Wersell, in his second day of testimony, acknowledged that the bureau has a information technology department. … The revelation came during cross examination of Mr. Wersell by Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Wersell had testified that many of the documents relating to the Noe coin funds were retrieved from Mr. McLean's office. He was fired last year by the bureau."

DOJ_NMG_0082452

Mueller Calls For ISP User Tracking. CNET News (10/18, McCullagh) reports, "FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday called on Internet service providers to record their customers' online activities, a move that anticipates a fierce debate over privacy and law enforcement in Washington next year. … 'Terrorists coordinate their plans cloaked in the anonymity of the Internet, as do violent sexual predators prowling chat rooms,' Mueller said in a speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston. … 'All too often, we find that before we can catch these offenders, Internet service providers have unwittingly deleted the very records that would help us identify these offenders and protect future victims,' Mueller said. 'We must find a balance between the legitimate need for privacy and law enforcement's clear need for access.'" CNET continues, "The speech to the law enforcement group, which approved a resolution on the topic earlier in the day, echoes other calls from Bush administration officials to force private firms to record information about customers. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for instance, told Congress last month that 'this is a national problem that requires federal legislation.'" CNET adds, "Justice Department officials admit privately that data retention legislation is controversial enough that there wasn't time to ease it through the U.S. Congress before politicians left to campaign for re-election. Instead, the idea is expected to surface in early 2007, and one Democratic politician has already promised legislation. … Law enforcement groups claim that by the time they contact Internet service providers, customers' records may have been deleted in the routine course of business. Industry representatives, however, say that if police respond to tips promptly instead of dawdling, it would be difficult to imagine any investigation that would be imperiled."

Boston Globe.com (10/17, Simpson, 2:15 p.m.) reported Mueller "told the nation's police chiefs today that law enforcement must strike a careful balance between fighting crime and protecting the homeland. Mueller said while violent crime more directly affects most Americans, the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks made anti-terrorism activities the FBI's top priority. 'I wish I could assure you that there will be never be another terrorist attack in America, but I cannot. The world remains a perilous place,' said Mueller, who received a standing ovation before and after his speech."

Crawford Pleads Guilty To Charges In Stock Case. The New York Times (10/18, Stout, 1.21M) reports, "Lester M. Crawford, the former commissioner of food and drugs, pleaded guilty Tuesday to lying and conflict-of-interest charges in connection with stock he and his wife owned in companies regulated by the F.D.A. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, who accepted Dr. Crawford's plea to two misdemeanor charges, scheduled sentencing for Jan. 22 in Federal District Court." Crawford "could face up to a year in prison and a fine of up to $100,000 on each of the two counts, but his lawyer has said she expects him to be placed on probation."

Dow Jones (10/18) reports, "Crawford, who served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005, was charged by the Justice Department with filing misleading financial-disclosure reports about his holdings in Sysco Corp., Kimberly-Clark Corp. and Embrex Inc. … Crawford was confirmed as FDA chief in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B."

Market Watch (10/18, Schroeder) reports, "The charges against Crawford alleged he or his wife owned shares in Sysco Corp., which were regulated by the FDA, according to a Tuesday statement from the Department of Justice. … 'One of the most important principles of our ethics laws is that public officials cannot have a financial interest in any decision that they make,' U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor stated. 'Lester Crawford, who held one of the most important jobs in government, blatantly violated these principles. Today, he is being held accountable for his actions.'"

The AP (10/18, Bridges) reports, "As head of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, Lester Crawford oversaw a federal agency that regulates products that account for an estimated 25 cents of every dollar spent each year by U.S. consumers. … At the same time, Crawford, through his broker, oversaw an investment portfolio that included tens of thousands of dollars in shares in food, beverage and medical device companies regulated by the very federal agency he ran." The AP continues, "Crawford knew what he and his wife owned, but still failed to fully disclose that information as required by federal law, the Justice Department said in court papers charging him with filing false financial disclosure forms and conflict of interest. In some cases, Crawford even assured federal ethics officers that he and his wife had sold stock in FDA-regulated companies that the couple in fact continued to hold, according to the papers. … Because of that, the former FDA commissioner was set to plead guilty Tuesday to the two misdemeanor counts, said his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder. She said Crawford would not dispute the federal government's claims under the plea agreement. … A fine is likely, though the two counts each carry a maximum penalty of one year in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0082453

Trial Over Bogus Degrees Delayed. Government Executive (10/18, Rutzick) reports, "Names of 135 federal employees who allegedly bought fake diplomas from an outfit in the western United States will not be revealed for at least one year, if ever, according to a U.S attorney's office." GE continues, "Last week in Spokane, Wash., during a pretrial hearing for eight people accused of selling counterfeit degrees from nonexistent universities, a defense attorney told the judge that employees from the National Security Agency and the Health and Human Services, Justice and State departments were among 6,000 people who bought the diplomas, according to the Associated Press." GE adds, "The AP also reported that Peter Schweda, attorney for alleged diploma mill operator Steven Randock, said the names of 135 government employees who supposedly purchased the degrees for promotions or pay raises would be released during the course of the trial. … The trial will not start for another year, though. Judge Lonny Suko of the District Court of the Eastern District of Washington delayed it until Oct. 1, 2007, to give attorneys more time to prepare. Suko said more than 150,000 pages of e-mails, 40 CDs of documents and up to 50 witnesses will be used. … Tom Rice, a spokesman for the U.S attorney's office in Spokane, Wash., which is prosecuting the case, said Schweda's assertions that government purchasers would be revealed 'were not necessarily accurate.' … Rice also said he cannot confirm or deny that there is a separate Justice Department investigation into federal purchasers of the fake degrees. The case was built around a sting operation by a handful of Secret Service agents."

Man Pleads Guilty To Three Idaho Slayings. The AP (10/18, Geranios) reports from Coeur D'Alene, ID, "The man accused of kidnapping two children from their Idaho home and killing their family pleaded guilty Monday to murder and kidnapping in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty." The AP continues, "Joseph E. Duncan III, 43, was charged with bludgeoning two adults and a teenager to death at the home near Coeur d'Alene so he could kidnap the family's two youngest children for sex." The AP adds, "Duncan pleaded guilty shortly before his trial was to begin Monday. Under his plea agreement, he is to be sentenced to three consecutive life terms without parole in an Idaho prison. But authorities said that sentencing would be postponed pending federal prosecution that could result in the death penalty. … Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas said the sole survivor, young Shasta Groene, had agreed to testify against the man accused of holding her captive in the woods for seven weeks. … 'This agreement is possible because of a brave little 9-year-old girl who was willing to confront Duncan face-to-face in the courtroom,' Douglas said." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors have said they intend to charge Duncan with kidnapping Shasta Groene and her brother Dylan and taking them to a primitive campsite in Montana and that they expect to seek the death penalty. Court documents allege he repeatedly molested the pair, then killed Dylan, whose body was found later at the campsite."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To New Jersey Stock Scam. The Atlantic City (NJ) Press (10/18, Haught) reports, "A former Ocean County (NJ) man pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to involvement in a stock fraud case that cost investors millions of dollars and involved partners from Canada, New York, Florida and New Jersey, including a man from Upper Township." The Press continues, "Joseph F. Morgan, formerly of Stafford Township and now of St. Pete Beach, Fla., admitted to U.S. District Court Judge Jerome B. Simandle that he helped swindle investors of about $10 million in a scheme that netted more than $20 million through stock price manipulations." The Press adds, "As part of the scheme, involving several co-defendants and other unindicted partners, Morgan and others used a system of illegal stock compensations, fraudulent companies and shady brokerage deals to take control of nearly 100 million shares of TeleServices Internet Group Inc. and then sold those stocks to unsuspecting investors. … The scam, which ran from December 1996 through October 2005, involved at least 16 publicly traded companies, all trading on the Over the Counter Electronic Bulletin Board System. The shares -- called penny stocks -- generally traded for less than $1, often as little as 5 cents. … An official with the U.S. Department of Justice said the scam operated like a pump-and-dump or boiler-room scheme, in which brokers drum up investors by suggesting the stock is ready for a major price lift. In this case, Morgan and others used their connections to move the stock around, giving investors the appearance of true market activity."

DOJ_NMG_0082454

Florida Crime Rate Drops, Except For Murder. The AP (10/18, Royse) reports, "Crime continued to drop in Florida during the first half of this year, but the rate of violent crimes, particularly murders, went up, according to state figures released Tuesday." The AP continues, "Crimes tracked by federal officials dropped from 412,743 in the first six months of 2005 to 411,608 in the first half of 2006, statistics compiled by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement showed. … That represented a decrease of 0.3 percent, continuing a downward trend that has put the state's crime rate at its lowest in more than three decades. .. But there was a striking anomaly in this year's figures: an increase in the number of murders. Local police agencies reported 518 killings in Florida through the end of June, up 27 percent from the 408 murders the state saw in the first six months of 2005." The AP adds, "Violent crime in general is bucking the overall trend in Florida, increasing 3.2 percent in the first half of 2006 over the same period last year. … The increase mirrors a mysterious uptick in violent crimes and murders in cities nationwide. … Officials don't have a clear explanation for what may be making the murder rate jump, following small but steady declines through recent years that were attributed in part to tougher sentencing laws. … In a speech to police chiefs on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal officials are looking for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. Gonzales also acknowledged that some law enforcement agencies have been stretched a little by new duties in anti-terrorism efforts."

Federal Judge Again Strikes Missouri's Lethal Injection Procedure. The AP (10/18) reports, "A federal judge has ruled for a second time that Missouri's use of a three-drug lethal injection for executions is unconstitutional, confirming his ruling last month that the procedure could cause 'torturous' pain." The AP continues, "The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. follows his September ruling that said the death penalty protocol could subject inmates to an unreasonable risk of cruel and unusual punishment and halted all executions in the state." The AP adds, "Gaitan had first ordered in June that the Missouri Department of Corrections make sweeping changes to its execution protocol. At issue is how painful lethal injection can be if the three drugs used are not given correctly. If the injection is given improperly, an inmate could be in pain but would be paralyzed and unable to show it, Gaitan said in his September ruling. .. .In that order, Gaitan gave the state until Oct. 27 to provide a revised protocol. But the state resubmitted the same proposal Oct. 6, arguing that it was constitutional and asking the judge to reconsider his decision. … The state's attorneys had asked Gaitan to rule quickly, so they could file an appeal if he ruled against them."

Federal Prosecutors Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Insurer Case. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Richardson) reports that federal prosecutors will not charge General Reinsurance, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., the holding company headed by Warren Buffett "in their continuing criminal investigation into the collapse of a professional-liability insurer in Virginia, according to a statement by Berkshire." Berkshire "said General Re received a letter yesterday from the office of the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia in Richmond stating that the federal prosecutor 'does not currently view General Reinsurance as a target or subject in connection with the EDVA U.S. attorney's pending investigation of Reciprocal of America.'"

Man Convicted Of Murder In New York Drunk Driving Case. The New York Times (10/18, Vitello) reports that Martin Heidgen, "who crashed into a wedding limousine last year, killing the driver and a 7-year-old girl while driving drunk in the wrong direction on a Long Island parkway, was convicted on Tuesday of two counts of murder." The verdict is the first murder conviction won in fatal drunken driving case in Nassau County, "where the high incidence of drunken driving has become a public policy issue that figured heavily in the 2005 election campaign for the office of district attorney." The "murder charge brought against Mr. Heidgen, murder in the second degree by depraved indifference, carries the same penalties as intentional murder -- a minimum of 15 years and a maximum of 25 years to life -- and has been the subject of several appellate court decisions in the last two years."

DOJ_NMG_0082455

DC Mayor Seeks $11 Million To Continue Anti-Crime Measures. Washington, DC Mayor Anthony Williams asked the city council for $11 million to continue a package of emergency crime measures. The Washington Times (10/18, Cella, Doolittle) reports, "The legislation includes a request for $5 million for youth-violence prevention programs, $4.2 million for additional police overtime and $1.7 million for the city's burgeoning network of neighborhood surveillance cameras. It also would renew four key provisions of the mayor's emergency package, which is set to expire at midnight tomorrow. Those provisions authorized the use of neighborhood surveillance cameras, allowed some offenders to be held until trial, gave police access to juvenile criminal records and granted the mayor power to set the time of the juvenile curfew."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Review Finds Agencies' FOIA Administration Improving. Government Executive (10/18, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Act are for the most part complying with an executive order outlining a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law, according to a new Justice Department report." GE continues, "All 91 federal agencies subject to FOIA have prepared plans for improving the process of releasing federal documents to the public, refined the plans where necessary and posted them on their Web sites for public review, the report stated. Most agencies also fulfilled the order's first requirement successfully by appointing chief FOIA officers by Jan. 13, 2006." GE adds, "In fiscal 2005, agencies handled more than 2.6 million FOIA requests at a cost of $300 million. This represents a 35 percent increase in activity over fiscal 2001, the report stated. … The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec.14, 2005, directed agencies to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations. … A number of improvement plans failed to properly address how the agencies would address backlogs of requests for information, the report stated. A few agencies have modified plans to comply with the order, including the Education Department, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, NASA, the National Archives and Records Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission. … But a number of other agencies have yet to complete the modifications. These were the Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Homeland Security, Labor and Veterans Affairs departments; the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Trade Commission, the General Services Administration, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the National Science Foundation, the National Transportation Safety Board and the Social Security Administration."

Federal Government Won't Pay Death Benefit To Studds' Same-Sex Spouse. The federal government has refused to pay death benefits to the spouse of former Rep. Gerry Studds, the first openly gay member of Congress. The Washington Post (10/18, A19, 748K) reports, "Studds married Dean Hara in 2004 after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts. But Hara will not be eligible to receive any portion of Studds's estimated $114,337 annual pension because the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act bars the federal government from recognizing Studds's marriage. Peter Graves, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the congressional pension program, said same-sex partners are not recognized as spouses for any marriage benefits. He said Studds's case is the first of its kind known to the agency."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probing California Letter On Immigrant Voting. The New York Times (10/18, McKinley) reports, "Federal and state authorities are trying to determine who sent a letter to some Latinos in Southern California that falsely suggested that it would be a crime for immigrants to vote in the coming election." The Times continues, "The letter, written in formal, sometimes clumsy Spanish and signed 'Sergio Ramirez,' was mailed last week to an undetermined number of people with Spanish surnames in Orange County, the authorities said. It advised recipients that 'if you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration,' or deportation. … While illegal immigrants are barred from voting, legal immigrants who have become citizens are permitted to do so." The Times adds, "The letter also stated that the federal government had installed a computer system to verify the names of new registered voters who vote in October and November and that anti-immigration groups would be able to access that information. Election Day is Nov. 7, but early voting is allowed Oct. 20-29 in Orange County. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, which along with the California attorney general's office is investigating the letter's source, said there was no such database. … 'The letter contains false information,' Ms. Magnuson said."

DOJ_NMG_0082456

Georgia Election Board Approves New Letter To Misinformed Voters. The AP (10/18) reports, "The (Georgia) State Election Board on Tuesday approved a letter that will inform more than 300,000 Georgia voters who were told they needed a photo ID to vote that they can still use 17 forms of identification to cast a ballot on Nov. 7." The AP continues, "The board also approved radio and television public service announcements to be broadcast statewide. The Secretary of State's Office will be responsible for distributing the letter and ads, and will partially fund the efforts." The AP adds, "The mailing is expected to cost $127,000, and the ads will be taped and aired using $16,000 from the election board budget previously reserved for voter education. … Both measures were approved at a special meeting called by election board member David Worley after he discovered nearly 200,000 voters - not the 20,000 initially reported by Vice Chair Claud 'Tex' McIver - were told they would need to get a photo ID at the polls. … In all, the board of elections contacted by mail 305,000 registered voters believed to lack state-issued photo identification. Most received letters after a Sept. 19 ruling by Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford declaring the photo ID law violated the Georgia Constitution as an undue burden on voters."

FBI Forwards Results Of Arkansas Police Beating Probe To DOJ. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (10/18, Hale-Shelton) reports, "The FBI has forwarded information from its investigation into Russellville police officers' fatal encounter with Bobby Joe Rylee last summer to the Civil Rights Division of the U. S. Department of Justice." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "The Washington-based office will determine whether a federal civil-rights violation occurred in the forcible arrest of Rylee on July 15 in a parking lot along Arkansas 7 in Russellville, said Steven Frazier, a spokesman for the FBI office in Little Rock. … Rylee, 61, quit breathing several hours after police took him to the Pope County jail. He died five days later in a Little Rock hospital." The Democrat-Gazette adds, "Russellville Police Chief James Bacon has said he understood the FBI was investigating at the request of Rylee's family. Frazier previously declined to comment on an ongoing investigation, which is FBI policy. .. .In August, Prosecuting Attorney David Gibbons of Clarksville declined to charge four Russellville police officers, saying they were justified in the force they used to subdue and arrest Rylee. Police said Rylee had fought with them and stabbed one officer in the arm with a ballpoint pen, which Gibbons concluded was a deadly weapon. … Rylee's family filed a federal lawsuit in Little Rock last month, contending that Russellville police officers beat Rylee before taking him to jail, where, the lawsuit said, he was refused medical attention despite life-threatening injuries. Police have said Rylee declined medical treatment."

Study Finds Racial Disparities In Breast Cancer Death Rates. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Peres, Kotulak, Gorner) reports, "A study showing an alarming gap in breast cancer death rates for black and white women in Chicago has mobilized health experts to find the root causes and recommend within a year ways to reduce the unusually high mortality among African-Americans. Why black women are more likely to die of breast cancer is unclear, but medical leaders said genetics, lack of awareness about breast self-examination, inability to afford routine mammograms and limited access to medical facilities may play crucial roles." The study," which has not yet been published or undergone the scrutiny of peers, found that the odds that a woman will die of breast cancer has been declining steadily for close to two decades, yet African-American women have been seeing the reverse."

Comedian's Mother Claims She Was Discriminated Against At Restaurant. The AP (10/17, Smith) reported, "Rose Rock, the mother of comedian Chris Rock, claims she was racially discriminated against when she was seated but ignored for more than a half hour at a Cracker Barrel restaurant along the South Carolina coast. Rock said Tuesday she planned to sue the Lebanon, Tenn.-based company." Rock "said she and her 21-year-old daughter were the only blacks at the chain's Murrells Inlet restaurant in April. She said when she asked the manager about the delay she was told they could have a free meal." The AP adds, "The Rev. Al Sharpton will join Rock on Wednesday in South Carolina to announce that Sharpton's Action Network will finance the planned lawsuit."

DOJ_NMG_0082457

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Gives Antitrust Nod To Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Of Gold Kist. The AP (10/18) reports, "Chicken producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. on Tuesday said federal regulators have cleared its proposed acquisition of Atlanta-based poultry company Gold Kist Inc., which opposes the bid." The AP continues, "Pilgrim's Pride launched its hostile $20-a-share takeover bid last month, after Gold Kist declined to make a deal in August, the company has said. The offer represents a premium of 55 percent over Gold Kist's closing stock price on Aug. 18. .. .Gold Kist has said the offer is not in the best interest of its shareholders." The AP adds, "On Tuesday, Pilgrim's Pride said the antitrust division of the Justice Department granted an early expiration to the waiting period mandated by antitrust laws. … Pilgrim's Pride President and Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby Jr. called the move 'a positive step forward in our efforts to acquire Gold Kist.'"

Kucinich Wants DOJ Antitrust Probe Of Giant Eagle Ohio Store Purchase. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/18, Lindeman) reports, "Ohio congressman Dennis J. Kucinich, concerned about losing jobs in his region, is asking federal officials to look at potential antitrust issues when considering O'Hara-based grocer Giant Eagle's plans to buy 18 stores in the Cleveland area." The Post-Gazette continues, "Rep. Kucinich, the former Cleveland mayor, presidential candidate and a fifth-term Democrat who is up for re-election, this week sent a letter to the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission asking that they investigate the potential for the sale to impact the price of food in the Cleveland area. .. .Giant Eagle, already a major player in the northeast Ohio market, said last week it would buy 18 Tops Market stores for an undisclosed amount from Dutch owner Ahold. The parent company put 46 Tops stores up for sale earlier this year and hopes to have buyers for the remaining 28 stores by the end of the year. .. .The O'Hara company supplied about 45 percent of the Cleveland-Elyria-Mentor grocery market as of June, according to TradeDimensions International in Wilton, Conn. Tops claimed a little more than 20 percent while Wal-Mart had about 6 percent." The Post-Gazette adds, "An antitrust review would try to determine if, after the sale, Giant Eagle could control the market to the point it could significantly raise prices, said Robert Fleishman, an antitrust lawyer with Washington, D.C., law firm Steptoe & Johnson. That might be hard to do in an era when supermarkets face increasing competition from retailers such as Target as well as dollar stores and convenience stores. .. .Even if the overall deal is not a problem, there might be particular Tops locations that officials would be concerned about. When the owner of Macy's bought Kaufmann's, the retailer agreed to sell certain overlapping locations to department store competitors, if possible. .. .However, Giant Eagle officials do not believe there's a problem. 'Our attorneys researched the issue carefully and have advised that there are no antitrust problems with this acquisition,' spokesman Dan Donovan said in an e-mailed response."

SCOTUS To Weigh DOJ's Ability To Renege On Immunity Deals. The New Jersey Law Journal (10/18, Brennan) reports, "A 3rd Circuit case at the door of the U.S. Supreme Court will test the federal government's power to revoke immunity from prosecution granted to antitrust violators who agree to rat on their rivals." The Journal continues, "During an Oct. 27 conference, the Court will decide whether to hear Stolt-Nielsen, S.A. v. U.S., 06-97, which would test whether a court can enjoin the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from withdrawing immunity promised under its Corporate Leniency Program. .. .The case piques the interest of not only antitrust lawyers but also white-collar criminal defense attorneys, because the lifting of immunity means that all items of evidence a cooperating company has willingly handed over can become weapons in the government's arsenal. … 'Stolt could have broad implications in every instance in which the government promises a benefit to a defendant in exchange for cooperation,' says Alison Smith, a former Antitrust Division lawyer now at Haynes & Boone in Houston. 'A corporation considering applying for immunity must now question whether the evidence it provides to the government will simply be used against it.'" The Journal notes, "Smith says an eventual ruling by the Court 'could clarify the nature and extent of the defendants' constitutional rights in these agreements' and 'could determine the limits of the government's ability to revoke agreements unilaterally and the power of the courts to restrain the government's decision to prosecute.' … Demonstrating the gravity of the case, no fewer than nine amici curiae have filed briefs supporting the petition for certiorari. One of them is the Association of Corporate Counsel, led by senior vice president and general counsel Susan Hackett. 'The impact on my members is their concern that they can no longer make rational decisions that would suggest predictable results,' she says."

DOJ_NMG_0082458

Chicago Mercantile Exchange To Buy Chicago Board Of Trade. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Burns) reports that Chicago's two major futures exchanges yesterday "announced an $8 billion merger, as the stock market's hunger for their shares overcame long-standing differences." The Chicago Mercantile Exchange "said it has agreed to buy its longtime rival" the Chicago Board of Trade "in a deal that would put its leadership in control of the combined business. … The Merc's deal for the Board of Trade is expected to be completed by the middle of 2007."

The Financial Times (10/18, Cameron) reports, "A combination of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the smaller Chicago Board of Trade would create the world's largest futures exchange. The merged group would have an estimated annual $125m in synergies to fund expansion into Europe and Asia, as well as fast-growing areas such as credit derivatives and foreign exchange, which remain dominated by over-the-counter trading." The Times adds, "The announcement follows a year of talks and flirtations with rival exchanges."

A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, Lucchetti, MacDonald, Taylor) reports, "As the biggest deal yet in a global consolidation of the financial-exchange industry, the plan sets aside more than a century of crosstown rivalry." The Journal adds, "The Chicago deal illustrates the increasingly rapid pace at which financial exchanges world-wide are consolidating to lift profits by cutting costs. Exchanges have morphed from member-owned clubs into profit-hungry publicly traded companies. This gives them an incentive to make acquisitions and also a currency, their stock, with which to do so."

An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, Carey, Hallinan) says the deal secures Chicago's place "as derivatives market to the world. … Though the two exchanges employ just 2,200, they have helped to keep the city a financial center even as its home-grown banking industry has steadily been bought out by larger rivals. The exchanges have also spawned numbers of trading firms."

The New York Times (10/18, Barrionuevo) reports, "By combining, the Chicago exchanges, to be named the CME Group, will have average daily trading volume of close to nine million contracts a day, representing $4.2 trillion in notional value, or the amount of the underlying assets, not the value of the contracts themselves. By a comparison of sorts, some 1.8 billion shares, or $87.2 billion, are traded on average on the New York Stock Exchange, the world's biggest stock market, every day, although those shares, unlike derivatives, represent direct ownership stakes."

Crain's Chicago Business (10/18) reports, "Exchange officials are assuming that antitrust concerns won't stop creation of the world's largest futures market, even though the proposed acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade would give the Chicago Mercantile Exchange a near monopoly on U.S. futures trading. … 'We've been very well advised by the Department of Justice on antitrust issues, and we're not expecting any regulatory issues,' Merc CEO Craig Donohue told investors Tuesday in a conference call." Crain's continues, "A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the regulatory outlook, nor would she confirm whether any informal meetings already have taken place on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.'s proposed acquisition of CBOT Holdings Inc. … The merger must also be approved by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and exchange officials said it faces 'modest' regulatory reviews overseas. A CFTC spokesman says the exchanges mainly have to certify that their bylaws and surveillance systems meet the agency's requirements. … That means the biggest hurdle is likely to be any antitrust questions the deal raises with either the Federal Trade Commission or the Justice Department, the latter of which is considered more likely to be the agency that reviews exchange mergers such as this."

Tata Steel Seeks To Buy Corus For $8 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Bellman, Singer) reports that Tata Steel Ltd. Has proposed to buy British steelmaker Corus Group PLC "for about £4.4 billion ($8 billion)," in what would "represent the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company and underscore the loosening of India's regulatory environment. Tata's proposal, which would create a major global steel company, is expected to receive a recommendation from Corus's board later this week. Tata is likely to quickly clear India's foreign-exchange hurdles, where in some cases a committee must give permission for an Indian company to raise money for overseas activities."

DOJ_NMG_0082459

Eli Lilly Agrees To By Icos Corp. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Carreyrou) reports, "Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to acquire biotechnology company Icos Corp. for $2.1 billion in a move to gain full ownership of the erectile-dysfunction drug Cialis. As the sole owner of Cialis, Eli Lilly is expected to muster a stronger challenge to Pfizer Inc.'s Viagra, the first drug approved for erectile dysfunction and the market leader in the U.S., with more than 50% of the market. Cialis -- made by the two companies' joint venture, Lilly Icos LLC -- has a 25% market share." The Journal adds, "Under the terms of the deal, Icos shareholders will receive $32 for each share of Icos common stock. The bid represents an 18% premium to Icos's closing price Monday of $27.12."

Vivendi Sues Two Internet Companies Over Video File Sharing. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, B3, Smith, Delaney) reports, "Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group filed copyright-infringement lawsuits against two Internet companies, including one acquired by Sony Corp., over the ability they give users to upload and download video content with their Web sites. … The suits, against Sony Pictures Entertainment's Grouper Networks Inc. and Bolt Inc., mark the first time a major media company has tried to use the courts to narrowly interpret 'safe harbor' protections provided by the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998 so it would exclude video-sharing sites." The Journal adds, "Filed Monday in US District Court for California's Central District, the suits follow recent deals reached by Universal and two other big music companies to license their video and music content to video-sharing giant YouTube Inc. A person familiar with the Grouper and Bolt matters said Universal had discussed licensing agreements with those companies, but said the talks never progressed."

Record Labels See Marketing Opportunity In Music Piracy. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, B1, Angwin, McBride, Smith) reports that "there's a growing recognition among some record executives and performers that the people who are downloading illegally are frequently huge music fans and that marketing to them may be more desirable in the long run than suing or otherwise harassing them." By planting so-called decoy files, "and then planting those files prominently on file-sharing sites, record labels and other marketers can turn what is now an antipiracy tool into an advertising medium." The Journal adds, "Audioslave, Ice Cube, Yellowcard and other music groups have used decoy files for their own version of viral marketing. With help from niche companies like Sparkart LLC and NFA Group's BuyDRM, they put snippets of a song into the files with the promise that a stream of the entire song will be 'unlocked' for everyone once the promotion is forwarded to enough people. The hope is that this will motivate people to send the file to lots of friends."

Record Industry Files 8,000 File Sharing Suits. Meanwhile, the AP (10/18, Wardell) reports, "The international record industry filed thousands more lawsuits around the world Tuesday against people it accuses of illegally sharing digital music. The International Federation of the Phonographic Industry filed 8,000 cases in 17 countries, including its first in South America and Eastern Europe. The lawsuits, which are aimed at 'uploaders,' include criminal and civil cases. Uploaders have put hundreds or thousands of copyrighted songs onto Internet file-sharing networks and offered them to millions of people worldwide without permission from the copyright owners. The industry contends that such file-sharing has cost it billions of dollars in lost revenue."

GM's Wagoner Called Corporate America's "Comeback Kid." Paul Ingrassia, a former Detroit bureau chief at The Wall Street Journal, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A20), "Rick Wagoner, the CEO of General Motors, has to be corporate America's Comeback Kid. But after a dramatic week in the battle to reshape GM and the global auto industry, Las Vegas billionaire Kirk Kerkorian -- GM's largest individual shareholder and Mr. Wagoner's nemesis -- might still hold a winning hand. Just six months ago, Mr. Wagoner seemed on the verge of being fired. … But Mr. Wagoner gamely fought back." Ingrassia adds, "Scenario No. 1 at GM, clearly the best for all concerned, is that Mr. Wagoner succeeds in producing a durable turnaround. Mr. Kerkorian would be proven wrong about Mr. Wagoner, but one suspects that doubling his $1.6 billion investment in General Motors would be ample balm for the billionaire's public wounds. … This is a high-stakes poker game among rich and powerful men to control and shape one of the world's largest and most visible industries -- and one that tugs at emotions ranging from national pride to consumers' desires. Mr. Wagoner has just won a big hand. But the best bet is that the game will continue."

DOJ_NMG_0082460

ENVIRONMENT:

Nuclear Plant Security Union Criticizes New DOE Policy. Under the headline, "Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules for Nuclear Plant Guards," the Washington Post's (10/18, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Two years ago, the Energy Department announced plans for creating 'a special elite federal force' to protect high-priority nuclear plants," but the Post notes that these "elite combat units" are made up not of government workers but "contractors that provide guards and security officers." According "to union officials, the contract officers are increasingly concerned about their employment status and would like the option to shift to the federal workforce," especially since DOE "plants and facilities that use nuclear weapons material," are "expanding the number of security jobs covered by rigorous physical fitness standards, and many officers are concerned they will lose their jobs." The Post adds that the "National Council of Security Police, a union group representing officers at nuclear facilities, thinks the department's plans will undercut the goal of enhanced security in the post-Sept. 11 world."

Studies Find Benefits Of Eating Fish Exceed Risks. The Washington Post (10/18, A14, Squires) reports, "The health benefits of eating fish regularly outweigh the danger from mercury and other contaminants even for pregnant women and children, two major reports concluded yesterday as scientists tried to resolve a slippery question that has long vexed consumers." The Post continues, "The findings, which were reached by independent teams of scientists, pointed to significant benefits for both young and old. In adults, the death rate from heart disease was 36 percent lower among those who ate fish twice a week compared with those who ate little or no seafood, according to a study being published today in the Journal of the American Medical Association. Overall mortality was 17 percent lower, the study by Harvard School of Public Health researchers found. … A second, federally funded report released by the Institute of Medicine (IOM) echoed the conclusion that the heart benefits of eating seafood outweigh the risks and said infants also benefit from the healthy fats found in seafood." The Post adds, "Omega-3 fatty acids found in fish promote healthy vision and brain development in infants whose mothers consume fish or seafood during pregnancy or while nursing, the report said. These healthy fats also appear to decrease the risk of delivering a preterm, low-birth-weight baby. … Even so, because of methyl mercury concerns, the IOM report stuck with the current federal guidelines that advise women who are nursing, pregnant or plan to become pregnant, as well as children age 12 and younger, to refrain from eating swordfish, shark, tilefish and king mackerel. These two groups can safely consume up to 12 ounces of other fish per week, the report said, but they should also limit white (albacore) tuna to six ounces a week because of its high levels of methyl mercury, which can be toxic to the brain and hearing."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Criticizes FBI Sentinel Staffing Priorities. Federal Computer Week (10/17, Hubler) reported on its Web site, "The FBI is moving quickly to staff its six-year, $425 million Sentinel program, which will replace the agency's failed Virtual Case File project and antiquated intelligence analysis and investigative case management systems, according to a new Government Accountability Office report prepared for the House Judiciary Committee. But the report states that the Sentinel staffing process is focusing only on the program office's immediate staffing needs," and "GAO warned that 'unless the FBI adopts a more strategic approach to managing human capital for the Sentinel program and treats human capital as a program risk, the chances of delivering required intelligence and investigative support capabilities in a timely and cost-effective manner are reduced.'" FCW noted, "According to the report, the FBI has agreed with the recommendations and is taking steps to correct the program."

San Francisco Marijuana Dispensary Director Released On $1 Million Bond. The Bay City News Wire (10/17) reports a medical marijuana dispensary director who "is accused of marijuana cultivation and money laundering was granted release on $1 million bond by a federal magistrate in San Francisco Tuesday. Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative in San Francisco, is one of 15 people arrested in a sweep by federal agents on Oct. 3. … U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration regional chief Frederico Pena said after the Oct. 3 arrests that anyone who breaks the federal laws to run an allegedly lucrative drug trade 'is not compassionate, they're criminal.' An affidavit filed in the case by a DEA agent alleges that cash deposits to a New Remedies Cooperative bank account in Hercules amounted to more than $2.3 million between December 2005 and July 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0082461

The San Francisco Chronicle (10/17, Egelko) reports DEA agents "seized nearly 13,000 marijuana plants, $125,000 and four vehicles, including Rose's leased Porsche, at a dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District and other sites in San Francisco and Oakland. The raid was one of a recent series of enforcement actions by federal authorities against medical marijuana clubs and suppliers in California, where voters passed an initiative in 1996 allowing patients to use the drug with a doctor's recommendation." Attorney Nanci Clarence "disputed an Oct. 3 assertion by Javier Pena, regional director of the DEA, that Rose and his fellow defendants were 'using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars' under the guise of serving medical patients."

Illinois Drug Investigation Nets Eighth Guilty Plea. The Springfield (IL) State Journal Register (10/17) reports a man federal prosecutors "say was at the center of a high-profile drug investigation last fall pleaded guilty Monday to drug charges and agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties in Springfield and Taylorville." The Journal Register says Danny J. Sidener Jr. "pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Jeanne Scott to conspiracy to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine," as well as other charges. Sidener "is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with the case, which began with indictments last fall. … The charges are the result of an Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Springfield Police Department, Illinois State Police and the Central Illinois Enforcement Group."

Nevada To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana. The AP (10/18, Chereb) reports, "Gambling, prostitution, and now pot? Organizers of a Nevada ballot measure hope voters in a state where almost everything goes will go one better and legalize marijuana." The AP continues, "If it passes Nov. 7, Nevada will be the first state to allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops." The AP adds, "The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, which has pushed medical marijuana and decriminalization laws around the country, thinks Nevada - with its embrace of certain vices and its streak of Western independence - is a perfect venue. … In an editorial last spring, the rural Lahontan Valley News argued that gambling, Nevada's most powerful industry, caters to 'visceral pleasures,' and that it would hypocritical to oppose the legalization of marijuana on moral grounds. … Proponents of the measure also argue that the legal system wastes time and money on low-level marijuana offenses, and that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement to focus on violent crime and more dangerous drugs such as methamphetamine." The AP notes, "Opponents, including law enforcement, the nation's drug czar, and civic and business groups, argue the measure would encourage the use of other drugs, and they question whether it will even prove to be a good source of tax revenue."

US Anti-Narcotics Official Notes Increasingly Pure Heroin, Warns Of Price Drop. The AP (10/17) reports a senior U.S. anti-narcotics official said Tuesday that "Skyrocketing opium production in Afghanistan has led to increasingly pure heroin being sold in Europe and prices could fall if the trend continues. Thomas Schweich, principal U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics, issued the warning after the United Nations reported last month that Afghanistan's opium production for 2006 increased 49 percent from last year, exceeding the demands of the world's heroin users by a third. … Despite the strong increase in Afghanistan's opium production for 2006, the Afghan and U.S. governments have no plans to change counter-narcotics strategy in the region, Schweich said. 'When the U.N. came out with those statistics, that's for planting that occurred the previous fall,' said Schweich. 'They really reflect the relatively ineffective delivery of the program in its very first year.'"

UN Calls On NATO, Afghan Troops To Attack Heroin Labs. The AP (10/17) reports Afghanistan's opium production "has soared 'out of control,' the U.N. drugs and crime agency warned Tuesday, adding that proceeds from the opium harvest were being used to fund the resurgent Taliban. The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime is calling on NATO and Afghan troops to attack heroin labs, opium bazaars and convoys transporting the narcotic, said Preeta Bannerjee, a spokeswoman for the agency. Opium production in Afghanistan rose 59 percent in 2006 to a record 165,000 hectares (408,000 acres) — representing 92 percent of the world's opium, according to U.N. figures."

DOJ_NMG_0082462

UN: Opium Poppy Cultivation Drops In Golden Triangle. UPI (10/17) reports Opium poppy cultivation in Laos, Myanmar and Thailand, the Golden Triangle, "dropped 29 percent last year, the U.N. drug agency reported Monday. The region is the world's second-largest source of opium, although it is now dwarfed by Afghanistan, the Office on Drugs and Crime report said. Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa said Afghanistan will soon be the only source if the trend continues."

On its Web site, Voice of America (10/16) reports, "Burma, the main poppy growing country of the region, reported a more than 30-percent decline in areas under cultivation from the previous year. … The decrease in Burmese production means that a plan to eradicate opium in the Golden Triangle by 2014 remains on target."

Report: Aghan Government Orders Closing Of Senlis Council Offices. BBC News (10/17) reports the Afghan government "has ordered the closure of all offices of a group that wants to promote new ways of dealing with the global drugs problem. The Interior Ministry said the Senlis Council, had been 'confusing farmers' and had been a factor in the increase in poppy cultivation. Senlis has suggested the legal use of Afghan opium for medical purposes." However, a spokesman for Senlis "said it had not received any formal notification that its offices were to be closed."

IG Report Finds Prisoner Flights Expensive. The AP (10/18, Jordan) reports, "Pricey contracts and empty seats plague government flights that move U.S. prisoners to new jails and deport illegal immigrants, a Justice Department review concluded Tuesday." The AP continues, "Additionally, the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transport System does not always have large enough crews to subdue onboard security threats, Justice Department Inspector General Glen A. Fine found. … 'Given the variety of transportation needs and the nature of the individuals being transported, inherent risks exist in managing a transportation system like JPATS,' Fine concluded, using the acronym for the air transit system." The AP adds, "The U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement use and pay for the flights. More than 305,000 prisoners and illegal aliens flew on them last year, costing an estimated $87 million. … The program makes sure prisoners and illegal immigrants make their court appointments, are transferred efficiently and are deported quickly. … But the review found several flaws, including that: … The government pays far more to lease large jets under multiple-year contracts than it would by buying the aircraft outright. … Poor planning led to empty seats on the flights, some of which were only half-full during an audit between 2004 and the last three months of 2005. … Only 13 percent of 1,028 flights audited had a larger security crew aboard than required."

The Washington Times (10/18, Seper) reports, "A government-operated service that transports prisoners and aliens in federal custody throughout the United States, Central America and the Caribbean does not have the means to ensure that safety procedures are being followed and lacks the ability to predict long-term capacity needs, according to a report released yesterday. The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS), run by the U.S. Marshals Service and known to many as 'Con Air,' also needs to reduce costs by maximizing the number of passengers scheduled for each flight."

Washington Women Crossed Line From Environmental Activism To Arson. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/18, Phuong, 129K) reports, "Jennifer Kolar and Lacey Phillabaum seem unlikely criminals. Well-educated young women passionate about environmental causes, they share a love of the outdoors and similar backgrounds. Both grew up in Spokane and attended the same public high school. … The women were concerned about what was going on around them -- the logging of old-growth forests, the slaughter of animals for sport. Like many Northwest activists, they pushed for change. But their activism morphed into something more dangerous -- and now both are headed to prison" for their roles in the 2001 ELF firebombing at the University of Wisconsin. The P-I notes, "Both women are cooperating with authorities and have admitted to belonging to ELF and participating in the UW firebombing. The FBI has branded ELF an underground radical group and a top domestic terrorism threat."

IMMIGRATION:

White House Wants Congress To Send Border Fence Bill For Bush Signing. The Washington Times (10/18, Dinan, 88K) reports the White House is "pleading with Congress to send over the bill authorizing 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border so the president can sign it immediately, but Republican leaders on Capitol Hill want to wait until closer to the election and to have a public signing ceremony." A senior Administration official said, "Send us the damn bill. We'd like to autograph it." The Times adds congressional Republicans "are convinced the issue is a political winner and want to hold onto the bill so it will be signed closer to next month's congressional elections. Once the bill is sent to the president, he has a limited amount of time to sign it before it dies as a pocket veto."

DOJ_NMG_0082463

House Report Says US Border Officials Outgunned By Drug Smugglers. The Washington Times (10/18, Seper, 88K) reports a House Homeland Security subcommittee report says "law-enforcement authorities along the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned and outmanned by drug smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems." The 39-page report "said drug-trafficking organizations and alien-smuggling networks are 'proliferating and strengthening their control' of key corridors along the nation's Southwest; that Mexican drug cartels wield 'substantial control' over the U.S.-Mexico border; and that criminal organizations and networks are 'highly sophisticated and organized.'" It also 'found that drug-trafficking cartels, alien-smuggling networks and U.S.-based street gangs, including MS-13, are increasingly coordinating with one another to achieve their objectives, and that federal, state and local law-enforcement report 'new and ever-increasing levels of ruthlessness and violence' associated with the gangs."

Mayor Touts Hazleton's Ordinances Aimed At Illegal Immigrants. On the CBS Evening News (10/17, story 11, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M), Hazleton, Pennsylvania Mayor Lou Barletta discussed his effort to limit illegal immigrants: "There are up to 20 million illegal aliens in this country right now. They have imposed a tremendous burden on many of America's cities. That's why I took action. I saw my city gripped by fear. Because of violent acts committed by illegal aliens, my residents were afraid to shop or even drive on certain streets. Illegal immigration was draining Hazleton's limited resources. Our small police department, our schools and health care system were beginning to feel the strain. Legal residents were on the verge of being denied the services their tax dollars paid for." In Hazleton, "we created ordinances designed to deter landlords and businesses from representing to and hiring illegals. Those who knowingly break our laws will face financial penalties. These laws will make Hazleton one of the toughest cities in the nation for illegals."

TAX:

Snipes Indicted For Conspiracy, Tax Fraud.

Federal officials announced Tuesday that actor Wesley Snipes has been indicted on charges of conspiracy and tax fraud. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Munoz, Muskal) reported on its web site, "Snipes, 44, was also charged with six counts of failing to file income tax returns. If convicted of all of the charges, he could be sentenced to as much as 16 years in prison." Tuesday's indictment "accuses Snipes, formerly of Windermere, Fla., Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., with conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service and presenting a fraudulent claim for payment to the IRS."

USA Today (10/18, Farrell) reports, "According to the indictment, Snipes allegedly not only avoided paying millions in income taxes from 1999 through 2004, but he fraudulently tried to get an $11 million refund for taxes paid in the 1990s."

The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Matthews) reports, "The charges stem from a well-known but illegal scheme that asserts that US citizens only have to pay taxes on income earned from foreign sources. The scheme purports that wages and other income earned in the US aren't taxable. The Internal Revenue Service and various courts have ruled that the argument is a misreading of the tax code." The Journal adds, "If convicted on all eight counts handed up against him, Mr. Snipes could be sentenced to a maximum of 16 years in prison."

The AP (10/18, Davis) reports, "The indictment said Snipes conspired with American Rights Litigators' founder Eddie Ray Kahn and tax preparer Douglas P. Rosile Sr. to file false refund claims based on a bogus argument that only income from foreign sources was subject to taxation. … That included a claim for a $7.3 million refund for 1997, in which an amended tax return reported Snipes' adjusted income as zero. … The Justice Department sued Rosile in 2002 for allegedly filing bogus tax refund claims totaling more than $36 million on behalf of clients in 32 states. The suit is still pending."

DOJ_NMG_0082464

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Defense Spending Bill, Details Reservations About Specific Provisions. The AP (10/18) reports, "With a long list of caveats, President Bush signed a bill Tuesday authorizing $532.8 billion in defense spending, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for members of the military. The measure, for the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1, authorizes $70 billion in supplemental funding to support the war on terror's operation costs, personnel expenses, equipment needs and other costs." The White House "released two pages of administration disagreements and reservations about provisions that lawmakers put in the bill." Bush "took issue with a provision that would require the Navy to keep its current number of 12 aircraft carriers. The administration is seeking permission to retire the USS John F. Kennedy." The statement "singled out about a dozen provisions that would require the White House to provide Congress with information on various subjects. … Among other disputed areas, the statement said sections of the bill purported to make consultations with certain lawmakers a precondition to carrying out the law. The statement said it would regard that requirement 'as calling for but not mandating such consultation.'"

Bill Limits Interest Rates On Consumer Loans To Servicemen. USA Today (10/18, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "Consumer loans to servicemembers will be limited to 36% annual interest next year under a law…Bush signed Tuesday that is aimed at store-front lenders clustered around military bases." The law "is a response to 'payday advance' stores that market short-term loans, typically charging $15 or $20 per $100 loan for periods of up to two weeks or a borrowers' next payday. Borrowers generally renew loans several times before paying them off, and the fees result in effective annual interest rates of 400% or more, a Defense Department study concluded." Military officers "pushed for the law, saying the loans saddled low-paid enlisted men and women with debts that ruined their finances, jeopardized security clearances and left them unable to deploy to Iraq or other assignments."

Bush Signs Updated National Space Policy. The Washington Post (10/18, Kaufman, 748K) reports on its front page that President Bush "has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone 'hostile to U.S. interests.'" The document, "the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy largely in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy." In written comments, NSC spokesman Frederick Jones said an update "was needed to 'reflect the fact that space has become an even more important component of U.S. economic, national and homeland security.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/18, 918K) publishes a brief report based on the Washington Post story, while UPI (10/18) notes, "Steven Aftergood, the government transparency campaigner at the Federation of American Scientists, says the new policy, released recently by the White House, 'creates overlapping and possibly conflicting responsibilities' for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld."

Bush Officials Say Faith-Based Initiative Critic Kuo Got It Wrong. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/17) reported, "An even-tempered White House is disputing former faith-based staffer David Kuo's claim in his new book that the President only gave lip-service and chump change to social conservatives. While his sharply critical 'Tempting Faith: An Insider Story of Political Seduction' has generated a lot of anger in some White House circles, officials who've worked on the faith-based initiative and interacted with social conservatives are gently rapping Kuo for missing the whole point of President Bush's efforts on behalf of the target group. Two told the Bulletin and US News that conservatives, while certainly eager for the millions of dollars promised but not fully delivered by the faith-based initiative, are more interested in the policy and long-lasting appointments made by the President." One official said, "The narrative of the book is that social conservatives get spin and trinkets but no policy." But he added "the President has delivered 'in spades' on issues the conservatives, especially evangelicals, care about. The officials listed four key issues: abortion, marriage, judges, and character." MSNBC's Hardball (10/17, Matthews) said "the Bush administration is up in arms" over the book.

Towey Takes Issue With Book's Assertions. Jim Towey, former Director of the White House Office of Faith Based Initiatives, said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/17), "The problem is that he's allowing the impression that the faith-based initiative was political, that the President's a hypocrite, that the people on the staff were manipulating evangelicals.

DOJ_NMG_0082465

And all of that's just not true. So yes, it's a problem for me because it goes to the heart of the integrity of the work we do at the White House. I was very proud as a Democrat on senior staff to do a very even-handed job with the initiative. We helped with the poor. We expanded some compassion programs, did it in a constitutional way. And the President had given me marching orders to keep it focused there and we did. So a book comes out like this, it's a shock to us."

SCOTUS Sees Increase In Sealed Filings. The Legal Times (10/18, Mauro) reports, "When the Supreme Court debates the constitutionality of the federal 'partial birth abortion' law next month, it will have some sensitive information in its hands that no member of the public can see." The Times continues, "Specifically, the justices will have the full transcript of a 2004 deposition by an Oregon doctor who apparently mentioned the names of colleagues in the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists who may have performed abortions. … It was part of the file in the case of Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, but when it made its way to the Supreme Court this summer, the organization and Planned Parenthood requested that the parts of the doctor's deposition that name doctors be filed with the Court under seal." The Times adds, "Solicitor General Paul Clement concurred and filed a motion, and on Oct. 2, the Court said yes -- one of six cases that day in which the Court granted motions to file petitions under seal. It was, according to a database search, the largest number of unrelated cases in which the Court granted such motions in a single day. .. .In the Planned Parenthood case, the Court's action means an extra measure of privacy for a handful of physicians. As Daniel Edelman, a lawyer for the physician who was deposed, put it, 'The last thing we'd need is for some lunatic to get names from the deposition and go and attack one of the doctors.'" The Times notes, "But in some of the other cases, the justification for secrecy is less obvious. And to some, the day's actions symbolize a little-noticed trend over the past decade toward allowing secret filings at the Supreme Court. Whereas decades ago such motions were discouraged and often denied at the Supreme Court, now they are routinely granted. No motion to file under seal has been denied since 2003. The Court itself votes on the motions without any hearing at which opposition can be heard. Typically, when the Court grants a motion to seal, a redacted version is made part of the public record. … The number of filings under seal is still tiny -- only 12 in this calendar year out of more than 7,000 petitions filed. And Court insiders assert that the spike in motions granted is a fluke, not a reflection of any change in policy."

Bush To Tout NCLB At North Carolina School. WXII-TV Winston-Salem, North Carolina (10/17, 11:39 am EDT) reported, "President George W. Bush is visiting North Carolina for the third time in 2006 and appearing in the Piedmont-Triad for the first time in more than 10 months. Bush on Wednesday will visit Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School in Guilford County" where he will "speak about the No Child Left Behind Act." NC13 Rep. Brad Miller (D) "called the No Child Left Behind Act one of Bush's 'most well-known policy failures.' Miller claimed the Bush administration has underfunded the initiative by $40 billion over the last four years."

The Reidsville Review (NC) (10/18, Williams) reports, "Rockingham County Schools Superintendent Rodney Shotwell has plans to attend the presidential address Wednesday at Falkener Elementary in neighboring Guilford County." Shotwell said that "there are positives and negatives to the NCLB legislation." The positive is that NCLB "forces us to look at all of a school's subgroups." But Shotwell "would like to see a change in the funding formula under NCLB so that schools would not suffer."

Math Study Says Other Countries Expect More From Their Students. The AP (10/18, Ben Feller) reports, "Kids who are turned off by math often say they don't enjoy it, they aren't good at it and they see little point in it. Who knew that could be a formula for success? The nations with the best scores have the least happy, least confident math students, says a study by the Brookings Institution's Brown Center on Education Policy." Author Tom Loveless said, "We might want to focus on the math that kids are learning and just be a little less obsessed with the fact that they have to enjoy every minute of it." He added that "other countries do better than the United States because they seem to expect more from students."

USA Today (10/18, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the study found that "the 10 'happiest' nations all performed below the international average. The 10 'unhappiest' all scored above average." And "U.S. eighth-graders fell somewhere in the middle and followed the same pattern." The study is based on the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study.

DOJ_NMG_0082466

The Washington Post (10/18, A2, Mathews, 748K) reports the report "is likely to stoke a debate over teaching math and other subjects that has divided the United States for at least a century." The study also found that "in most countries, including Korea and the United States, students who like math and think they are good at it have higher math scores than those who don't."

Reid To Repay Campaign For Condo Staff Tips. ABC World News (10/17, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid, is dealing with a new ethics controversy. He says he's going to repay his campaign for $3,300 in campaign funds that he used to give his apartment building staff Christmas bonuses. Federal law bars campaign funds for personal expenses. Yesterday, Reid said he will file a new disclosure statement on a controversial land deal that earned him $700,000 in profit."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Blitzer) reported Reid is "facing some new legal and ethical questions today." Reid "already was on the defensive over a land deal. Now he is dealing with a flap over tips and how he paid for them and it's definitely not helping Democrats make their culture of corruption argument against Republicans." CNN (Bash) added, "It's not a leading issue in this midterm campaign, but Democrats do, as you say, like to talk about what they call a Republican culture of corruption, both here in the capital and out on the campaign trail. Now, three weeks before election day, Republicans say Democrats have a problem of their own. Democratic leader Harry Reid lives in this Ritz Carlton in Washington. At Christmas time the Senator gave doormen and other employees $3300 in tips over three years, a generous gesture, but the money came from Reid's campaign coffers, a possible violation of election law." Reid "said his lawyers had assured him it was OK, but to be safe, he is, quote, reimbursing the campaign from my own pocket."

The Hill (10/18, Schor) reports, "Conservative group Citizens United yesterday announced plans to file a complaint with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) about Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) use of campaign funds to contribute to the Christmas fund in his condominium." Citizens United President David Bossie said, "Senator Reid knows better than to use political contributions for personal services."

Lewis Spent $750,000 On Legal Fees. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Simon, 918K) reports Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), "the House Appropriations Committee chairman whose ties to lobbyists have come under scrutiny, has spent more than $750,000 from his campaign fund for defense lawyers, according to his latest spending report." Lewis has "denied any wrongdoing. But the investigation is taking a toll on his campaign treasury." Legal fees "were his single biggest expense for the most recent period: More than $550,000 was paid to the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher between July 1 and Sept. 30. And he paid the firm a $200,000 retainer in June."

Election Angst Boosted Textile Industry Priorities In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A4, Hitt, 2.03M) reports that as lawmakers "hit the home stretch of tight races, textile makers are leveraging voters' economic anxieties to win industry protections and derail free-trade initiatives." Before the congressional recess, "anxious lawmakers shelved several items that the Bush administration had pushed as part of its trade agenda, but which the textile industry opposed. Now the question for the White House is how to get those efforts back on track -- especially if Democrats, who are traditionally less friendly to free trade, take control of one or both houses of Congress in November's voting." The textile industry's "maneuvering shows how Republican vulnerabilities in midterm elections have created opportunities for some special-interest groups." When Rep. Bill Thomas, "chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill Sept. 21 that would give trade preferences to Africa and Haiti, lobbyists for Amtac and the National Council of Textile Organizations, another textile group, swung into action. They were especially worried about provisions in the bill that would allow Haiti to use more foreign-made fabric, such as cheap cloth from China, to make clothes, while still qualifying for duty-free access to the U.S. market." The groups "appealed to Rep. Robin Hayes, a North Carolina Republican, for help." Hayes "agreed to lead the opposition against the Haiti bill," and he "spoke to party leaders, then wrote a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert arguing that the legislation could expose U.S. workers to 'devastating' new competition."

DOJ_NMG_0082467

OTHER NEWS:

Economic Data Suggest Cooling Economy. USA Today (10/18, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Wholesale prices fell in September at the fastest pace in more than three years as energy costs plunged, the government said Tuesday in a report that offered some assurances that inflation is easing. The producer price index, which measures prices paid to factories, farmers and other producers, fell 1.3% in September." That was "the first drop since February and the biggest decline since April 2003, the Labor Department said." The falloff in September "was led by a dramatic drop in energy costs. Gasoline prices fell a record 22.2% last month, while costs for heating oil and natural gas also declined."

NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 4, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Inflation at the wholesale level last month dropped sharply because of those lower oil and gas prices we've been talking about. But the so-called core inflation rate, that's what happens had you strip away all the changeable food and energy prices, jumped sharply." The New York Times (10/18, Peters, 1.21M) titles its report "Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist."

The Financial Times (10/18, Chisholm) reports, "Fears that the US economy may yet experience a hard landing were revived on Tuesday after a report showed industrial production in September fell by much more than expected. … Manufacturing output fell 0.3 per cent, while mining expanded by 0.7 per cent." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A8, Conkey, 2.03M) says the data "suggest a cooling US economy in which inflationary pressures are easing, a combination that could keep the Federal Reserve from changing interest rates anytime soon. … Output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities fell 0.6% in September after a flat performance in August, the Federal Reserve reported." The decline "was particularly sharp at utilities, which produced less power than usual because of mild weather. Many manufacturing industries also ramped down production because of weaker demand for cars and houses." The Labor Department, meanwhile, "said a big drop in oil prices pushed wholesale prices down 1.3% in September, the first time producers of food, energy and materials have seen prices fall since February."

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 3, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was down today about 30 and a half points [to close at 11,950.02]. NASDAQ was also down just under 19 points [to close at 2,344.95]." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, C1, Ng, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.37%, or five points, to 1364.05 and is up 9.3% this year."

Ex-President Bush Says Although Economy Is Good, Consumers May Not See It That Way. The Dallas Morning News (10/18, Robinson-Jacobs, 500K) reports, "Former President George Bush said Tuesday that although he believes the US economy is strong, he's worried that the average citizen might not be getting that message. … 'The unmistakable picture that those statistics mean to me is that the economy is strong,' the 41st president told attendees of the Multi-Unit Foodservice Operators conference, who gave him a standing ovation when he entered the room. 'There is a concerted effort to make it appear that the economy is bad,' said Mr. Bush, the father of President George W. Bush."

Gasoline Tax Hike Considered Unlikely Despite Economists' Support. In an analysis, the Washington Post (10/18, D1, Mufson, 748K) says raising taxes on gasoline or crude oil "might be a simple way to trim U.S. oil imports, reduce greenhouse-gas emissions, encourage alternatives to petroleum and ease world energy shortages. ... Economists and policy experts across the political spectrum think it's a good idea. And with gasoline prices falling, now might be the perfect time to do it without eliciting cries of pain from U.S. drivers... ." However, "Because of the thorny politics of raising taxes, the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal gas levy hasn't changed since Oct. 1, 1993. And few policy experts expect a higher tax soon." The Post says, "Many economists support oil taxes because otherwise the prices paid by consumers do not include costs -- such as pollution -- that society pays separately." An "illustration of political gridlock on the issue is a new Council on Foreign Relations task force report on how U.S. dependence on oil imports undermines U.S. foreign policy. The group agreed that there is a big problem but couldn't agree on how to curb gasoline consumption."

LATimes Calls Alternative Energy Development A National Security Priority. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (10/18, 918K) writes, "For China, India, Japan and every other industrial nation, a steady supply of oil is essential to economic growth. And as competition for oil increases, so does the temptation to make it the focus of foreign policy. Bush has warned against the hazards of this approach, and US history -- especially in the Middle East -- is a catalog of its dangers." But "he'd be more convincing...if his policy more closely matched his rhetoric." Asian powers' "pursuit of policies designed to secure a steady supply of oil...is a geopolitical watershed... . Even if the US were to reduce its oil dependency, its ability to act multilaterally could be constrained by the energy arrangements of other nations. For these and other reasons, the development of alternative energy technologies that can reduce demand at home and be exported abroad is both an economic necessity and a national security priority. It's far too important to be left to the environmentalists -- or the states, the lobbyists (for nuclear power or ethanol) or even to philanthropists such as Richard Branson. In our globalized economies, lasting peace is unlikely without energy security."

DOJ_NMG_0082468

Samuelson Says Politicians' Proposals To Curb Oil Dependence Are Deceptions. In a Washington Post (10/18, 748K) op-ed, columnist Robert J. Samuelson writes that, for years, some remedies to US dependence on imported oil "have been obvious: Tax oil heavily to spur Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to drive a bit less, raise sharply the government's fuel economy standards so those vehicles are available, and allow more oil and gas drilling. In recent years, we've done none of these things." He writes, "Unfortunately, the steps we should take involve immediate political costs -- they'd be unpopular -- while the benefits would emerge slowly and seem modest. ... Any realistic proposal would ignite a firestorm of protest. Environmentalists would denounce more drilling. Auto companies would protest new fuel economy standards. Most important, the public would denounce a steep energy tax... ." Samuelson concludes, "Because Americans want painless salvation, our politicians proffer visions that promise just that: a shift to hydrogen fuel or a surge in ethanol. The first may be futuristic wishful thinking; the second is mainly a costly giveaway to farmers. Both are deceptions, new excuses not to do the 'right thing.'"

Chicago Sued Over Red Light Cameras. USA Today (10/18, Parker) reports, "Cameras that snap photos of motorists running red lights have been upheld as constitutional by courts in five states and Washington, D.C., but some car owners refuse to concede defeat and are continuing to challenge them. … Three Chicago-area car owners are suing the city, which the trio claims ticketed each of them for running red lights even though none of them was at the wheel. In a class-action lawsuit, Parveen Idris of Bloomingdale and two other plaintiffs say the city's ticketing program is unconstitutional because it cranks out $90 tickets to vehicle owners no matter who is driving the car. … Jennifer Hoyle, a spokeswoman for the city's Law Department, says the city expects to prevail in court because other city ordinances that are similarly enforced have survived court challenges."

LATimes Endorses Judges For Reelection. The Los Angeles Times (10/18) editorializes, "Two of California's seven Supreme Court justices are up for retention this year. Carol A. Corrigan was appointed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in January and is facing voters for the first time. Joyce L. Kennard was appointed by former Gov. George Deukmejian in 1989 and has weathered previous elections. Both of these excellent jurists should be retained." The Times adds, "California's Court of Appeal is an intermediate court divided into six geographic districts. … The following justices are on the ballot, have served with distinction and deserve a 'yes' vote: Robert M. Mallano, Frances Rothschild, Roger W. Boren, Victoria M. Chavez, Patti S. Kitching, Richard D. Aldrich, Norman L. Epstein, Thomas L. Willhite, Nora M. Manella, Steve Suzukawa, Richard M. Mosk, Sandy R. Kriegler, Arthur Gilbert, Dennis M. Perluss, Fred Woods, Laurie D. Zelon, Candace D. Cooper and Madeleine Flier." The Times also notes, "For Los Angeles Superior Court, four offices offer voters a choice. For Office No. 8, Bob Henry, a California deputy attorney general, has broad experience in criminal and civil law. For Office No. 18, Daviann Mitchell is a former police officer who now prosecutes gang crimes as a Los Angeles deputy district attorney. Two other current deputy district attorneys also deserve to be elected: Hayden Zacky for Office No. 102 and David W. Stuart for Office No. 144."

Study Finds Widespread Risk Of Reactions To Some Medicines. CBS Evening News 10/17, story 9, 2:45, Couric) broadcasted, "In other health news tonight, did you know 82% of Americans take at least one medication, but sometimes drugs meant to make us better actually do us harm. Dr. Jon Lapook now reports on an important study out today." CBS (Lapook) added, "In a report today, the 'Journal of the American Medical Association' estimates that 700,000 people a year, especially the elderly, experience adverse drug events that lead to emergency room visits."

The AP (10/18, Tanner) reports, "Accidental overdoses and allergic reactions to prescription drugs were the most frequent cause of serious illnesses, according to the study, the first to reveal the nationwide scope of the problem. People older than 65 faced the greatest risks." Patient-safety specialist Bruce Lambert, a professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's college of pharmacy, said, "This is an important study because it reinforces the really substantial risks that there are in everyday use of drugs." Even so, "the study authors and other experts agreed that the 700,000 estimate was conservative because severe drug reactions can often be misdiagnosed."

DOJ_NMG_0082469

Blue Cross Of California To Settle Lawsuits Over Illegal Cancellations. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Girion) reports, "Facing the threat of punishment from regulators, Blue Cross of California has agreed to settle more than 70 lawsuits and claims filed by patients who accused the state's largest health insurer of illegally canceling their coverage after they got sick. The settlements, according to lawyers involved in the cases, include undisclosed monetary awards that would allow former holders of policies sold to individuals to pay off hefty medical bills they were stuck with after losing their insurance. In exchange, the former policyholders agreed to drop allegations that Blue Cross was canceling policies to avoid paying for treatment."

Pirro, Cuomo Clash In Final Debate. The New York Times (10/18, Hicks) reports that New York attorney General candidates Jeanine F. Pirro (R) and Andrew M. Cuomo (D) squared off in their final debate on Tuesday. Pirro attacked Cuomo as an "inexperienced prosecutor devoid of ethics or integrity." She repeatedly targeted Cuomo's "ethics, charging that while housing secretary, he pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials in an agreement signed by Mr. Cuomo's counsel. Years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign." Cuomo "cast Ms. Pirro as a career politician with little experience outside criminal prosecution. He also offered a new attack against his Republican rival. He cited an article in The New York Sun on Tuesday detailing a letter written by" U.S. Senate candidate John Spencer (R), "when Mr. Spencer was mayor of Yonkers. The article stated that Mr. Spencer wrote a 15-page letter to Attorney General Eliot Spitzer accusing Ms. Pirro of using her position as district attorney to protect public officials from scandal and to punish political opponents. 'The office she's seeking is investigating her,' Mr. Cuomo said. Immediately after the debate, Cuomo campaign aides supplied copies of the article to reporters in the television studio, and Mr. Spitzer's office said it had an 'open investigation' into the matter."

Both Parties Mulling Impact Of Potential GOP Congressional Loss. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Baker, Fletcher, 748K) reports that if Democrats "win one or both houses of Congress on Nov. 7, the result will transform the remainder of" President Bush's "time in office and dramatically shift the balance of power in Washington. Ending a dozen years basically passed in exile, congressional Democrats would have a chance to help steer the nation again -- following a campaign spent mostly assailing Bush's vision rather than detailing their own." The White House "says it is not making contingency plans for a Democratic win, but Bush advisers are bracing for what they privately recognize is the increasing likelihood. And Democratic leaders have been conferring about what they would do should voters return them to power." Democrats "could use their ascendance to block Bush's agenda, force him to respond to theirs and begin a new era of aggressive oversight and investigation. A Democratic victory, analysts in both parties said, could mean that some of Bush's tax cuts would not be renewed, attempts to revive his Social Security investment plan would be doomed and efforts to further broaden national security powers in the face of civil liberties concerns would be thwarted." What is "most worrisome to the White House is the subpoena power that Democrats would gain with a majority in the House or Senate." But some Republicans "think that Bush could play off overreaching Democrats as Clinton did with Gingrich. Or he could pivot to the more bipartisan mode he promised to bring from Texas and seize opportunities for progress in areas such as immigration, where his proposed guest-worker program has been blocked by his own party."

Bartlett Says Conservatives Should Not Fear A Democratic Victory In November. Bruce Bartlett, an official under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush, writes in the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M), "Even before the Mark Foley scandal broke, Democrats' chances of getting control of the House of Representatives were pretty good. Now, with the incompetence of the Republican leadership's handling of that affair, the odds of Democratic control are looking very good indeed." Bartlett adds, "My Democratic friends no doubt feel the way we Republicans did in those heady days of 1994 before political reality came knocking. … To all this I say: Ain't gonna happen. For starters, President Bush will still occupy the White House for the next two years. And although his veto pen may have been misplaced for most of the last six years, he found it again this summer." Bartlett concludes, "In short, there is really no reason for conservatives, businessmen or investors to worry particularly about a Democratic victory in November. Congress will be on automatic pilot for the next two years regardless of which party is in control."

DOJ_NMG_0082470

Centrist Politics Seen As Making Comeback. In his Washington Post column (10/18, A21), David Ignatius examines the "overarching battle this year between two visions of America: testing whether it's a country defined by its political center or one defined by its political extremes. This assessment of America's meta-politics is distilled in 'The Way to Win' by Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post. They see "two basic strategic ideas at work in today's politics: the 'synthesizer' approach of former president Bill Clinton, and the 'clarifier' tactics of President Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove." Halperin and Harris say "Clinton Politics" is "the politics of the center. It holds that Americans for the most part, with the exception of irate groups at the edges, are less interested in ideology than in practical solutions to basic problems. People would prefer politics to be polite, civil, and compromise-minded." On the other hand, they say, "Bush Politics is the politics of the base. A successful leader will stand forthrightly on one side of a grand argument. Then he or she will win that argument by sharpening the differences and rallying his most intense supporters to his side." Ignatius adds, "So what's working this campaign season? As I read this year's races, the centrist approach seems to be making something of a comeback."

Democrats Said To Have "First Tier" Of Legislation. In his Washington Post column (10/18, A21), Harold Meyerson says if Democrats win the House, they have "made clear that there's a first tier of legislation they mean to bring to a vote almost immediately after the new Congress convenes. It includes raising the minimum wage, repealing the Medicare legislation that forbids the government from negotiating with drug companies for lower prices, replenishing student loan programs, funding stem cell research and implementing those recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that have thus far languished." And "cognizant that they will owe their victory in part to the public's revulsion at the way Congress does (or avoids) business, the Democrats also plan to revise House rules to enable the opposition party to introduce amendments and to sit on conference committees, from which Republicans have routinely excluded them since Tom DeLay became majority leader. They also will ban members from accepting gifts and paid trips from lobbyists."

Rove "Confident" GOP Will Hold Onto Both House, Senate. The Washington Times (10/18, Curl, 88K) reports Karl Rove "confidently predicted that the Republican Party would hold the House and the Senate in next month's elections, dismissing fallout from the sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley." At a "luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times, Mr. Rove -- who is widely credited as the architect of the party's historic 2002 midterm election gains -- said Republicans are beginning to make significant headway in defining their party's differences from congressional Democrats, especially on national security." Rove said, "I'm confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House. The Foley matter has impact in some limited districts, but the research we have shows that people are differentiating between a vote for their congressman and a member from Florida." Rove added President Bush has "begun to paint this year's election as a choice between strength and weakness on national security -- and the stark differences will show Americans the true nature of Democrats."

Cheney Said To Sound Unsure GOP Will Keep Majorities. The AP (10/18) reports that while President Bush "says flatly that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate," Vice President Dick Cheney "doesn't sound quite so certain." In an interview with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, Cheney said, "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House."

Democrats Said To Have Shot At Winning Both Houses. CBS Evening News (10/17, story 4, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "There's a growing sense up here on Capitol Hill that the Democrats now really have a shot at regaining control of both Houses of Congress. Conventional wisdom has been that it's the Republican control of the House that's really in danger." Democrats "need to take away six Republican seats to win the Senate back. And that has looked unlikely until now. That's because with scandals, the war, and the President with low approval ratings, this is a very difficult environment for Republicans to run, so, Katie, they're just trying to turn out their voters." The GOP advantage on turnout will be "very important to them, particularly in House districts where there may be a one- or two-point margin between the candidates. It's also going to help them get out their conservative base voters." But if "you're running about eight to 10 points behind, forget it. No great voter turnout operation is going to save your seat."

DOJ_NMG_0082471

Morris, McGann Say GOP Base Has Deserted. In their column in The Hill (10/18), Dick Morris and Eileen McGann say, "The Republican base, that vaunted entity whose every mood swing has controlled the zigs and zags of the Bush Administration policy, has moved out, according to the latest Gallup polling. Karl Rove's heroic efforts to preserve its fealty have failed to move Republican base voters. Karl cannot compensate for Bush's failure to project his issues as the midterm disaster for the Republican Party nears." The Gallup poll "of Oct. 6-8 shows that, in the wake of the Foley scandal, the number of 'white frequent churchgoers' who are planning to vote Republican has dropped from 58 percent to 47 percent since last month. The margin of their support for Republicans over Democrats, 26 percentage points in September, has entirely disappeared and the parties are tied among this core element of the Republican base." The Foley scandal "has wrought extraordinary damage to the Republican Party and appears to have had a particularly negative impact on the base."

GOP Incumbents Running Short On Campaign Funds. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A4, Cummings, 2.03M) reports most "embattled Republican House incumbents have less campaign cash than they expected, despite raising more money than their Democratic challengers. Republicans had to spend heavily in recent weeks to buck an unfavorable national climate for the party." The Journal cites the example of Connecticut Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson "spent $3.5 million on her re-election bid through Sept. 30 compared with Democratic challenger Christopher Murphy, who spent just $1.5 million, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission." Johnson "ended the third quarter with $1 million in the bank compared with about $368,000 in Mr. Murphy's account," but "her race is still considered a 'toss up'" by the Cook Political Report. Colby College analyst Anthony Corrado said, "In some ways, the major Republican opponent hasn't been the Democratic challenger as much as it's been the daily news cycle." The Journal adds most Democrats "running for open House seats held by retiring Republicans have raised more cash than their opponents, giving their party a chance to make net gains in the race for control of that chamber."

The Hill (10/18, Kaplan, Blake) reports House Republican incumbents have "socked away more money than their Democratic challengers in 34 of 52 competitive districts and in some cases Republicans lead Democratic challengers by a ratio of seven to one, said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti in a statement." But "some of those figures are misleading because some candidates, such as Democrats Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and Joe Courtney (Conn.), have spent exorbitant sums on television advertising buys." In "seven competitive Senate races, state Treasurer Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) lead incumbent GOP Sens. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.)." In Tennessee's "open seat race, Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) holds a narrow lead over former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R). In Maryland and Minnesota, the candidates are within $500,000 of each other in cash on hand." Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) "holds a commanding lead over Democrat Jim Webb, but Webb raked in $3.4 million in the third quarter. And in Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) has a $4 million lead over challenger Claire McCaskill (D) largely because she has made a large media buy for the final weeks leading up to Election Day."

The Washington Times (10/18, Hurt, 88K) reports National Republicans are "dumping more than $1 million into Senate races in the Democratic strongholds of Maryland and New Jersey but are facing a bleak field elsewhere, strategists from both parties say." While Republican strategists "privately acknowledge that the races look tough for the GOP, they remain confident that they will keep Democrats from gaining the six seats they need to win control of the chamber."

Lack Of Money Hindering Democratic Efforts To Expand Field. The Washington Post (10/18, A12, VandeHei, 748K) reports top Democrats said "they are planning to significantly expand the number of GOP House seats they will target during the final 20 days of the campaign but that financial disputes and fundraising problems are hindering the effort." Democrats said "private polls have convinced top party officials that they could pick up 40 or more seats -- nearly double their internal projections from a week ago -- if they spend enough money on television advertising for long-shot races. Strategists James Carville and Stan Greenberg are among those pleading with party leaders to go deep into debt to run ads in as many as 50 GOP-held districts." Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) "has privately signed off on targeting a new group of GOP incumbents who were once considered safe for reelection, starting with Rep. Gil Gutknecht in rural Minnesota, officials said." Emanuel said he "believes as many as 58 seats are now in play." The Post adds, "Still, several Democrats complained that the party is on the verge of blowing a once-in-a-decade political opportunity because of financial troubles." Harold Ickes – "a Democratic operative who recently created an independent political group called the September Fund with a goal of raising $10 million to $20 million for House and Senate campaigns -- said his group cannot afford to target races beyond those that Democrats have already identified as must-wins to capture control of the House for the first time since 1994." Ickes said his group "has raised between $5 million and $10 million, half its original goal." Ickes said, "It has been more difficult raising money than I expected."

DOJ_NMG_0082472

Flake Says GOP Reliance On Earmarks Leave Majority At Risk. USA Today (10/18, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) reports Rep. Jeff Flake, a "leading Republican critic of special-interest spending earmarks," said the GOP "risks its congressional majority by defending the practice." Flake "said a report Tuesday in USA TODAY was the latest in a series of revelations casting an ethical cloud on earmarks." Flake's opposition to earmarks "helped prompt a temporary House rule change requiring the disclosure of some sponsors of earmarks. He said he hoped that rule could be made permanent but faced opposition from Republican supporters of earmarks." Flake said, "Until we change that mindset, I don't know that we're going to curb the practice (of earmarking). Maybe it'll take two years in the wilderness of being in the political minority. I hope that's not what it takes." USA adds it found "that lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write."

Majority Think Lobbying By Lawmaker's Relatives Wrong. USA Today (10/18, Eisler, Kelley, 2.27M) reports an "overwhelming majority of Americans believe it's wrong for lawmakers and their staffs to have contact with relatives who are lobbyists regarding government matters. But a survey of lawmakers suggests they don't see a problem." A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll "shows that 80% of respondents believe such actions are inappropriate. By contrast, few members of the House and Senate appropriations committees say they have policies that prevent lobbying by relatives." Four committee members "who responded to a USA TODAY survey have policies that prevent relatives from lobbying them or their staffs. All are senators: Dick Durbin, D-Ill., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa." None of the House members "who responded reported having such a policy. The newspaper surveyed all 94 members of the appropriations committees; 37 answered the survey."

Democratic Ads Link Minimum Wage, Congressional Pay Raises. USA Today (10/18, Stone, 2.27M) reports Democratic challengers "in more than two dozen House and Senate races are attacking Republicans in Congress for taking pay raises while voting against a minimum wage increase." The attacks are "contained in television and radio ads running from Washington state to Virginia. In some races, such as House contests in Indiana and Connecticut, Democrats also link pay raises to Republican votes against combat bonuses for U.S. troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." While some of the ads "may fudge the facts, political analysts say the message appeals to the pocketbook concerns of voters."

Taxes Seen As GOP Fallback Issue For Midterm Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (10/18, Feldmann, 58K) reports that in an "election season where the Republicans can't seem to buy a break, the party's highest-profile campaigners," President Bush and Vice President Cheney, "have gone back to a bedrock GOP issue: taxes." While the President "tends to keep his remarks general, Mr. Cheney and Republican National Committee chair Ken Mehlman get personal. They target in particular Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York, who would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win control of the House." The GOP leaders "assert as fact that Mr. Rangel favors 'across-the-board tax increases,' which Rangel and the Democrats vigorously deny. But the debate has been framed, and it is one that has resonated for decades in the back and forth of partisan politics." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "It plays to the basic party stereotypes, and of course most people, if you give them an unalloyed choice of paying more taxes or less taxes, they'll pick less taxes every time."

DOJ_NMG_0082473

Forty State Ballot Measures Deal With Taxes, Spending Levels. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Wells, 2.03M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "Nationwide, there are some 40 measures to increase or decrease taxes or to restrict spending, according to a University of Southern California survey. But many are gaining little publicity in an election year dominated by the possible change of control in Congress. Unlike many state tax measures in past years, this year's measures have sparked little taxpayer outcry."

NYTimes/CBS Ohio Poll Shows Brown, Strickland Ahead By Double Digits. The New York Times (10/18, Broder, Thee, 1.21M) reports a New York Times/CBS News poll of Ohio voters shows "the Democratic candidates for governor and Senate hold commanding double-digit leads over their Republican opponents in the poll, and respondents said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate for the House in their district by 50 percent to 32 percent." The poll found "a striking slippage in the president's standing among white evangelical Christians, a constituency that has provided a strong vote cushion for Republican candidates in recent elections. In November 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush." In the current survey, "49 percent approved while 45 percent disapproved" of Bush's job performance. Republican Sen. Mike DeWine trails Democrat Sherrod Brown "by 34 percent to 48 percent," while Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland, "is leading the Republican nominee, J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Ohio secretary of state, by 53 percent to 29 percent."

CBS Evening News (10/17, story 5, 3:15, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "According to a new CBS News/'New York Times' poll, 31% of likely voters here see this race as a chance to vote against the President. The Republican Senator is now 14 points behind his Democratic challenger Congressman Sherrod Brown." Just "how their campaigns are viewed here in Ohio could determine how the rest of the nation votes in November." Still, DeWine is "far from out. He's been a fundraising machine, and even Brown worries the Republicans may have enough money to make a comeback."

GOP Scales Back Ad Buy In Ohio For DeWine. The AP (10/18, Kuhnhenn) reports the "Republican Party placed $700,000 in television ads in Ohio Tuesday, a scaled-back ad campaign amid growing doubts by party officials that GOP Sen. Mike DeWine can win re-election in the battleground state." The ads "are smaller than recent million-dollar ad buys by" the National Republican Senatorial Committee, "but party officials touted the ads as evidence that they were not abandoning the state or giving up on DeWine." The AP adds GOP officials "are turning their sights to Virginia to offer needed help to Sen. George Allen, who has been unable to stop a rapidly tightening race with Democrat Jim Webb. Virginia already is part of the party's aggressive voter turnout operation and party officials are said to be weighing a substantial ad campaign in the state as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee already is spending about $1.1 million on ads in Virginia against Allen." Republicans also "spent $500,000 to air ads in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, who is being closely challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr." Meanwhile, the National Republican Congressional Committee is "paying for polling in the Kentucky congressional district of Rep. Anne Northup and the Pennsylvania district of Rep. Melissa Hart." Both parties also "signaled that they will begin airing television ads in GOP Rep. Gil Gutknecht's re-election race in Minnesota, a campaign not previously considered competitive."

Pro-GOP Ads Said To Distort Truth On Iraq. McClatchy (10/18, Thomma) reports when "a shadowy group pouring untraceable millions into this fall's campaign makes" the claim to be "a 'political truth squad,'" that "bears a little truth-checking itself." Television ads "from the group, Progress for America, manage to grab the heart, but also stretch or twist the truth as they work to boost support for the Iraq war." They "feature David Beamer, whose son led a counterattack against the terrorists who hijacked United Flight 93 on Sept. 11, 2001." In the ad, David Beamer says, "Al-Qaida killed 3,000 Americans on 9/11 and will do anything to destroy us and our way of life. Todd and United 93 fought back. We continue this fight in Iraq today. This enemy must be destroyed in Iraq and wherever we find them." McClatchy adds that "makes it sound as though the war in Iraq is retaliation against al-Qaida. It's not. Iraq had nothing to do with al-Qaida's attack on us." Asked to "back up its ad, the group pointed to news articles about al-Qaida in Iraq now. But we didn't 'find' al-Qaida in Iraq. They came in to fight us after we invaded." Misleading assertions "like those made by Progress for America feed a lingering misunderstanding of the Iraq war."

DOJ_NMG_0082474

Investigators Probe Whether Beauprez Camp Used Federal Database. The AP (10/18, Paulson) reports Colorado authorities "have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack ad run by GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez against his opponent for governor illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database." Democrat Bill Ritter's campaign "has suggested the information was taken from the computerized crime records." Beauprez spokesman John Marshall "said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign is cooperating with investigators." The TV ad "in question refers to Carlos Estrada Medina, a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says Ritter chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, Medina avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor." The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) runs a short version of the story.

WPost Endorses Webb In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Post (10/18, A20, 748K) endorses Democrat James Webb, saying Republican Sen. George Allen is "a mediocre senator whose six years of undistinguished service do not justify rehiring." Webb is "admirably independent-minded," while Allen "has spent his time in the Senate in lock step with the Bush administration, embracing tax cuts that have imperiled the nation's fiscal health; subsidies for oil and gas companies that hardly needed the help; prisoner detention policies that have undercut America's image abroad; and restrictions on embryonic stem cell research despite its medical potential."

Webb Writings Said To Show Dignity Of "Redneck" Culture. The Washington Post (10/18, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports over "the course of his career, in books and more recently in screenplays, Webb, 60, has been writing about the dignity of his people" from Southwest Virginia, "the gun-loving, country-music-singing, working-class whites of Scotch-Irish descent who fight in wars, staff the nation's factories and shop its Wal-Marts." He "knows that some folks might call his people rednecks. We pity those folks if Jim Webb is around when they say that."

Menendez, Kean Touch On Familiar Themes Of Iraq, Corruption. The AP (10/18, Santi) reports that Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican Thomas Kean Jr. "were at it again Tuesday, in a 90-minute radio encounter that opened with a lengthy exchange on the war in Iraq." Kean "repeatedly refused to say whether he would vote to authorize sending U.S. troops into Iraq, even if he had intelligence information that was not available when the war began." Menendez "voted against the resolution authorizing the start of the war and has called for a timely withdrawal of U.S. troops." After the debate, "which aired live on Millennium Radio Network stations, Kean was asked again and again to articulate his position on authorizing the war and each time refused to answer the question directly." Kean "has made ethics a centerpiece of his candidacy and has tried to paint his opponent, who rose through the ranks of rough-and-tumble Hudson County politics, with a broad brush of political corruption. That familiar line of attack was evident again Tuesday night."

NBC Nightly News 10/17, story 7, 3:05, Reid) reported Kean, "who rarely mentions he's a Republican, has used his family name his father's the popular former Governor of New Jersey and a relentless attack on Menendez's ethics to turn this race into a toss-up." Tom Kean Jr.: "Clearly Bob Menendez's financial records are under investigation by the US attorney. That's clear." Reid: "Mincing no words, Menendez calls Kean a liar, insisting there's no evidence he's under investigation, though it's not entirely clear who's right."

Kean Taps $400,000 Of Own Money For Campaign. The Hill (10/18, Bolton) reports that twice in the past week, Kean "took a day out of his campaign schedule to attend to the seemingly mundane tasks of committee work, while his opponent, with whom he is locked in a neck-and-neck race, stumped for votes." While appearances "this week suggest Kean is not as committed to the race as Menendez is, Kean has made it clear that he's in this battle to win." Kean this week "decided to spend at least $400,000 of his own money to defeat Menendez in a race that represents the GOP's best chance of capturing a Democratic Senate seat next month. The personal contribution will appear on fundraising reports to be made public today." One GOP official "estimated the $400,000 could help Kean's campaign increase his television presence by about 25 to 30 percent. It will also narrow Menendez's financial advantage. Newly filed finance reports show that Menendez had $5.5 million and Kean $3.2 million in their campaign accounts at the end of September."

Steele Accuses Hoyer Of Racial Insensitivity. The Washington Post (10/18, B2, Marimow, 748K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "accused a leading Democratic congressman yesterday of racial insensitivity for saying the Republican candidate has 'slavishly' followed the GOP." Steele "was reacting to remarks by House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, who characterized Steele this week as having had 'a career of slavishly supporting the Republican Party.'" After "speaking to members of the Maryland Chamber of Commerce gathered in Ocean City, Steele called the description 'the height of arrogance.'" Steele said, "It goes to just the sheer craziness of some in the Democratic Party who think they can use racist terms and infer things about me just because I'm an African American Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0082475

Former Boxing Champ Tyson Heartily Endorses Steele. The Washington Post (10/18, B2, Mosk, 748K) reports former heavyweight boxing champ Mike Tyson "says he is so bullish on Republican Michael S. Steele's campaign for the U.S. Senate, he would return to the ring if Steele thought it might help him." Tyson said, "I would do anything to help Michael. I would box an exhibition for him. I would even fight again to help Mike. I would do anything." The Post adds, "Iron Mike's little-known but long-standing devotion to Steele dates to the boxer's former marriage to Steele's half-sister, Monica Turner."

Lieberman Says Democrats Must "Change The Tone" In Washington. The AP (10/18, Christoffersen) reports Sen. Joe Lieberman "said Tuesday he hoped Democrats seize control of Congress — with one caveat: a Democratic-led Congress, he said, must change its ways." Lieberman said, "It won't represent progress that's real. It's not going to be much of a step forward if there's a new Democratic leadership that doesn't change the tone in Washington." The AP adds that as "recently as Friday, Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat who was his party's nominee for vice president in 2000, would not say whether he thinks the nation would be better off with the Democrats in control of Congress."

Obama Reportedly Mulling Presidential Run In 2008. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Zuckman, 623K) reports while Sen. Barack Obama "launches the most public of book tours, with appearances on 'Oprah Winfrey,' the 'Today' show, 'Larry King Live' and 'Meet the Press,' he also is more intensively examining whether to run for president in 2008, reaching out to Democratic operatives and trying to reconcile the demands of a national campaign on his family." Obama (D-Ill.) has been "having quiet conversations with colleagues and friends about a prospective White House run, but a key concern is whether his wife, Michelle, would support it and whether he could manage the time away from their two young daughters." Donna Brazile said, "He has gotten the presidential bug bite. Barack is constantly calling, he's constantly talking to people. He's not calling me to check on the weather. I'm not saying he's in, but he's checking the water. He's having lots of conversations."

Laura Bush To Stump For GOP Texas State Senate Candidate. In its "The Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (10/18, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports, "GOP first-time candidate Dee Margo is running an uphill race against a longtime incumbent to represent heavily Democratic El Paso in the Texas Senate. So how'd he get the most popular Republican campaigner in the nation to stump for him? Easy: Laura Bush is good pals with his wife. Gallery owner Adair Wakefield Margo and the first lady first clicked years ago when Adair wrote a book about El Paso painter Tom Lea, whose 'Rio Grande' now hangs in the Oval Office. Laura and Adair traveled to Mexico to scope out artists' studios. The Margos raised big bucks for Dubya 's campaigns, and Adair now serves as chair of the President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities. Tomorrow, the first lady visits El Paso to speak at a private campaign luncheon for Dee."

Dowd Accuses McCain Of "Dissembling" About Drinking Incident With Clinton. Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) that Sen. Hillary Clinton "always struck me as the sort of buttoned-up and driven woman who would be really fun if you could get her out for a night of dulces de leche in Cuba, as Marlon Brando did Jean Simmons in 'Guys and Dolls.'" Dowd adds, "Anne Kornblut wrote that two summers ago, on a Congressional trip to Estonia with Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins, Senator Clinton astonished her traveling companions by suggesting that the group do what one does in the Baltics: hold a vodka-drinking contest. … But a few days after the anecdote appeared, Mr. McCain flatly denied it on Fox News as 'Not true.'" … Joshua Green, reporting the cover profile of Hillary for the latest issue of The Atlantic Monthly, was rebuffed when he asked for an interview with Mr. McCain about the night Hillary poured shots for fellow lawmakers. But Mr. Green ran into Mr. McCain walking through the Capitol and asked him about the Baltics escapade. 'McCain lit up at the recollection,' he wrote. 'It's been 50 years since I'd been in a drinking game,' said McCain. ... He added, admiringly, 'She can really hold her liquor.'" Dowd adds, "The once candid senator is starting to sound downright Clintonian with all this silly parsing and dissembling. I did not have drinks with that woman!"

DOJ_NMG_0082476

WSJournal Says Organized Labor Is Behind Anti-Wal-Mart Campaign. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A20, 2.03M) says Wal-Mart "has become the Democratic Party's favorite pinata. The media like to portray this as a populist uprising against heartless big business. But what they don't bother to disclose is that this entire get-Wal-Mart campaign is a political operation led and funded by organized labor." The Journal adds, "If Wal-Mart were suddenly unionized, Big Labor's membership would double overnight and union leaders would collect an estimated $300 million in additional dues each year to sway more politicians. Short of that, their goal is to keep Wal-Mart out of cities so their union shops have less competition. That's what the war against Wal-Mart is truly about."

NYTimes Praises Disney Effort To Promote Healthy Food Choices To Kids. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "With obesity rates soaring among the young, the Walt Disney Company has announced promising new guidelines for the way it promotes food to its impressionable clientele. Over the next two years, the company that brought you Buzz Lightyear and Goofy and the Lion King plans to make sure that its animated characters endorse healthier children's foods with less fat and sugar and fewer calories." The Times adds that "the Bush administration and Congress seem content to keep studying the problem. … It's heartening that a few [corporations], mainly Kraft and now Disney, recognize that we can't wait forever for Congress to act, and are actually doing something now."

Rice Heads To Asia Amid Talk Of Possible Second North Korean Test. CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Malveaux) reported, "Bush Administration officials and US spy satellites keeping a very close eye on North Korea's nuclear testing site where there has been some activity." The thinking "at the White House, is if they were to conduct a second test…this would actually embolden the Bush Administration's argument that North Korea's neighbors have to get tough." The AP (10/17, Lim) reports satellite images confirm North Korea "appears to be getting ready for a second nuclear test," even as China, "the North's longtime ally and biggest trading partner, warned Pyongyang not to aggravate tensions." The Financial Times (10/18, Fifield, McGregor, Sevastopulo) reports South Korea said it had "detected activity" suggesting a second test may be in the works.

The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Miller, 918K) reports the White House "did not rule out the possibility of a second test. 'Let me put it this way: The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative,' White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said." The Washington Times (10/18, Gertz, 88K) quotes Secretary Rumsfeld, who "told reporters that there is 'speculation,' but no specific information," about an impending test. Rumsfeld said, "There's speculation that they may want to do something additional. There's also speculation they may not. So, only time will tell."

The North Korean nuclear standoff continues to receive heavy coverage, leading two network newscasts and receiving just over eight minutes of coverage between the three. CBS Evening News (10/17, lead story, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) said Secretary Rice "is heading to Asia tonight to put some new pressure on North Korea's neighbors to enforce those UN sanctions, and…she's getting there none too soon." CBS (Martin) added, "As North Korea staged a spectacular torch light show of defiance with what it called a 'Down With Imperialism' rally, its officials publicly denounced economic sanctions passed by the UN as a declaration of war. Privately, they put out the word that they intend to conduct three more underground nuclear tests and nothing can stop them. But they could be saying that just to make anything less than three look like a concession."

NBC Nightly News (10/17, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) focused on US diplomacy with China, saying the US "finds itself yet again in a strange and uneasy partnership half way around the world." The North "is threatening to do it again, blow off another nuclear weapon if not several more. China and the United States find themselves on the same side in this. They both have limited options and they know it." NBC (Mitchell) added, "China today threatened to stop providing critical fuel and food to the north, if it didn't stop testing."

ABC World News (10/17, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) did not lead with the story, even though correspondent Diane Sawyer was "the only Western reporter now allowed inside"

DOJ_NMG_0082477

North Korea. Reporting from Pyongyang, Sawyer said, "Tonight, there is a 100,000-person rally taking place. … It's something that's been planned for months and months and months. It is the anniversary of the socialist revolution. At the same time, it is an opportunity and not lost on anyone, to denounce the United States, once again."

The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Dorning, 623K) reports Secretary Rice will seek commitments from North Korea's neighbors for a "sweeping inspections program to monitor almost all cargo shipped to or from" the North. USA Today (10/18, Slavin, 2.27M) says the Bush Administration plan to "argue for a strict interpretation" of the UN sanctions "could further raise tensions in the region."

The New York Times (10/18, Shanker, 1.21M) says that while Rice will urge northeast Asian states "to create a strict system of radiation monitoring and inspection," in what "appears to be an effort to cajole China to enforce" the new UN sanctions, the US "will ask the countries to focus their efforts on conducting inspections in their own territories, including ports, and on suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft rather than every piece of cargo." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A8, King, 2.03M) reports Rice "sought to allay concerns that the U.S. envisioned a sort of blockade, saying that ship interdictions would largely come about as the result of tips. 'We are not looking at inspecting every ship,' she said." McClatchy (10/18, Strobel, Johnson) also reports on Rice's goals.

The AP (10/17, Gearan), meanwhile, reports Secretary Rice said en route to Asia that the North's test "could set off an atomic arms race in Asia." Rice said, "Obviously an event of this kind does carry with it the potential for instability in the relationships that now exist in the region. That's why it's extremely important to go out and to affirm, and affirm strongly, U.S. defense commitments to Japan and to South Korea."

Kerry Calls Bush North Korea Policy "A Disgrace." The Des Moines Register (10/18, 163K) reports Sen. John Kerry, in Iowa, said the North Korean "crisis is of the Bush administration's own making." In an interview, Kerry said, "The Bush policy is a disgrace. If Ronald Reagan could talk to the evil empire and negotiate with the Soviets, surely George Bush could do the same with North Korea. But he's a prisoner of rigid ideology."

High-Level Defector Says Only Kim's Ouster Would End Nuclear Aims. The AP (10/17, Kim) reports Hwang Jang Yop, the "highest-ranking North Korean government official ever to defect" to the South and "the man once considered the mentor" of Kim Jong Il, said Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program cannot be stopped unless Kim is removed from power. But he said Kim's "total grip on the communist society makes that only a remote possibility." Hwang "is also skeptical" that UN sanctions will hurt Kim.

American "Unrepentant" About Defecting To North Korea. The Washington Times (10/18, Salmon, 88K) runs a feature on James "Comrade Joe" Dresnok, the "last living American defector in North Korea," who tells his story in the film "Crossing the Line." Dresnok, "unrepentant and professing support for communism," says, "I have never regretted coming to [North Korea]. I feel at home."

Envoy Rejects Linkage Of Iran's Nuclear Program With North Korea's. In a letter to the editor of the Washington Times (10/18, 88K), responding to the October 11 editorial "North Korea and Iran," M.A. Mohammadi, press secretary for the Iranian mission to the UN, writes that Iran "strongly rejects any comparison of Iran's nuclear program with other countries'. Iran's nuclear program is legal, fully within the framework of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, peaceful and transparent."

Bush Boosts Croatia Bid For NATO Membership. The AP (10/18) reports, "President Bush gave a boost Tuesday to Croatia's aspirations to join NATO, saying it should be admitted to the Western alliance within two years." Bush "said he would recommend the 2008 timetable when he attends a NATO summit next month in Riga, Latvia. He also said he supports Croatia's membership in the European Union." The President "expressed his views during an Oval Office meeting with Croatian Prime Minister Ivo Sanader."

Abbas Threatens To Dissolve Hamas Government. The New York Times (10/18, Myre, 1.21M) reports that in "the clearest signal yet that he was prepared to act against the Hamas government," Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas "warned Tuesday that the current Palestinian political crisis was intolerable, and suggested he would dismiss the Hamas-led government if the rival factions could not agree soon on a national unity government." While "Abbas said he still sought a national unity government" between Hamas and Fatah, he added "that if no agreement was reached soon he might dismiss the government and replace it, at least temporarily, with technocrats," which he called, "the simplest and most practical solution." Abbas "set no deadlines for a decision. But there has been speculation that he may be prepared to act soon after the Muslim holy month of Ramadan." However, "Hamas could resist such a move, and the Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, is somewhat vague on how to resolve political disputes."

DOJ_NMG_0082478

Hamas Official Critiques Palestinian Violence. In an article focusing on clashes between the Israeli military and Palestinians, the Washington Post (10/18, A16, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Ghazi Hamad, a senior Hamas official, published his second critique of Palestinian society in two months. In a column for the daily newspaper al-Ayyam. Hamad, a senior adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, asked if violence had become 'a Palestinian disease,'" and "whether violence had become 'a culture implanted in our bodies and our flesh,' adding that it 'has taken away the language of brotherhood and replaced it with arms.'"

Blair Calls Veils A "Mark Of Separation." The New York Times (10/18, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair joined a passionate and increasingly contentious debate on Tuesday over the full-face veils worn by some British Muslim women, calling it a 'mark of separation,'" marking "the first time Mr. Blair had so explicitly backed Jack Straw" for his comments about veils. Blair's "remarks reflected a sense that British society is heading toward ever deeper fissures between Muslims and non-Muslims, evoking questions about the nation's readiness to embrace Muslims, and Muslims' willingness to adapt." Meanwhile, "there are signs that the dispute had spread farther across Europe. In an interview in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi was quoted Tuesday as saying that women should not be hidden behind veils."

Stalemate Continues Between Venezuela And Guatemala In Bid For Security Council Seat. The New York Times (10/18, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year lagged Tuesday for a second straight day, but Guatemala, the persistent leader after 22 ballots, was unable to win enough votes to secure the position." This "setback was particularly stinging for Venezuela," as its president, Hugo Chávez, "has made the contest a centerpiece of his continuing campaign against Washington, financing it liberally with oil proceeds, promoting it with personal appearances around the world and frequently predicting that Venezuela would prevail." Diplomats suggested "that it might be time for the Latin American group to switch to a compromise candidate. But neither country was prepared to step aside." Gert Rosenthal, the foreign minister of Guatemala, said, "under normal circumstances our competitor would stand down graciously… but for reasons well known, he's not willing to do that." Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said, "Why doesn't Bolton come to this microphone and declare that the United States will remove the pressure, will withdraw the money, and then countries will have the liberty to vote their conscience." Ambassador Bolton responded, "Look, we have made our position clear in a very low key way. It is motivated by our concern for Venezuela's behavior, and that's another example of it." He added, "You can draw one conclusion from the results…Venezuela is not going to win."

The Washington Post (10/18, Lynch, Forero, Brubaker, 748K) says, "Venezuela was stymied for a second straight day," which a "shocked" the delegates at the United Nations who "once predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat." The votes "represented a personal blow to Chavez," and "has come as a relief to the United States." Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga, said "the race was 'perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela.'" According to some delegates, Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol." However, "Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and 'swayed' others to vote against it." Meanwhile, Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election, said "the government's failure to secure a seat was called 'an embarrassing defeat.'"

The Financial Times (10/18) reports, "The impasse has prompted other Latin American countries to suggest regional talks on a way to avoid a recurrence of divisions that afflicted the region at the height of the cold war."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/18, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "In the war of Hugo Chávez versus George W. Bush, Venezuela versus the United States, and anti- Americanism versus American leadership, the latest battle is...a draw." The AP (10/18, Wadhams) and McClatchy (10/18, Bachelet), among other sources, also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0082479

Increasing French Fertility Rates Linked To Government Spending. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Moore, 748K) reports, "While falling birthrates threaten to undermine economies and social stability across much of an aging Europe, French fertility rates are increasing." France "now has the second-highest fertility rate in Europe -- 1.94 children born per woman, exceeded slightly by Ireland's rate of 1.99. The US fertility rate is 2.01 children." The Post adds that "the propensity of women here to have more babies has little to do with notions of French romance or the population's formerly strong religious ties to the Roman Catholic Church. France heavily subsidizes children and families from pregnancy to young adulthood with liberal maternity leaves and part-time work laws for women. The government also covers some child-care costs of toddlers up to 3 years old and offers free child-care centers from age 3 to kindergarten, in addition to tax breaks and discounts on transportation, cultural events and shopping."

NYTimes Urges UN Rights Monitors For Sri Lanka. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "On Monday, 94 people died and 150 were injured when a truck loaded with explosives rammed into a military convoy in Sri Lanka. The government blames the Tamil Tiger guerrillas -- the pioneers of the suicide bombing -- for the attack. The rebels have not said anything." The Times adds, "Colombo is eager for international aid and support in its fight against the Tamil Tigers. With UN rights monitors bearing witness, the government may feel pressure to rein in army and police abuses. Monitors could also bolster the country's weak judicial system, which barely investigates crimes against Tamil civilians. The guerrillas, who count the forced recruitment of child soldiers among their crimes, are less vulnerable to international shame. But shining a spotlight might help persuade overseas Tamils to choke off funding."

WSJournal Warns Investors China Bank IPO May Not Be As Safe As Expected. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, 2.03M) editorializes, "Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, meet" Industrial Commercial Bank of China. China's largest bank "joins the ranks of publicly listed companies next week when it unveils what may be the world's largest-ever IPO in Hong Kong and Shanghai. But as with America's mortgage behemoths, investors are betting as much on implicit government support as on ICBC itself." That's because "the comparison with the two U.S. 'government-sponsored' mortgage giants is startling. Investors comforted by implicit American taxpayer support have had to endure several years of uncertainty and lower returns as fraud and false accounting have been uncovered at Fannie and Freddie. Perhaps that's a warning for ICBC investors."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Bush Signs Tough Rules On Detainees."
"The Road From Ruin."
"In Car No. 9, She's 16 Trying To Go 70."
"Some Seek 'Pink Purge' In The GOP."
"Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits."
"No Counting On The Identity Of 300 Millionth Resident."

USA Today:

"More Benefits Than Risks In Higher Fish Consumption."
"New Rx Help People To Avoid Getting Sick."
"Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works."
"Screening."
"Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists."

New York Times:

"Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police."
"$5.4 Billion Bid Wins Complexes In New York Deal."
"Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case."
"Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million."
"Not Coming Soon To A Lot Near You: Chinese Cars."
"A Republican With Unfortunate Timing Believes His Time Is Now."
"Geriatrics Lags In Age Of High-Tech Medicine."
"Glorious Food? English Schoolchildren Think Not."

Washington Post:

"Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare."
"53% of Voters Say They Back Va. Gay Marriage Ban."
"U.S. Faces Guantanamo Obstacles."
"Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe."
"In-Flight Fires An Unresolved Safety Threat."
"FDA Is Set To Approve Milk, Meat From Clones."

Washington Times:

"Border-Fence Bill Awaits Signing."

DOJ_NMG_0082480

"Rove Foresees GOP Victory."
"U.S., Allie Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang."
"U.S. Rules May Hit Caribbean."
"Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year."

Detroit Free Press:
"Civil Rights Proposal Has Voters Conflicted."
"Behind The Scenes At Comerica Park."
"Inventory Glut Could Raise Chrysler's Losses."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"State Backtracks On Voter ID Alert."
"DeKalb Housing Chief Is Removed."
"What's Next For U.S. Population?"
"Ex-UGA Coach Wanted Athlete To Dump Major."
"Judge Erases Conviction Of Enron Founder."

Houston Chronicle:
"Judge Voids Convictions Against Lay."
"Romance Novel Fuels Passionate Debate."
"Houston's WNBA Dynasty Up For Sale."
"Melee Could Put The Hurt On Houston's Music Scene."
"CSI: Baghdad – No TV, This Is Gruesomely Real."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: 300 Million Population Mark; Americans Having Babies; Inside North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian violence; Detainee Bill Signed; Reid Under Fire; Improved Care; Subway train Accident-Rome; Safe To Eat Fish; Cars Parking Themselves.
CBS: North Korean-Sanctions; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Detainee Bill Signed; Midterm Elections; Ohio Senate Race; Foley Investigation; New Diabetes Drug Approved; Eating Fish; Dangerous Medicines; 300 Million Population Mark; Mayor Lou Bartletta Opinion-Immigration; Christopher Glenn Obit; Mentors For Kids.
NBC: North Korea Sanctions; Detainee Bill Signed; Stock Market; Inflation; Eating Fish; 300 Million Population Mark; New Jersey Senate Race; Madonna's Baby Adoption; Christopher Glenn Obit; Green Roofs.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Military Commissions Legislation; Rice-Asia Trip; CA-Hispanic Voter Suppression Effort.
CBS: Glen Obit.; Iraq-US KIA; North Korea-Nuclear Test; Rice-Asia Trip; MLB Playoffs.
NPR: Bush-Military Commissions Legislation; NY-Snowstorm Cleanup; Top Ten Fuel Efficient Cars List; Oil Prices; UN-Eritrea, Ethiopia Negotiations; US-Burundi Civil War Refugees; Lay Conviction Voided.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a luncheon with community leaders, Greensboro, NC; participates in Visit to Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Greensboro, North Carolina; makes remarks on No Child Left Behind, Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Greensboro, North Carolina; visits Victory Junction Gang Camp, Inc. Randleman, NC; attends a Republican National Committee Dinner, Private Residence, Greensboro, North Carolina.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Visits the Jenna Welch and Laura Bush Community Library, El Paso; speaks at a Dee Margo for Texas Senate luncheon, Private residence, El Paso; visits the Ben Franklin: In Search of a Better World exhibition, Houston Museum of Natural Science.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER IVO SANADER OF CROATIA _ Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Speaks at the Nitze School of Advanced International Studies. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. Contact: Felisa Neuringer Klubes, 202-663-5626. Note: Preset by 7:45 a.m. Media RSVP required.

NUCLEAR FUELS _ The National Academies holds a conference on the internationalization of the civil nuclear fuel cycle. Location: 2100 C St. NW.

GENERIC DRUGS _ The Generic Pharmaceutical Association holds its Fall Technical Conference. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Steven Galson, Director, FDA Center for Drug Evaluation and Research. Location: Bethesda North Hotel and Conference Center, 5701 Marinelli Rd., North Bethesda.

HEALTHCARE TECHNOLOGY _ The National Institute of Standards and Technlology holds a summit to focus on healthcare technology. Highlights: 9 a.m. Keynote addresses - HHS Secretary Leavitt and Intel Board Chairman Craig Barrett. Location: Red Auditorium, NIST, Gaithersburg.

COMMON GOOD _ 8:15 a.m. - 12 p.m. the Center for American Progress will hold a half-day conference on the common good, with an opening address by Queen Noor of Jordan. A keynote address will be given by former President William J. Clinton. Location: Georgetown University, Gaston Hall, 37th and O Streets NW.

DOJ_NMG_0082481

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY PROTECTION _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The Washington Embassy Network meets to discuss consideration of recent events at the World Intellectual Property Organization General Assembly, held from Sept. 20 through Oct. 5 in Geneva, Switzerland. Location: Commerce Department, 1401 Constitution Ave. NW.

BROWN REPORT-EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. Tom Loveless, director of the Brookings Brown Center on Education Policy and author of the 2006 Brown Center Report on American Education, holds a news briefing to release the report, which evaluates the role that student happiness and confidence play in achievement, and examines whether states are artificially inflating the number of students meeting proficiency standards mandated by the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) Act of 2001. Location: The Brookings Institution, Saul and Zilkha Rooms-First Floor, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. The Pew Center on Global Climate Change holds a news briefing to release a detailed ``how to guide" to help corporate decision makers navigate global markets that are rapidly changing in response to climate change. Location: National Press Club.

EUROPE-HEALTH CARE _ 10 a.m. Four health policy experts who live under various European health systems discuss the various systems. Participants include Alphonse Crespo, M.D., Institut Constant de Rebecque; Helen Disney, Stockholm Network; Johan Hjertqvist, Health Consumer Powerhouse; and Stephen Pollard, Centre for the New Europe. Location: Room 216, Hart.

GULF SECURITY _ 10 a.m. The International Institute for Strategic Studies holds a briefing by senior fellow Mamoun Fady on ``The Shia Question and Gulf Security." Location: Suite 300, 1850 K St. NW.

IRAQ-CHRISTIANS _ 10 a.m. The Iraq Sustainable Democracy Project holds a news conference with former Iraqi Minister Pascale Warde about developments in her nation regarding Assyrian Christians. Location: National Press Club.

PENTAGON-AFGHANISTAN _ 10 a.m. US Army Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, will brief live from Afghanistan with an update on U.S. reconstruction operations in Afghanistan. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

CONTRIBUTIONS-CONGRESS _ 10:30 a.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to release a report on how much money members of Congress have received from special interest sources. Notes: This event originally was scheduled for Tuesday, Oct. 17. Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

DARFUR _ 11 a.m. Progressive and Conservative evangelical leaders hold a telephone briefing on the situation in Darfur. Participants include Jim Wallis of Sojourners/Call to Renewal, Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, Ted Haggard of the National Association of Evangelicals, others. Contacts: Jack Pannell, 202-745-4614. Notes: Callin number: 800-903-0258; passcode: Darfur.

VETERANS DAY _ 11:30 a.m. The Veterans Affairs Department, veterans organization, hold a news conference to announce a new initiative to honor veterans, with VA Secretary Nicholson, veterans group leaders. Location: Room 230, 810 Vermont Ave. NW.

TRADE-DOHA ROUND _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The United Nations Development Programme hosts a Washington Roundtable on ``Trade on Human Terms: Revisiting the Development Agenda of the Doha Round." The luncheon will be co-sponsored by UNDPs Washington Office and the Trade, Equity and Development Project of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Panelists will be Hafiz Pasha, Assistant Secretary-General of the UN and Director of UNDPs Bureau for Asia and the Pacific; Sandra Polaski, Director of the Carnegie Endowments Trade, Equity and Development Project; and David Walters, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative for Economic Affairs. David Yang, Senior Advisor in UNDPs Washington Office, will moderate the panel. Location: Root Room of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MIDTERM ELECTIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a luncheon with Reps. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., National Republican Congressional Committee chairman; and Rahm Emmanuel, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, who will discuss the midterm elections. Location: National Press Club.

GUANTANAMO-TORTURE _ 1 p.m. The Institute for Policy Studies holds a discussion and press briefing on the implications of torture at Guantanamo Bay, with activist Vanessa Redgrave, torture survivor Maher Arar (via phone) and Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights. Location: Suite 600, 1112 16th St. NW.

ELECTION-EXPECTATIONS _ 1:30 p.m. A bipartisan group of former secretaries of state and elections experts hold a conference call briefing on what voters can expect at the polls this November. Participants include Miles Rapoport, former Secretary of State, D-Conn.; Rev. DeForest Soaries, former Secretary of State, R-N.J. and former Chair, U.S. Election Assistance Commission; Ray Martinez, Pew Center on the States; Tova Wang, The Century Foundation. Notes: Callin number: 888-858-4723; passcode: 7996462.

DOJ_NMG_0082482

EGIL KROGH _ 2 p.m. Egil Krogh, former deputy counsel for President Richard Nixon and former White House ``plumber," will discuss ``The Importance of Ethics and Integritry" at a National Press Club newsmaker event. Location: National Press Club.

IMMIGRANT REMITTANCES-LATAM _ 2:45 p.m. The Inter-American Development Bank holds a news conference to release new state-by-state estimates of the volumes of money sent by immigrants in the United States to their countries of origin in Latin America. Location: IDB's Enrique V. Iglesias Conference Center, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

TRADE-FAST TRACK _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace hosts a discussion, ``Congress Takes on Fast Track: Congressional Leaders Discuss Fast Track Authority," on the renewal of fast track trade negotiating authority. Panelists include current and former Congressional members and staff who will give an insiders perspective on the circumstances that led to the renewal of ``fast track negotiations in 1991 and 1993, and whether those circumstances hold lessons for today. Highlights: Panel 2: Tim Reif, Minority Trade Counsel on the Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee; Mike Castellano, Counsel and Senior Policy Adviser in the Office of Minority Leader Harry Reid and former Trade Counsel on the Trade Subcommittee; Grant Aldonas, former Chief Trade Counsels of the Senate Finance Committee; and Marcia Miller, former Chief Trade Counsels of the Senate Finance Committee. Panel 1: Bill Frenzel, former Member of the House Ways and Means Committee; Tom Downey, former Member of the House Ways and Means Committee; Bob Packwood, former Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

LAW ENFORCEMENT-CLINTON _ 5 p.m. The National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund presents an award to former President Clinton for his contributions to the law enforcement profession and community. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Bush Signs Terror Detainee Bill Into Law 3
Federal Investigators Want To Interview Richard Reid 4

Homeland Response:
GAO Says DHS Plan To Deploy Nuclear Detection Equipment Can't Be Justified 4
Group Sues For Information On Profiling Of Arabs 5
TSA Considering Machines To Screen For Liquid Explosives 5
LAPD's Bratton Opposes Calls For MI5-Style US Agency 5
Judge Rejects NYC Effort To Dismiss Ground Zero Lawsuits 5

War News:
Bush Makes Case For "Promoting Liberty" To Fight Terrorism..... 5
NATO Commander In Afghanistan Admits 2001-02 Strategic Mistakes 6
State-DOD Turf Battles May Have Hindered Initial US Response To Iraq Insurgency 6
Bush Administration Reportedly Pressuring Maliki To Issue Broad Amnesty 7
McCain Claims US Still Has "Capacity To Win" In Iraq 7
Kerry Alleges Bush Made "Gigantic Blunder" Committing US Troops Indefinitely 7
Thirty-Six Deaths Reported On "Relatively Calm" Day In Iraq 7
US Troops Assist Iraqi Forces In Balad 7
Iraqi Interior Ministry Denies Two Officers' Transfer Is Due To Militia Purge 8
Methodology Of Survey Claiming 655,000 Iraqi Deaths Disputed 8
Friedman Likens Current Iraq Fighting To Tet Offensive 8
Military Honors Seen As Evolving To Reflect Changing Front 9
WPost Likens Somalia To Afghanistan In 1990s 9

DOJ:
Writer Expresses Concern About Taylor As DC US Attorney 9
DOJ Among Department Missing Senator's Deadline For IT Projects List 10
DOJ Task Force Will Examine Privacy Issues 10

Corporate Scandals:
Judge Vacates Lay Conviction 10
UnitedHealth Options Practices May Lead To Federal Charges. 11
Board Issues Guidance On Auditing Value Of Stock Options 12
NYTimes Supports Justice Department Review Of Buyouts 12

Criminal Law:
Page Board Examining Trip Kolbe Took In 1996 With Two Pages 12
Trandahl Seen As Key Figure On Foley Scandal 13
Report Says Cunningham Used Intelligence Panel To Aid Contractors 13
Weldon Campaign Suggests Democrats At DOJ Leaked Probe 14
US Charges New York Labor Leader With Racketeering 15
Missouri Mayor Expected To Plead Guilty To Bribery Charges .. 16
Former GBI Agent Sentenced To Year In Prison For Taking Kickbacks 16
Alleged Pennsylvania Mobster Accused Of Soliciting Murder Of Witness 16
FBI Arrests Florida Man For Making Child Porn With 15-Month-Old Daughter 16
Grand Jury Hands Up Eight Count Indictment To Capitol Intruder 16
Ohio Fundraiser Called Coin Funds An ATM, Former Aide Testifies 17
Mueller Calls For ISP User Tracking 17
Crawford Pleads Guilty To Charges In Stock Case 17
Trial Over Bogus Degrees Delayed 18
Man Pleads Guilty To Three Idaho Slayings 18
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To New Jersey Stock Scam 19
Florida Crime Rate Drops, Except For Murder 19
Federal Judge Again Strikes Missouri's Lethal Injection Procedure 19
Federal Prosecutors Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Insurer Case 19
Man Convicted Of Murder In New York Drunk Driving Case 20
DC Mayor Seeks $11 Million To Continue Anti-Crime Measures 20

Civil Law:
DOJ Review Finds Agencies' FOIA Administration Improving 20
Federal Government Won't Pay Death Benefit To Studds' Same-Sex Spouse 20

Civil Rights:
DOJ Probing California Letter On Immigrant Voting 20
Georgia Election Board Approves New Letter To Misinformed Voters 21

FBI Forwards Results Of Arkansas Police Beating Probe To DOJ ... 21
Study Finds Racial Disparities In Breast Cancer Death Rates ... 21
Comedian's Mother Claims She Was Discriminated Against At Restaurant ... 21

Antitrust:

DOJ Gives Antitrust Nod To Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Of Gold Kist ... 21
Kucinich Wants DOJ Antitrust Probe Of Giant Eagle Ohio Store Purchase ... 22
SCOTUS To Weigh DOJ's Ability To Renege On Immunity Deals ... 22
Chicago Mercantile Exchange To Buy Chicago Board Of Trade 22
Tata Steel Seeks To Buy Corus For $8 Billion ... 23
Eli Lilly Agrees To By Icos Corp ... 23
Vivendi Sues Two Internet Companies Over Video File Sharing 23
Record Labels See Marketing Opportunity In Music Piracy ... 24
GM's Wagoner Called Corporate America's "Comeback Kid." ... 24

Environment:

Nuclear Plant Security Union Criticizes New DOE Policy ... 24
Studies Find Benefits Of Eating Fish Exceed Risks ... 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Criticizes FBI Sentinel Staffing Priorities ... 25
San Francisco Marijuana Dispensary Director Released On $1 Million Bond ... 25
Illinois Drug Investigation Nets Eighth Guilty Plea ... 25
Nevada To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana ... 25
US Anti-Narcotics Official Notes Increasingly Pure Heroin, Warns Of Price Drop ... 26
IG Report Finds Prisoner Flights Expensive ... 26
Washington Women Crossed Line From Environmental Activism To Arson ... 26

Immigration:

White House Wants Congress To Send Border Fence Bill For Bush Signing ... 27

Tax:

Snipes Indicted For Conspiracy, Tax Fraud ... 27

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Defense Spending Bill, Details Reservations About Specific Provisions ... 28
Bush Signs Updated National Space Policy ... 28
Bush Officials Say Faith-Based Initiative Critic Kuo Got It Wrong 28
SCOTUS Sees Increase In Sealed Filings ... 29
Bush To Tout NCLB At North Carolina School ... 29
Reid To Repay Campaign For Condo Staff Tips ... 29
Lewis Spent $750,000 On Legal Fees ... 30
Election Angst Boosted Textile Industry Priorities In Congress ... 30

Other News:

Economic Data Suggest Cooling Economy ... 30
Gasoline Tax Hike Considered Unlikely Despite Economists' Support ... 31
Chicago Sued Over Red Light Cameras ... 31
LATimes Endorses Judges For Reelection ... 32
Study Finds Widespread Risk Of Reactions To Some Medicines 32
Blue Cross Of California To Settle Lawsuits Over Illegal Cancellations ... 32
Pirro, Cuomo Clash In Final Debate ... 32
Both Parties Mulling Impact Of Potential GOP Congressional Loss ... 32
Rove "Confident" GOP Will Hold Onto Both House, Senate ... 33
GOP Incumbents Running Short On Campaign Funds ... 34
Flake Says GOP Reliance On Earmarks Leave Majority At Risk 35
Democratic Ads Link Minimum Wage, Congressional Pay Raises ... 35
Taxes Seen As GOP Fallback Issue For Midterm Elections ... 35
NYTimes/CBS Ohio Poll Shows Brown, Strickland Ahead By Double Digits ... 36
Pro-GOP Ads Said To Distort Truth On Iraq ... 36
Investigators Probe Whether Beauprez Camp Used Federal Database ... 36
WPost Endorses Webb In Virginia Senate Race ... 36
Menendez, Kean Touch On Familiar Themes Of Iraq, Corruption 37
Steele Accuses Hoyer Of Racial Insensitivity ... 37
Lieberman Says Democrats Must "Change The Tone" In Washington ... 37
Obama Reportedly Mulling Presidential Run In 2008 ... 38
Laura Bush To Stump For GOP Texas State Senate Candidate 38
Dowd Accuses McCain Of "Dissembling" About Drinking Incident With Clinton ... 38
WSJournal Says Organized Labor Is Behind Anti-Wal-Mart Campaign ... 38
NYTimes Praises Disney Effort To Promote Healthy Food Choices To Kids ... 38
Rice Heads To Asia Amid Talk Of Possible Second North Korean Test ... 38
Envoy Rejects Linkage Of Iran's Nuclear Program With North Korea's ... 39
Bush Boosts Croatia Bid For NATO Membership ... 40
Abbas Threatens To Dissolve Hamas Government ... 40
Blair Calls Veils A "Mark Of Separation." ... 40
Stalemate Continues Between Venezuela And Guatemala In Bid For Security Council Seat ... 40
Increasing French Fertility Rates Linked To Government Spending ... 41
NYTimes Urges UN Rights Monitors For Sri Lanka ... 41
WSJournal Warns Investors China Bank IPO May Not Be As Safe As Expected ... 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 42

DOJ_NMG_0082485

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Signs Terror Detainee Bill Into Law. The CBS Evening News (10/17, story 3, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush today got one of the weapons he wanted for the war on terror. He signed that detainee bill. The new law sets the rules for interrogating and trying foreign terror suspects, and it could pave the way for Kahlid Sheikh Mohammed and other accused 9/11 plotters to be tried by military tribunals." NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 2, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) said that "while the new law was being signed, about a dozen or so protesters were being arrested, some of them wearing prison-style suits to look like terror detainees."

ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "At today's signing, the President…described the legislation as one of the most important tools in fighting the war on terror." Bush was shown saying, "It allows for the clarity our intelligence professionals need to continue questioning terrorists and saving lives." USA Today (10/18, 2.27M), meanwhile, reports Bush also said "interrogations have yielded valuable information that has helped prevent terror attacks." Said the President, "It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives." The American Civil Liberties Union, however, called the bill "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history."

Some media reports portray the signing ceremony as part of a Republican PR effort geared toward the upcoming elections. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, A1, Schmitt, Barnes, 918K), for example, says "the new law…became both part of the administration's final campaign push to preserve its congressional majority in the midterm election." The enactment of the law "was good news for Bush as casualties have mounted in Iraq and his handling of the war on terror has come under intensifying criticism." The signing ceremony "was part political rally for a GOP that is struggling to retain control of Congress three weeks before a pivotal midterm election."

The New York Times (10/18, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "With the midterm elections three weeks away, Mr. Bush hoped to use the bill signing to turn the political debate back to the war on terrorism, a winning issue for Republicans, and away from scandals like the Mark Foley case, which have dominated the news in recent weeks." The President "said he was signing the measure 'in memory of the victims of September the 11th.'"

The AP (10/18, Pickler) reports, "Bush has been criticizing Democrats who voted against the law, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, during campaign appearances around the country. He has suggested that votes against the law show that Democrats would not protect the country from another terrorist attack." Republican House leaders, "in a tough battle to maintain their majority, echoed those criticisms Tuesday in an attempt to get some political points out of the legislation they supported. 'The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives,' House Speaker Dennis Hastert said."

In an interview that aired on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor last night (10, 17, O'Reilly), Bush said, "The intelligence community believes strongly that the information we got from the detainee questioning program yielded information that made America safer, that we stopped attacks. Secondly the courts -- I believe it is necessary to have military tribunals because I ultimately want these people to be tried. And it took a while to get these tribunals in place. The Supreme Court ruled that the president didn't have the authority to set up these courts on his own, that he needed to work with congress to do so and we did. What is interesting about these votes that took place in the Congress is the number of Democrats that opposed questioning people we picked up on the battlefield. And I think that is an issue that they are going to have to explain to the American people." Bush was also asked why he thinks the criticism of his stance regarding the handling detainees has been "so fierce," Bush responded, "I don't know. … As you know we picked up a fellow named Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Intelligence folks believe, or suspect, that he was the person that masterminded the 9/11 attacks. I want to know what he knew in order to prevent another attack. Now maybe there are some in this country that say they are not coming again and therefore all this is unnecessary. I believe they are coming again and I believe it is the responsibility of the federal government to protect our people."

Later in his interview on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly), Bush said that although he would "never…question anyone's patriotism" he thinks "the American people got a choice to make this November. And I believe that the choice is stark and clear. I believe that my party and our candidates…will be better positioned to put policies in place that will enable us to protect the American people from attack."

The Washington Times (10/18, Dinan, 88K) notes the bill "passed the House by a 250-170 vote and the Senate by a vote of 65-34. In both chambers, most Republicans voted in favor and most Democrats against." However, said ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M), "there were only a few Democrats that released statements critical of the bill. One of them, Senator Russell Feingold saying, 'We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history.'" Another Democrat who spoke up against the bill was Rep. Charles Rangel. Asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly) why he voted against the bill, Rangel answered, "There's no question in my mind not only is it unconstitutional, but it was brought up on the eve of the election to give some type of feeling that Republicans were tough on terrorism. … It may sound corny, but I swear that I love it country so much it would just seem to me that we should have those principles that involve habeas corpus. Whether you call them combatants or prosecutors of war, the standard should be not set by the president but the standard should be set either by the Geneva Convention" or the "the Military Code of Justice."

The Washington Post (10/18, A4, Fletcher, 748K) quotes Democratic Sen. Pat Leahy saying, "It is a sad day when the rubber-stamp Congress undercuts our freedoms, assaults our Constitution and lets the terrorists achieve something they could never win on the battlefield." Congressional Republicans, meanwhile, "immediately seized on the new law, which was opposed by most Democratic lawmakers, as evidence of their commitment to protect the country against terrorist attacks." House Majority Leader John Boehner said, "Capitol Hill Democrats have yet to offer any solutions or formulate any serious national security policy on how to keep America safe in a post-9/11 world."

A number of stories also suggest portions of the bill will not survive the legal challenges ahead. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Savage, 918K) reports that while debate on the military tribunals bill signed by…Bush focused on trials at Guantanamo Bay, "the new law also takes away from noncitizens in the U.S. — including more than 12 million permanent residents — the right to go to court if they are declared 'unlawful enemy combatants.' No one has suggested that the Bush administration plans to use its newly won power to round up large numbers of immigrants. But before Tuesday, the principle of habeas corpus meant that anyone thrown into jail in the US had a right to ask a judge for a hearing. They also had a right to go free if the government could not show a legal basis for holding them. … Many legal scholars predict the law's partial repeal of habeas corpus will be struck down as unconstitutional."

ABC World News (10/17, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said "legal experts say huge questions about the law still remain. Central to it all, interrogations." Eugene Fidell, National Institute of Military Justice: "This legislation doesn't say what you can do. What it says is you can't torture. But the Administration may have a different view of what torture is that you or I might have." Raddatz: "And it is, indeed, up to the President to interpret what constitutes torture." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "The government will not give you precise techniques." Raddtaz: "The language is so vague, say some lawyers, you could drive a truck through it. Others say, it's just wrong."

McClatchy (10/18, Hutcheson) reports, "The Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed two challenges to the law on behalf of detainees, said it would fight the changes 'at every turn, using every tool at our disposal, until we reverse this affront to the rule of law.'" Legal experts" said the anticipated court battles make it unlikely that any of the roughly 435 detainees at the US naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, would face trial before a military commission anytime soon."

Bloomberg (10/18, Runningen) reports, "Shortly after Bush signed the measure, the Justice Department sent a letter to a U.S. appeals court in Washington saying the new law strips hundreds of other Guantanamo detainees of their right to a court hearing to challenge their confinement. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit is considering whether to dismiss the suits by detainees who haven't been charged with war crimes. … In addition to setting up military commissions to try suspected terrorists, the law gives the president wide latitude to interpret the Geneva Conventions in deciding what interrogation techniques would be permissible."

Federal Investigators Want To Interview Richard Reid. Federal investigators told a judge yesterday that they want to interview attempted show bomber Richard Reid because he likely has important information about terrorist activities. The AP (10/18) reports, "Prosecutors said in US District Court they don't believe Reid is entitled to a public defender now that his criminal case is over. … Assistant U.S. Attorney James Farmer said investigators want to talk to Reid without an attorney present to develop a 'personal rapport,' which would be difficult to do with an attorney or any third party in the room." The AP adds, "US District Judge William Young said he would keep in place the orders continuing Reid's representation by public defenders, noting that under those orders, the government can contact Reid only after giving notice to his lawyers and having them present for any interviews with him."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Says DHS Plan To Deploy Nuclear Detection Equipment Can't Be Justified. The Washington Post (10/18, A12, Hsu, 748K) reports, "The Department of Homeland Security's plan to spend $1.2 billion deploying next-generation nuclear-detection equipment at US ports and border crossings cannot be justified, given test results that showed the devices are unreliable, congressional investigators warned yesterday." According to the GAO, DHS "ignored its own tests showing the new monitors could not meet a standard of detecting enriched uranium 95 percent of the time." DHS "also understated the project's costs by up to $181 million, GAO officials wrote to the leaders of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees. The department's cost-benefit 'analysis does not justify its recent decision to spend $1.2 billion to purchase and deploy" the new radiation portal monitors, the GAO reported. Homeland Security "relied on potential future performance to justify the purchase,' the agency said."

DOJ_NMG_0082487

Group Sues For Information On Profiling Of Arabs. The New York Times (10/18, MacFarquhar, 1.21M) reports that a civil rights group filed a suit yesterday against the Homeland Security Department and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement in an effort "to establish whether the government is using prohibited profiling methods against Arab-Americans and Muslims." The suit, by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, "asked the Federal District Court in the District of Columbia to compel the immigration agency under the Freedom of Information Act to release the nationalities of 237 people arrested for immigration violations in October 2004." The Times adds, "Arab-Americans and American Muslims have widespread suspicions that the spotlight is focused on them regarding accusations of terrorism, particularly around any election season, to spread concern among other voters and to intimidate them from speaking out."

The AP (10/18, Takruri) reports, "The Washington-based group believes the operation improperly used the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System - a government database created after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorists attacks to track visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries - to profile Arab and Muslim visitors to the United States. The domestic registration system required males from 24 Arab and predominantly Muslim countries and North Korea to register with immigration authorities. The registration requirement has since been phased out, but the database of information still exists. …. The 2004 operation became known as the 'October plan' after the FBI sent an e-mail advising its field offices and Homeland Security agencies of 'extraordinary measures' from the first week of October 2004 through the presidential inauguration."

TSA Considering Machines To Screen For Liquid Explosives. USA Today (10/18, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports that "in a potential strategy shift," Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley says the agency "may screen carry-on bags with new three-dimensional X-ray machines that are better at spotting liquid explosives, guns and other weapons." Hawley said the machines are "a step beyond where we are today." The technology "would improve security and could ease the liquid restrictions" that have been in place since August, according to aviation consultant Richard Roth. At issue is whether the TSA will "buy upgraded X-ray machines for $75,000 to $200,000 each or…wait possibly two years for better machines costing about $400,000. The TSA had planned to wait for the more expensive machines, which have the highest level of explosives detection. But, Hawley said, 'if it's going to be two years, maybe it makes sense economically and security-wise to put an intermediate step in between.'"

LAPD's Bratton Opposes Calls For MI5-Style US Agency. In a Washington Post (10/18, 748K) op-ed titled "We Don't Need Our Own MI5," LAPD Chief William J. Bratton recounts the 2005 arrests of suspected terrorists in Torrance, Calif., and notes, "my efforts were linked seamlessly with the Los Angeles office of the FBI and its Joint Terrorism Task Force and Field Intelligence Group. This is the new normal." Bratton adds that supporters of creating a new US counter-terrorism agency argue "that the 'FBI culture' is that of a criminal investigative agency driven to make arrests and bring prosecutions and that the bureau does not have the instinct to draw back and look at the wider picture as a purely intelligence-driven agency might. I disagree. … America's police departments have achieved a higher level of synergy with the FBI on intelligence and investigations than at any other time in history. If it's not broken, let's not try to fix it."

Judge Rejects NYC Effort To Dismiss Ground Zero Lawsuits. The New York Times (10/18, DePalma, 1.21M) reports that a federal judge has rejected New York City's claim "that it is protected by law from being sued over the way it handled rescue and recovery operations at ground zero. The ruling opens the way for lawsuits by thousands of workers who say they were made sick by exposure to toxic substances during the 10-month cleanup. Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of United States District Court in Manhattan rejected the city's motion to dismiss the lawsuits. In a 99-page decision released yesterday afternoon, he stated that state and federal statutes do provide some immunity for the city, its private contractors and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey for actions undertaken in response to an enemy attack. However, the judge said that protection is not universal and varies by time and place, making it necessary to hear the details of individual cases."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Makes Case For "Promoting Liberty" To Fight Terrorism. After discussing the persistence of the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17, O'Reilly), President Bush described, at length, his view of the "big ideological debate of the 21st century," which he said is "extremists, Islamo-fascists…radicals aiming to topple modern people. It is a massive challenge for the free world and for Muslims who…want to leave in peace. By far the vast majority of people want to have a peaceful existence." Bush added, "The biggest issue that we face is how do you protect yourself and our strategy is twofold. One is get on the offense and stay on the offense and bring them to justice. Secondly, defeat their ideology by helping moderate people, particularly in the middle-east, to come up with competing systems that speak to people's hopes and aspirations. And I have been widely criticized for promoting liberty but I believe it works as an antidote to the dark visions of these radicals. And I know this, that [if] the United States becomes isolationist and pulls out, a generation of those people will say 'they lost their way. They forgot what caused America to be created in the first place. They lost their faith in liberty.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082488

Bush Defends Musharraf. During his interview with Bill O'Reilly on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17), Bush was asked why Pakistan's President Musharraf can't "wipe out" the Taliban in Pakistan. President Bush replied that he had "a very good discussion with President Musharraf and President Karzai at the same dinner table and…we discussed how we deal with Taliban leaders who may be hiding in Pakistan and the answer is good intelligence sharing and President Musharraf made the commitment that on good actionable intelligence that he will take care of the leaders of the Taliban." Bush added that Musharraf "has already done a lot" and "has been very effective on al Qaeda. … He understands it doesn't do his country any good to have extremists and radicals fomenting violence, whether it be inside Pakistan or outside Pakistan."

Gingrich Praises Bush's Performance In O'Reilly Interview. On Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/17), Bill O'Reilly asked Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to critique Bush's appearance. Gingrich responded, "I don't remember very often seeing the President as comfortable and as engaged as he was. I think he got stronger the more he talked with you. And I'm looking forward to tomorrow night's segment because it seems you managed to get him not with talking points and kinds of speeches but talking from the heart."

NATO Commander In Afghanistan Admits 2001-02 Strategic Mistakes. The AP (10/18, Jelinek) reports, "The U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan failed to follow through as it should have after ousting the Taliban government in 2001, setting the stage for this year's deadly resurgence, the NATO commander in the country said Tuesday. The mistake consisted of adopting 'a peacetime approach' too early, British Gen. David Richards told Pentagon reporters. He said the international community has six months to correct the problem before losing Afghan support, reiterating a warning he issued last week. 'The Taliban were defeated. ... And it looked all pretty hunky-dory,' Richard said of the environment at the end of 2001. 'We thought it was all done ... and didn't treat it as aggressively as ... with the benefit of hindsight, we should have done.'"

The Washington Times (10/18, Scarborough, 88K), in an article titled, "British general faults U.S. for Taliban resurgence," reports Richards "told reporters at the Pentagon that the Taliban was able to regroup because American forces remained somewhat isolated. The Afghan army was not established to the point that it could fill security roles in Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace, and other southern towns. … He said there also was a 'disconnect' in what the U.S.-led humanitarian and reconstruction effort could provide and what the Afghan people expected. 'The Taliban exploited it,' Gen. Richards said. 'They exploited this sense of frustration amongst the people who just didn't see all the good things that have been talked about.'"

UK Troops Exit Pacified Province; 44 Taliban Killed Across Afghanistan. The New York Times/AP (10/18, Press) reports, "British troops pulled out of a once restive district [Musa Qala] in southern Afghanistan on Tuesday after reaching an agreement with tribal elders for Afghan forces to take over security. NATO also announced a new countrywide military operation with Afghan troops intended to maintain pressure on Taliban fighters during the fall and winter and pave the way for long-promised development after the most bitter fighting in five years. Officials said on Tuesday that fighting across Afghanistan had killed 44 suspected Taliban militants." Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, "said the soldiers were leaving because there had not been a major clash in the district in 35 days."

State-DOD Turf Battles May Have Hindered Initial US Response To Iraq Insurgency. PBS' Frontline (10/17), in a harshly critical examination of the Bush Administration's pre-war planning, reports, "The Pentagon had spent more than a year preparing for the war. But it was only eight weeks before the war began that Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld hired a retired Army General to handle postwar Iraq." Ret. Lt. Gen. Jay Garner said, "Everybody was focused on the war. They were focused on regime change. And that took all of their energy. And so, I wasn't a central focus of them at that time, because the spotlight wasn't on me yet." After "Garner arrived at the Pentagon, there was no plan and no staff. And when he began to hire one, he walked into a political buzzsaw." Ambassador Barbara Bodine from the Office of Humanitarian Assistance: "I was very surprised at how bitter and nasty the relations were between State and DoD. It was not one of differing views to serve the President; it was a full-scale war."

DOJ_NMG_0082489

Bush Administration Reportedly Pressuring Maliki To Issue Broad Amnesty. The Financial Times (10/18, Khalaf, Dinmore) reports the Bush administration "is pressing the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki to issue a 'broad' and 'painful' amnesty for insurgents in spite of intense opposition to the proposal from politicians both in Iraq and the US, according to a senior administration official. … The US is advocating more determined moves towards a national reconciliation with the Sunni community that dominates Iraq's insurgency. It also wants a tougher line on the Shia militias. 'You need the government to move forward with a programme – it should include an amnesty in a broad fashion, a comprehensive amnesty proposal,' the senior US official, who asked not to be named, told the Financial Times. The official was not explicit about the terms of the proposed amnesty, but he said: 'No successful amnesty is not painful or sweeping.'"

Senior Sadr Aide Arrested. The New York Times (10/18, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Iraqi and American troops arrested a senior aide to Moktada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric. The aide, whom the military did not name but who was identified by a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, was arrested on suspicion of having directed kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunnis and Shiites, and of attacking Americans. … The arrest of Mr. Sadr's aide, which took place in the early hours of Tuesday, enraged Mr. Sadr's followers, who called for citywide demonstrations on Wednesday. A spokesman for Mr. Sadr identified the man as Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, the head of Mr. Sadr's office in the poor Shiite neighborhood of Shuala."

McCain Claims US Still Has "Capacity To Win" In Iraq. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/18, Schultze, 259K) reports Sen. John McCain "said Tuesday the United States should 'accelerate as much as possible' the Iraqi government's assuming a lead role in the Iraq war and taking over many of the responsibilities handled by American soldiers. … 'The consequences of failure in Iraq are catastrophic,' McCain said during a campaign appearance for state Assembly Speaker John Gard of Peshtigo, the Republican candidate for the 8th Congressional District seat. 'We cannot lose it, and I believe we still have the capacity to win,' said McCain."

Kerry Alleges Bush Made "Gigantic Blunder" Committing US Troops Indefinitely. The AP (10/18, Glover) reports Sen. John Kerry said President Bush "committed 'a gigantic blunder' by giving top Iraqi officials assurances that U.S. forces would remain indefinitely in the war-torn country. Kerry argued that" Bush "should have pressured Iraqi leaders to set aside their differences and focus on making progress in assuming responsibility for security, a move that could lead to a reduction in U.S. troop levels. 'The absence of pressure I find is an enormous blunder that gives the Iraqi politicians a free pass to continue the status quo that most Americans understand is a failure, that's not working,' Kerry said. 'I'm amazed by it.'"

Thirty-Six Deaths Reported On "Relatively Calm" Day In Iraq. ABC World News (10/17, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, a sign of just how difficult things have become. Bombings and shootings killed 36 Iraqis, mostly in Baghdad today. And that made it a relatively calm day, compared to the recent violence.""

Four US Soldiers Killed By IED Yesterday. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "four U.S. soldiers were killed Tuesday morning when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, disclosing no further details."

US Troops Assist Iraqi Forces In Balad. ABC World News (10/17, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "North of Baghdad, US forces patrolled the streets of Balad, trying to restore order, after dozens of people were killed in the last few days of sectarian violence." CBS Evening News (10/17, story 2, 1:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "In Balad it was all-out civil war between the country's two main ethnic groups, sparked by the beheading of 19 Shiite laborers in a neighboring Sunni town Friday night. With no US troops present because they turned the town over to Iraqi forces last month, Shiite militiamen were free to hunt down Sunnis to kill. Five days of bloodletting left close to 100 people dead, bodies piled on top of each other filled the local morgue. The incident highlights once again how powerless Iraq security forces are to stop the sectarian violence. … But residents also blamed American forces at this base located right next door to Balad for failing to intervene. US officials said they couldn't act until asked to do so by Iraqi leaders." USA Today/AP (10/18, 7A, Hurst) reports, "Iraq's 4th Army, which took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, had been unable to stem recent bloodshed in Balad."

McClatchy (10/18, Youssef) report, "American forces began returning to the city Saturday and are patrolling there, though it was unclear Tuesday whether Balad and the surrounding area have been pacified." Balad residents reported the city "and the nearby town of al Dulyiyah remained under the control of armed groups that had targeted the residents and may have killed as many as 100 in four days of violence." The Washington Post (10/18, A16, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) reports, "Police and black-clad Shiite militiamen toting machine guns sealed off the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday, guarding against attacks by Sunni insurgents. … Calm largely returned to Balad by Tuesday." US troops "patrolled the city and guarded one end of a Tigris River bridge that links Balad with Duluiyah. … On the Duluiyah end of the bridge, angry Sunni insurgents gathered in force, clutching their PKC machine guns and rocket launchers, standing their tense watch."

DOJ_NMG_0082490

The AP (10/18, Hurst) reports, "As the violence in the Balad region was reaching full pitch on Saturday, the AP asked the U.S. military in Baghdad if American forces were involved in trying to quell the killing. 'As of this time, the (U.S.-led force in Iraq) has not been asked to provide any assistance,' the military said in a return e-mail. … In response to the same question on Monday, the military responded that U.S.-led forces were 'partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad.'" The AP adds, "By late Tuesday, the military had not responded to questions about when the U.S. military first was asked to intervene and how many American forces were involved."

McClatchy (10/18, Youssef) report that "the decision to send American troops into Balad…was another setback for U.S. hopes that Iraqi forces will be able to take control of security for the country. Violence has increased steadily throughout Iraq despite an increase of tens of thousands of American-trained Iraqi soldiers and police, and U.S. officials concede that their strategy of training Iraqi troops to replace Americans hasn't worked."

CBS Evening News (10/17, story 2, 1:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "When asked if this was a setback for Iraqi security forces, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld admitted for the first time that areas turned over to Iraqi control may have to be taken back by US forces who thought their job there was done."

Army Program To Train Iraqis Runs Into Hitches. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A1, Jaffe, 2.03M) reports in a front page 2,771-word article on the problems afflicting US "advisers to the Iraqi army." President Bush "has touted such advisory teams as key to the U.S. strategy for stabilizing Iraq and bringing American troops home," but the program has drawn "scathing" and "biting reviews" from the soldiers who went through it. Army records and "interviews with dozens of advisers show that, thus far, the Army hasn't treated the advisory program as a priority. The job has often fallen to the military's less seasoned second team: reservists, guardsmen and retirees called back to active duty. ... The teams have had to scrounge for equipment that is routinely allocated to big combat units." The Army is striving for improvements, which might require "sweeping institutional change": "One option under consideration is to double the number of advisers to about 7,000, from about 3,500, by tearing apart some traditional combat brigades and assigning officers and senior soldiers to advisory teams."

Iraqi Interior Ministry Denies Two Officers' Transfer Is Due To Militia Purge. USA Today/AP (10/18, 7A, Hurst) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is "under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and for violence elsewhere. The Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week." Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih "were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal had anything to do with militia activity. … The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence."

The New York Times (10/18, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Senior American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, have issued stark warnings to the Maliki government of growing American impatience, especially at the government's failure to stop the scourge of death squads operating with the knowledge or support of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police."

Methodology Of Survey Claiming 655,000 Iraqi Deaths Disputed. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/18, 2.03M), Steven E. Moore, who trained Iraqi researchers for the International Republican Institute from 2003 to 2004 and conducted survey research for the Coalition Forces from 2005 to 2006, writes, "After doing survey research in Iraq for nearly two years, I was surprised to read that a study by a group from Johns Hopkins University claims that 655,000 Iraqis have died as a result of the war. … The Johns Hopkins tally is wildly at odds with any numbers I have seen in that country. Survey results frequently have a margin of error of plus or minus 3% or 5% -- not 1200%." Moore continues, "In their 2006 report…the Johns Hopkins team says it used 47 cluster points for their sample of 1,849 interviews. This is astonishing: I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points."

Friedman Likens Current Iraq Fighting To Tet Offensive. In his column for the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M), Thomas Friedman writes, "What we're seeing there seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive. ... The jihadists want to sow so much havoc that Bush supporters will be defeated in the midterms and the president will face a revolt from his own party, as well as from Democrats, if he does not begin a pullout from Iraq. The jihadists follow our politics much more closely than people realize. ... It would be depressing to see the jihadists influence our politics with a Tet-like media/war frenzy. But there are only two reasons now for the U.S. to remain in Iraq: because it thinks that staying will make things better or that leaving will make things drastically worse. Alas, it is increasingly hard to see how our presence is making things better. ... While leaving would no doubt exacerbate the civil war, staying in Iraq indefinitely to prevent even more Shiites and Sunnis from killing one another is not going to fly with the U.S. public much longer."

DOJ_NMG_0082491

Military Honors Seen As Evolving To Reflect Changing Front. The Washington Post (10/18, White, 748K) reports, "The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan not only have changed the methods U.S. troops use to fight an urban insurgency, they also have caused the U.S. military services to change the way they look at honoring troops who are fighting on the difficult battlefields." For example, the USMC "changed the rules that determine which Marines are eligible for the Combat Action Ribbon, an honor that previously required troops to both receive and return fire against an enemy," so that "anyone who has been exposed to the detonation of" IEDs is now eligible. The Army in turn "introduced its Combat Action Badge, which recognizes soldiers who are exposed to enemy action but are not officially in combat roles. That badge was designed to honor soldiers such as military police, truck drivers and fuel specialists who daily face the dangers of war -- such as roadside bombs -- in Iraq's urban battlefield."

Comrades Say Goodbye To DC Native Killed In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Paley, 748K) reports on the death of Airman 1st Class LeeBernard E. Chavis, who "was killed by a sniper as he tried to keep civilians away from a suspected roadside bomb." The highly emotional article describes the grief of his comrades at a "patriot detail," which "is rarely observed by anyone outside the military -- not by the president, not by members of Congress, not by the children or spouse of the fallen service member."

WPost Likens Somalia To Afghanistan In 1990s. The Washington Post (10/18, 748K) editorializes, "Four months ago an Islamic fundamentalist movement gained control of Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, after defeating an alliance of local warlords backed by the United States. Since then the Islamic Courts Union, as the alliance is called, has expanded its control over much of southern Somalia, including the port city of Kismaayo. It has alternatively negotiated and skirmished with a rival, internationally backed government that clings to a base in the western town of Baidoa. It has come to the brink of war with neighboring Ethiopia, which reportedly has sent troops into Somalia, and has won the support of Ethiopia's hostile neighbor, Eritrea. … What is the United States doing about this dangerous combination of an emerging terrorist base and possible regional war in East Africa? The sad and alarming answer is next to nothing." Somalia, adds the Post, "is looking more and more like Afghanistan in the late 1990s -- dominated by an Islamic fundamentalist movement that shelters al-Qaeda; prone to the meddling of neighbors; virtually ignored by the United States."

DOJ:

Writer Expresses Concern About Taylor As DC US Attorney. In a column for the Washington Examiner (10/18), Harry Jaffe writes, "Meet Jeffrey Taylor, who is suddenly and without much fanfare the most powerful law enforcement official in D.C. Taylor is a 41-year-old lawyer. He was born and raised in small towns in Northern California. He played high school football and got A's. He went to Stanford University and got a law degree from Harvard. He served as a prosecutor in San Diego, worked for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah — where he helped write the U.S. Patriot Act — and did a stint with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. Most recently, he was counsel to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. … Now he's our top lawman." Jaffe continues, "What, among his stellar credentials, qualifies Taylor to become the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia? He has experience in fighting terrorists, but can he battle the terrorists who shoot up corners in Anacostia and shake down D.C. residents in Georgetown? … These are some of the questions Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton will have on her mind today when Taylor is scheduled to have his first meeting with our representative in Congress. … 'He will be essentially a district attorney,' says Norton, who was not consulted on Taylor's appointment. 'The great majority of his cases will be criminal cases from the District of Columbia.'" Jaffe adds, "I have not met Taylor, who lives with his wife on Capital Hill. I am not passing judgment on him. But it worries me when the top prosecutor in town has never worked our streets. … Taylor succeeds Ken Wainstein, who moves up to run the Justice Department's new National Security Division. Wainstein was terrific for D.C. Like Taylor, he was a favorite at Main Justice, and he also held a top job at FBI headquarters; but Wainstein also worked as a line prosecutor here in D.C. for years. He locked up murderers. He knew our turf, he put his prosecutors in the community, he sent them after gang-bangers and local hoodlums. Jeff Taylor made his mark as an elite terrorist hunter. He helped create the Patriot Act. A few weeks ago he was Alberto Gonzales' top counselor on terrorism and national security. … My fear is that he will favor national security prosecutions over keeping D.C. residents secure. When Bill Clinton was president, Eleanor Holmes Norton helped select federal judges and the U.S. Attorney. George W. Bush appoints with little regard for D.C.'s needs."

DOJ_NMG_0082492

DOJ Among Department Missing Senator's Deadline For IT Projects List. The Federal Times (10/18, Friedman) reports, "Seven departments have missed a deadline to detail their most expensive information technology projects for a Senate subcommittee." The Times continues, "Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., last month directed all agencies to submit lists by Oct. 13 of IT projects worth more than $250,000 to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on financial management, which he chairs. … 'A non-response raises the level of concern . . . that there may be inefficiencies,' said John Hart, a spokesman for Coburn. 'The only way those questions can be answered is a complete response.'" The Times adds, "For each project, Coburn requested that agencies note the project's vendor, when work began, the project's original estimated cost and how much money has been spent so far. The letter also asked whether cost overruns have occurred, if a new cost estimate has been made and what that estimate is. .. As of Oct. 16, the Agriculture, Energy, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Justice, State and Veterans Affairs departments had not responded, according to Hart. All other departments had either submitted the information or requested an extension, he said. Coburn has not yet reviewed the lists that were received, Hart added. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department contacted the senator's office on Oct. 16 and is creating a list."

DOJ Task Force Will Examine Privacy Issues. Federal Computer Week (10/18, Moore) reports, "A task force has issued a series of recommendations regarding privacy in justice information systems." FCW continues, "The Privacy Technology Focus Group was chartered to examine the exchange of personally identifiable information, focusing on justice and public safety data. Last November, the Justice Department brought together a group of public- and private-sector specialists to look into privacy technology. The group's working teams covered areas such as access and authentication, data aggregation and dissemination, and identity theft." FCW adds, "A report issued earlier this month that stemmed from the focus group's activities offers suggestions. Some relate to the Global Justice Extensible Markup Language Data Model (JXDM). For example, the report recommends reviewing and creating privacy metadata in Global JXDM. That metadata would describe sensitivity, use limitations and other characteristics of data."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Vacates Lay Conviction. CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Velshi) reports that Ken Lay's "conviction has been erased. Judge Sim Lake, who supervised the case, has today, just a little while ago, erased Ken Lay's 10-count conviction. He cited a 2004 precedent that said that because Ken Lay was convicted but died before he had a chance to appeal, the government could not go forward and punish him or his estate. … Ken Lay's family moved immediately after he died to get the conviction erased. They've actually made a move to get the bond money back. This, of course, means that the $44 million that the Department of Justice was trying to claim from his estate will not be claimed. The convictions, the 10 fraud and conspiracy convictions against Ken Lay, have been erased from the record entirely."

USA Today (10/18, Farrell, 2.27M) reports that Lake's ruling has been widely expected since Lay's death. As a matter of law, "a conviction against a criminal defendant is not final until the defendant has had the chance to appeal the verdict. Therefore, Lay's death short-circuited the full legal process to which he was entitled."

The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Jones, 2.03M) reports, "According to Judge Lake's opinion, the government had argued that Mr. Lay's estate shouldn't get to keep the proceeds of fraud that would otherwise be subject to forfeiture and distribution to victims of the crimes. Judge Lake rejected this argument, citing precedent stating that an individual who suffered a loss may pursue reimbursement in civil court. Although the government had asked Judge Lake to defer his ruling so it could seek retroactive legislation in Congress to let the conviction stand, he said 'the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent.'"

The New York Times (10/18, Murphy, 1.21M) reports that the decision "prevents the government from trying to seize more than $43.5 million from Mr. Lay's estate that prosecutors claimed he stole from Enron before it collapsed in 2001."

The Washington Post (10/18, D1, Johnson, 748K) reports, "With the judge's order, Lay's conviction on 10 criminal charges will be erased from the record. … But governance experts said Lay's name forever will be linked with the era's most complex and far-reaching corporate fraud."

The Houston Chronicle (10/18, Fowler) reports, "The Department of Justice had argued against vacating the conviction, saying it would unjustly enrich Lay's estate by preventing criminal forfeiture proceedings to recover restitution for victims of Enron's downfall. … The government even proposed a law that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in such circumstances. That effort didn't succeed." The Chronicle adds, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has a civil proceeding against Lay that it brought in 2004, but prosecutors could also file their own case. … The Justice Department hasn't said if it will go after Lay's assets via a civil proceeding. A statement from Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra on Tuesday, however, seems to indicate that's a possibility. … 'We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron,' Sierra said. 'Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082493

The AP (10/18, Lozano) reports, "Prosecutors offered no counter legal argument in the case, but asked Lake to hold off on a ruling until next week so Congress could consider legislation from the Justice Department that changes federal law regarding the abatement of criminal convictions. Congress recessed for the elections without considering the legislation. … In their motion to Lake last month, prosecutors Sean Berkowitz and John Hueston wrote that certain provisions of the proposed legislation would apply to Lay's case, including 'that the death of a defendant charged with a criminal offense shall not be the basis for abating or otherwise invalidating either a verdict returned or the underlying indictment.' … 'Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent,' Lake wrote." United Press International (10/18) also reports on the ruling.

UnitedHealth Options Practices May Lead To Federal Charges. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/18, Phelps) reports, "The sheer size and persistence of stock-option backdating at UnitedHealth Group Inc. could be the basis of a criminal investigation, former federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The Tribune continues, "Particularly vulnerable is Chief Executive William McGuire, the prime beneficiary of the backdating that allowed top executives to reap additional millions of dollars in profits by granting their options at times when UnitedHealth's stock was at low points. … 'Because of the scale of the options granting, this has to be put in the egregious category, and that makes criminal prosecution more likely,' said Christopher Bebel, a Houston securities attorney who once prosecuted white-collar cases for the U.S. attorney's office in Minnesota." The Tribune adds, "McGuire's unexercised options totaled more than $1.6 billion at the end of last year. … He resigned as chairman Sunday and will depart as CEO by Dec. 1 as the result of an independent investigation into the company's backdating practices. … UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay said the company has seen no indication from authorities of any criminal investigation." The Tribune notes, "The company previously has acknowledged that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department through the office of the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, best known for prosecuting Wall Street and securities matters. … Minneapolis attorney Doug Kelley, a former assistant U.S. attorney, said the involvement of the Southern District is a signal that criminal issues are being pursued. The SEC also can make recommendations to the Justice Department if it thinks criminal prosecution is appropriate, Kelley said."

Departing CEO To Be Paid $5.1 Million A Year For Life. The AP (10/18, Freed) reports, "After being forced to step down over the company's compensation practices, UnitedHealth chief executive William McGuire will retire on $5.1 million a year, according to the calculations of a watchdog group." The AP continues, "McGuire has agreed to retire by Dec. 1, and he stepped down from his post as chairman on Sunday. The move came after a company-sponsored investigation determined that many of the company's stock options were backdated to make them more favorable for the recipients, including McGuire, other executives, and thousands of UnitedHealth employees. … McGuire's retirement benefits include a $6.5 million lump sum, according to Portland, Maine-based group The Corporate Library, which has criticized McGuire's pay before. … McGuire has stock options that were worth $1.78 billion as of the end of 2005. Their current value is not known. Investors have sold off UnitedHealth shares since questions about options backdating arose in March. Then, on Sunday, UnitedHealth said McGuire would re-price his options to the highest point in the year they were granted to remove any possibility that he got a favorable price."

Murray Says Compensation Committees Should Have Truly Independent Directors. Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A2), "A shocker in Sunday's report on the options heist at UnitedHealth Group Inc. is that Chief Executive William McGuire had an inside man on the company's board: William G. Spears, graduate of Choate and Princeton, a Harvard M.B.A., and the founder of a New York investment-management firm that bears his name. … In theory, Mr. Spears was an 'independent' director. But the investigation, led by former SEC enforcement chief William McLucas, discovered he had close financial ties to Dr. McGuire. He served as trustee for two trusts benefiting the CEO's children and managed between $15 million and $55 million of the McGuire family fortune. … Lawyers for Mr. Spears argue all this was duly disclosed. … Trouble is, no one on the board remembers being told of the relationship." Murray adds that "the UnitedHealth mess suggests there is more to be done. Sarbanes-Oxley put strict requirements on audit committees, but not on compensation committees. They should consist of truly independent directors and should work with truly independent compensation consultants."

DOJ_NMG_0082494

Pearlstein Faults UnitedHealth Over Options Scandal. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (10/18, D1), "Anyone with health insurance from UnitedHealth Group knows what happens if you fail to fill in every box on the form, or attach the requisite back-up material, to get reimbursed for a $40 prescription. You're not going to see a dime until you've been put on hold for 30 minutes, faxed the paperwork twice to somebody in Minnetonka, Minn., and demanded to talk to a supervisor. … Isn't it odd that a company could be so persnickety when it comes to pinching pennies from doctors and patients, and so cavalier when it comes to lavishing executives with hundreds of millions of dollars of shareholders' money? … In response to these revelations, you'd think UnitedHealth directors would at least have had the manners to apologize to shareholders, if not to resign. Instead, they've followed the well-worn path of insisting they did nothing wrong while taking steps to ensure it won't happen again."

Board Issues Guidance On Auditing Value Of Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A10, Hughes) reports that the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board has issued "long-awaited guidance for auditing the value of employee stock options. … In its guidance, the PCAOB reminds auditors that because companies typically must estimate the value of employee stock options because the prices generally aren't set in a market, there is a risk of producing misleading figures. As a result, the board said that auditors should be aware of possible pitfalls, such as how changes in assumptions can affect the fair value of the options." The audit oversight board "also offered guidance on when to use the Black-Scholes model, and when to use what is known as a lattice model. The Black-Scholes model for valuing employee stock options is more standardized, but a lattice model 'might more fully reflect the substantive characteristics' of the employee stock option, the board said. In a lattice model, there are more variables, which means companies could more specifically tailor the value of stock options to factors that are specific to their companies."

NYTimes Supports Justice Department Review Of Buyouts. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "Buyout firms are engaged in an unprecedented feeding frenzy, gobbling up publicly traded companies like never before. While buyouts can set lagging businesses back on the right track, regulators and shareholders must be watchful to ensure that managers demand fair value for the companies." The Times adds, "The Justice Department reportedly is looking into whether the old-boy network of private-equity firms has gotten a little too chummy, examining whether firms are colluding to keep prices low. It is a move we support. Too often public stockholders end up getting the raw end of these deals."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Page Board Examining Trip Kolbe Took In 1996 With Two Pages. The AP (10/18, Margasak) reports, "House page program overseers this week discussed a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took with two former pages and others in 1996, a congressional official said Tuesday. The trip is under review by the Justice Department. The five-member House Page Board, three lawmakers and two House officials, took no action and did not have any information beyond recent news accounts of the trip, the official said." The AP notes Kolbe is "the only openly gay Republican in Congress." The AP adds "the discussion about the Kolbe trip "indicates that the board is moving beyond the overly friendly e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages that ex-Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., sent to former male pages."

The Washington Post (10/18, A9, Weisman, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "Members of the Page Board sought the review after news reports last week that the Justice Department had opened a preliminary inquiry into a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) took with male former pages in 1996. That report sparked a conference call Monday among board members." But because "the Page Board, which consists of three House members and two senior House officials, does not have the authority to investigate members of Congress, the matter was turned over to the House ethics committee, formally known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct." The Post adds it is "not clear what allegations the board was concerned about."

Kolbe Allegedly Had "Inappropriate" Contact With Page. The Washington Post (10/18, A9, Weisman, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "The Washington Post has learned of a potentially inappropriate incident involving Kolbe and a male page. The man recently told the House clerk's office and the FBI about an encounter with the Arizona Republican that occurred about five years ago when he was 16, according to someone familiar with the man's account. The page told authorities that he was 'uncomfortable with a particular social encounter' that involved physical contact when he and Kolbe were alone, the source said yesterday."

GOP Debating "Big Tent" Inclusion Of Gays. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Neuman, 918K) reports the Republican Party has "broadened its appeal with a 'big tent' strategy of reaching out to voters who might typically be Democrats. But a debate is now growing within the GOP about whether the tent has become too big -- by including gays whose political views may conflict with the goals of the party's powerful evangelical wing." Some conservative Christians, "who are pivotal to the GOP's get-out-the-vote effort, are charging that gay Republican staffers in Congress may have thwarted their legislative agenda. There are even calls for what some have dubbed a 'pink purge' of high-ranking gay Republicans on Capitol Hill -- and in the administration." The "long simmering tension between gays and the religious right within the GOP has erupted into open conflict at a sensitive time, just weeks before a midterm election that may cost Republicans control of Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0082495

Trandahl Seen As Key Figure On Foley Scandal. The New York Times (10/18, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports former House clerk Jeff Trandahl "has emerged as a central figure in the case of how the House Republican leadership dealt with the conduct" of former Rep. Mark Foley. As the House ethics committee "pursues its investigation, few accounts are more crucial than Mr. Trandahl's in determining whether Republican leaders acted with enough urgency. He is scheduled to testify to the committee on Thursday, when he could corroborate — or contradict — accusations that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's behavior at least three years ago." The House clerk, "a vestige of the patronage system, serves at the pleasure of the speaker and, in recent years, Mr. Hastert's influential chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. House investigators are trying to deduce whether a deteriorating relationship between Mr. Van Der Meid and others in the Capitol, particularly Mr. Trandahl, had a role in the handling of the complaints about Mr. Foley." Over the years, "people who worked with him on the Hill said, Mr. Trandahl received periodic complaints that Mr. Foley was acting too friendly to the pages or interns." The House ethics committee is "trying to determine whether Mr. Trandahl simply passed along the information to Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley, or whether he alerted the speaker's office that Mr. Foley's overfriendly behavior had grown beyond idle gossip."

Contributors Want Foley Campaign To Return Funds. The Hill (10/18, Young) reports former Rep. Mark Foley's campaign held a fundraiser on September 26, three days before his resignation attended by a small number of lobbyists who "had no idea that some of them would soon be scrambling to get those checks returned." The lobbyists "are not the only contributors looking to distance themselves from the Foley scandal and recoup the thousands of dollars they gave to help the incumbent, who did not face a competitive challenger, return to the House for his seventh term." A "number of corporate and trade association PACs also have sent word to Foley's campaign that they want refunds." By Friday, Sept. 29, "some of them were placing calls to Foley's campaign office in Florida or to the Washington, D.C.-based Catalyst Group, which administered his fundraising: they wanted their money back." The Hill "contacted more than a dozen PACs that ranked among the biggest contributors to Foley's campaign and to his leadership PAC this election cycle." Most "did not return calls," and some "declined to comment." But others "disclosed that they have or plan to deliver letters to Foley's campaign treasurer Donna Winterson, also his sister, asking that their money be returned."

Foley To Name Alleged Abuser. CBS Evening News (10/17, story 6,0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Former Congressman Mark Foley plans to tell the Archdiocese of Miami the name of the Catholic clergyman who he says abused him as a teenager. The Foley lawyer says the clergyman is still alive but can't be prosecuted because the statute of limitations ran out a long time ago."

The New York Times/AP (10/18) reports Foley attorney Gerald Richman "said the clergyman was still alive. An archdiocese spokeswoman said the church had urged Mr. Foley to identify his abuser. Mr. Richman said the statute of limitations on sexual assault had expired long ago."

House GOP Aides Coordinating Message To Deflect Foley Scandal. The Hill (10/18, O'Connor) reports, "Desperate to talk about something other than scandal, House Republican leadership staffs are coordinating a messaging blitz in an attempt to shift some emphasis back to national security and the economy before the Nov. 7 election." With less than "three weeks for the GOP to salvage its majority, the new media campaign is the first formal coordination between leaders' offices since they were fractured by the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley." Aides "to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) met yesterday in the Lincoln Room of the Speaker's Capitol suite to plan ways to help embattled Republicans sidestep national media and target local press."

Foley Scandal Prompts Parents To Monitor Kids' Internet Use. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, D1, Vascellaro, Athavaley, 2.03M) reports the "fallout from the Foley scandal has sent shockwaves through Congress and rattled employees across the country who are increasingly on edge about whether their boss is tracking their every online move. And, as new evidence about the vulnerability of kids online emerges in spurts, it is also jolting parents into better monitoring what their children say and do at their computers." In "recent weeks, more parents are turning to pricey software programs that record not only what Web sites their kids visit, but also the content of their emails and instant messages."

Report Says Cunningham Used Intelligence Panel To Aid Contractors. The AP (10/18, Shrader) reports former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "parlayed his seat on the Intelligence Committee into at least $70 million in business for two contractors who in turn paid him millions in bribes, an investigator hired by the panel has concluded." The report, released by ranking Democrat Jane Harman, "found that Cunningham had exploited weaknesses in the system for monitoring secret federal spending." It said that Cunningham "and at least one associate secured the cooperation — or at least the acquiescence — of many people. They included members of Congress and their aides who handled bills that directed money to certain programs, Pentagon officials who awarded the contracts and officials at agencies where the contract work was done." In a "sign of partisan divisions on the committee," Harman "unilaterally released the five-page document after months of disagreement with the committee's chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. Together, the two had initiated the investigation, led by special counsel Michael Stern, and had hoped to release the findings jointly."

DOJ_NMG_0082496

The Washington Times/UPI (10/18, Waterman) reports Cunningham "inserted up to $80 million worth of earmarks for the contractors who bribed him into classified intelligence authorization bills between 2000 and 2006, bullying staff who became concerned, according to an interim report from a special House investigation." The report "says that over six years, Cunningham and co-conspirators Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes 'repeatedly sought to use [the committee] to facilitate the objectives of the conspiracy, particularly through requests for congressional funding ... that benefited Wilkes, Wade and other companies,' which it does not identify."

The New York Times (10/18, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Cunningham "pressured and intimidated staff members of the House Intelligence Committee to help steer more than $70 million in classified federal business to favored military contractors." The investigation found that Cunningham "repeatedly abused his position on the committee to authorize money for military projects, often over the objections of staff members who criticized some of the spending as wasteful. The inquiry also found that despite numerous 'red flags' about the propriety of a particular contract for work on a controversial Pentagon counterintelligence program, committee staff members for three years 'continued to accept and support Mr. Cunningham's growing requests for this project.'"

The Hill (10/18, Tiron) reports Intelligence Committee staff were "fully aware that the funds were intended for a specific recipient and 'either actively cooperated with or did not resist Cunningham's efforts to steer the funds toward that recipient,' according to the report." Panel Chairman Pete Hoekstra "took immediate offense to ranking member Rep. Jane Harman's (D-Calif.) decision to release the summary, saying that the move shows 'blatant disregard' for a bipartisan agreement they had made to fully review the Cunningham matter and charging her with politicizing the inquiry."

The Washington Post (10/18, A19, Pincus, 748K) reports Cunningham "channeled more than $70 million in Pentagon and intelligence agency contracts to two companies that paid him bribes, and required the 'cooperation or at least the non-interference of many people' to pull that off, a congressional investigation has found." Since Cunningham "had no authority to award contracts, he needed the acquiescence of some members of Congress, congressional staff members and Defense Department officials, according to the executive summary." The summary "discloses for the first time that the government is investigating the CIA's award of 'several large contracts' that involved Kyle Dustin 'Dusty' Foggo when he was No. 3 at the agency under then-Director Porter J. Goss. Foggo was a longtime friend of contractor Brent R. Wilkes, who federal investigators say was one of Cunningham's co-conspirators along with contractor Mitchell J. Wade."

Weldon Campaign Suggests Democrats At DOJ Leaked Probe. The AP (10/18, Dale) reports, "A day after the FBI raided the offices of a lobbying firm run by Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and his close friend, the Republican's campaign blamed publicity about the Justice Department investigation on 'the left-wing, liberal attack machine.' … Weldon's campaign spokesman said there are Clinton-era holdovers among the civil-service employees in the Justice Department. 'I don't mean to impugn the motive of the Justice Department, but there may be partisan motives for leaking word of this inquiry three weeks before the election,' the spokesman, Pete Peterson, said." The AP adds, "Weldon has clashed with the Bush administration and others in Washington," most recently over the Pentagon's "Able Danger" program.

On Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (10/16), correspondent Major Garrett reported, "Weldon told Fox he's done nothing wrong and neither has his daughter." Weldon: "They go to my daughter's house and treat her like she's a common thug. I mean, my daughter has done nothing wrong." Garrett: "Weldon also casts doubt on the timing of the investigation and intense media scrutiny it sparked," and "Fox asked Weldon if he was accusing the FBI of being a pawn." Weldon: "And there's no conspiratorial thing here or paranoia – it is what it is. And we will cooperate fully with the Justice Department and we already have said that."

The New York Times (10/18, Johnston, 1.21M) says that "Weldon is describing a federal investigation…as an election-season ploy that will find that 'I engaged in no wrongdoing.' 'I am extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress,' Mr. Weldon…said in a statement issued Monday evening. 'The timing of this situation is deeply concerning.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082497

Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Under Probe. The Washington Post (10/18, A8, Smith, Leonnig) reports, "Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade were surprised three years ago to be invited to a luncheon in honor of visiting Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), hosted by Bogoljub Karic, a wealthy Serbian businessman who had been barred from visiting or trading with the United States because of his close ties to former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic." The Post continues, "Weldon 'was visiting solely because of Karic,' whom he was trying to get off the U.S. blacklist, a former senior embassy official familiar with the visit concluded. 'It seemed odd' at the time, because Karic had no obvious tie to Weldon's district outside Philadelphia, and Weldon should have known the embassy was shunning contacts with him, the official said. … What the embassy apparently did not know is that the Karic family that year signed a contract with Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner that called for monthly payments of $20,000 for 'management, government and public relations,' according to a copy of the March 2003 contract. In all, the family paid Karen Weldon's firm $133,858 that year for efforts she undertook to set up a foundation for it." The Post adds, "Curt Weldon's visit and that deal are under investigation by the FBI, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the probe. His efforts to assist clients of his daughter's consulting firm in their dealings with the federal government are the focus of that probe, according to sources familiar with it . … FBI raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida on Monday, including one of Karen Weldon's home and another of her consulting and lobbying firm, were part of the bureau's search for evidence of whether the lawmaker used his influence to benefit himself or his daughter's firm, according to the sources. … A grand jury has been impaneled as part of the investigation, and it has obtained evidence gathered via wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers, the sources said."

Meanwhile, The Hill (10/18, Schor) reports, "As President Bush prepared to announce a new energy cooperation pact with Russia in May 2002, Rep. Curt Weldon…and 10 fellow lawmakers sat down in Moscow with executives of oil and gas trader Itera Group, praising the company as a prime prospect for U.S. partnerships. Itera had fallen under scrutiny at the time for its ties to Gazprom," and "Itera is facing new questions this week after federal agents raided the company's Florida office as well as the homes of Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton." The Hill notes, "Despite Weldon's hints of a politically motivated probe, nonpartisan ethics groups point out that the Justice Department has conducted itself under a Republican administration."

NYTimes Says GOP Leadership To Blame For Lack Of Ethics Reform. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) notes the Kurt Weldon, Mark Foley, Bob Ney and Randy Cunningham scandals – with a brief aside about William Jefferson and Harry Reid – and says, "The G.O.P. leaders have themselves to blame for their multiple millstones. If they had passed actual ethics reform, instead of deep-sixing it in bromides, there could have been a believable independent corruption office to take some of the heat off their current plight as compromised self-investigators." The Times adds, "Congressmen caught in wrongdoing at this time of year like to complain that they're the victims of election-eve politics. If the looming elections inspire whistleblowers, we say bravo. The prospect of voting day fills the vacuum created by the absence of an actual set of enforceable ethics rules in Congress."

US Charges New York Labor Leader With Racketeering. The New York Times (10/18, Hartocollis, Greenhouse) reports, "Brian M. McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman who as head of the nation's biggest municipal labor council personified New York City's politically powerful labor movement, was arrested yesterday on federal racketeering charges involving embezzlement, receiving bribes, fraud and money laundering. Conviction on all 43 charges could send him to prison for decades." The Times continues, "A 186-page indictment charges Mr. McLaughlin, 54, with illegally obtaining $2.2 million from taxpayers, labor unions and contractors over the last decade since he became president of the New York City Central Labor Council, a federation of 400 union locals with one million members." The Times adds, "The accusations range from the Dickensian (stealing $95,000 from Little League baseball teams to pay his rent) to the brazen (creating two no-show jobs on his legislative payroll and keeping part of one salary), according to the painstakingly detailed racketeering indictment unsealed yesterday. … Mr. McLaughlin surrendered early yesterday. He pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in Federal District Court in Manhattan before Magistrate Judge James C. Francis IV, and was released on $250,000 bail."

The AP (10/18, Milton) reports, "In a 186-page indictment unsealed Tuesday, McLaughlin and others are accused of engaging in racketeering from 1995 through 2006 by using money collected for union activities to instead pay personal expenses, including credit card bills, rent and home improvements. … The indictment alleges McLaughlin committed mail fraud, embezzlement, money laundering and labor bribery by diverting money from various funds he controlled. … Among the funds identified were McLaughlin's political campaign committee, union accounts meant to provide benefits for union members and even contributions meant to support a Little League baseball program." The AP adds, "The indictment also alleges McLaughlin and others misappropriated funds from the state by creating fictitious jobs on his legislative staff and submitting false expense forms. … Among the expenses named in the indictment were more than $4,100 to maintain a boat in Tuckerton, N.J., and $4,200 for Long Island country club membership dues."

DOJ_NMG_0082498

The New York Sun (10/18, Berman) reports, "The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District, Michael Garcia, said Mr. McLaughlin's alleged crimes 'add new meaning to the term "hand-in-the-till."' … A 186-page indictment alleges a complex scheme that Mr. Garcia called 'stunning in its breadth and its scope.' Prosecutors charge that Mr. McLaughlin, 54, accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from city street lighting contractors, installed his cronies in fictitious positions with the state Assembly and the labor council to funnel cash to himself, and laundered money to hide his crimes and evade law enforcement." The Sun adds, "No one else was named in the indictment, but Mr. Garcia said the investigation was ongoing and did not rule out further charges. … Mr. McLaughlin did not comment in response to the accusations. 'The case is now in the court of law, so we're going to save our comments for the courtroom,' his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, said after Mr. McLaughlin was arraigned before federal Magistrate Judge James Francis IV yesterday. Two of the 44 counts are filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which some have criticized when it is used in cases that don't involve traditional organized crime families."

Newsday (10/18, DeStefano) reports, "The alleged theft was done so McLaughlin 'could support his own version of lifestyle of the rich and famous,' said Rose Gill Hearn, head of the city's Department of Investigation. McLaughlin is accused of using union members while they worked on regular shifts for their bosses to do chores for him that included shoveling snow, changing light bulbs, cleaning out a barn and capturing rodents in the basement of his house, investigators said. According to the indictment, women who had a 'personal relationship' with McLaughlin also reaped some financial benefits from his actions. McLaughlin is married and has five children." The New York Daily News (10/18, Zambito, 729K) notes, "No one was immune from his greed, not union members -- not even Little Leaguers."

Missouri Mayor Expected To Plead Guilty To Bribery Charges. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/18, Hahn, 300K) reports, "St. Peters Mayor Shawn Brown is expected to plead guilty Friday in his bribery case, authorities said Tuesday." Assistant US Attorney Tom Albus "would not confirm whether a plea agreement had been reached but said it was customary to have one under these circumstances." The Post-Distatch notes, "Brown was indicted in August on a charge of soliciting and accepting a $2,750 bribe from Redflex Traffic Systems Inc., which in June got the contract to install red-light cameras in St. Peters. Brown is accused of telling a Redflex employee he would veto the measure approving the system's installation unless the company paid him off. Redflex told the FBI and cooperated with the agency in giving Brown a check, authorities said."

Former GBI Agent Sentenced To Year In Prison For Taking Kickbacks. The AP (10/18) reports, "A former special agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation was sentenced Tuesday to one year and a day in federal prison for receiving illegal kickback payments and failing to maintain firearms records." James R. Garmon "brokered the sale of more than $5,000 worth of firearms that had been seized by Bartow County deputies to a local pawnshop, the U.S. attorney's office said. GBI Director Vernon Keenan said his agency cooperated with the FBI's investigation." The AP notes Garmon "received at least $1,600 from the pawnshop for brokering the deal, prosecutors said."

Alleged Pennsylvania Mobster Accused Of Soliciting Murder Of Witness. The AP (10/18) reports, "An alleged mobster facing drug charges planned to kill a witness against him while out on bail, federal prosecutors said Tuesday. A new indictment against William D'Elia, 60, of Hughestown, who reputedly heads the Bufalino crime family, charges him with solicitation of murder, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, violating bail conditions, money laundering and other offenses. D'Elia told an informant in August that he would give him photographs of a witness who cooperated with prosecutors and told him to wait for a signal to kill the man, according to the 18-count indictment issued Tuesday." The AP notes, "D'Elia has been linked to organized crime by the FBI, the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, and former Philadelphia and South Jersey mob boss Ralph Natale."

FBI Arrests Florida Man For Making Child Porn With 15-Month-Old Daughter. The AP (10/18) reports, "An Orange County man was arrested by federal agents after he sent sexual pictures of himself and his 15-month-old daughter over the Internet, authorities said. The man was ordered to be held without bail at a court appearance in federal court Monday. He faces child-pornography charges, and has been assigned an assistant federal public defender." The AP notes, "An Internet sting conducted by the Central Florida Innocent Images Task Force, which includes a Seminole County sheriff's detective, led to his arrest. The man 'admitted to producing three videos of himself and his daughter engaged in sexual activity,' FBI agent Keith Scott wrote in a charging affidavit. … He also chatted online with a Tennessee-based FBI agent posing as a 13-year-old."

Grand Jury Hands Up Eight Count Indictment To Capitol Intruder. The Hill (10/17, Kucinich) reports

DOJ_NMG_0082499

that Carlos Greene was indicted yesterday by a grand jury for breaching "Capitol Police security last month and" leading "officers on a three floor chase inside the U.S. Capitol before he was apprehended on the basement floor." The charges against Greene are "fleeing a law enforcement officer, two counts of destruction of government property, assaulting, resisting or impeding certain officers or employees and unlawful possession of five grams or more of cocaine." In addition, Greene charges of "firearms violations such as possession of a gun on Capitol grounds and carrying and possessing a firearm during drug trafficking offense."

Ohio Fundraiser Called Coin Funds An ATM, Former Aide Testifies. The Columbus Dispatch (10/18, Niquette) reports, "Coin dealer Thomas W. Noe once described the $50 million state investment he managed "as having access to an ATM," Noe's former administrative assistant said yesterday in testimony against her former boss. … 'What he went on to say was, when he needed it, he would tap the coin funds,' Sue Bahn told the jury during the second day of testimony in the trial of Noe and his handling of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation coin investment." The Dispatch continues, "Bahn, who worked for Noe for about two years at his Maumee coin shop and was trusted to pay his bills and balance his personal checkbook, said Noe made the comments in June 2005 after she questioned him about the controversy swirling around the investment at the time. … Prosecutors say Noe stole millions from the coin funds to pay debts and 'to support the lifestyle that he felt he deserved.' … Noe denies all charges, including theft, saying his contract gave him broad authority over the state funds."

The AP (10/18, Seewer) reports, "Metzger said she met with her boss in the summer of 2005 after allegations of wrongdoing surfaced and asked Noe whether he took the money, she testified. … 'He described it as having access to an ATM,' she said." The AP continues, "The investment scandal has battered Republicans who control the state, raising Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office for the first time since 1990. Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland has a wide lead over Republican Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, in gubernatorial race polls. … Prosecutors say Noe was deep in debt when he got the money, and he quickly used it to pay off his creditors."

The Toledo Blade (OH) (10/18, Wilkinson, Eder) reports, "Tom Wersell, the director of investigations for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified that the bureau's chief legal officer asked him to show another executive how to delete e-mails in the weeks after the Tom Noe coin scandal erupted. … Mr. Wersell said he did not know why John Annarino made the request but that he showed former chief investment officer Jim McLean how to 'double delete' e-mails. … Mr. Wersell, in his second day of testimony, acknowledged that the bureau has a information technology department. … The revelation came during cross examination of Mr. Wersell by Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Wersell had testified that many of the documents relating to the Noe coin funds were retrieved from Mr. McLean's office. He was fired last year by the bureau."

Mueller Calls For ISP User Tracking. CNET News (10/18, McCullagh) reports, "FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday called on Internet service providers to record their customers' online activities, a move that anticipates a fierce debate over privacy and law enforcement in Washington next year. … 'Terrorists coordinate their plans cloaked in the anonymity of the Internet, as do violent sexual predators prowling chat rooms,' Mueller said in a speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston. … 'All too often, we find that before we can catch these offenders, Internet service providers have unwittingly deleted the very records that would help us identify these offenders and protect future victims,' Mueller said. 'We must find a balance between the legitimate need for privacy and law enforcement's clear need for access.'" CNET continues, "The speech to the law enforcement group, which approved a resolution on the topic earlier in the day, echoes other calls from Bush administration officials to force private firms to record information about customers. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for instance, told Congress last month that 'this is a national problem that requires federal legislation.'" CNET adds, "Justice Department officials admit privately that data retention legislation is controversial enough that there wasn't time to ease it through the U.S. Congress before politicians left to campaign for re-election. Instead, the idea is expected to surface in early 2007, and one Democratic politician has already promised legislation. … Law enforcement groups claim that by the time they contact Internet service providers, customers' records may have been deleted in the routine course of business. Industry representatives, however, say that if police respond to tips promptly instead of dawdling, it would be difficult to imagine any investigation that would be imperiled."

Boston Globe.com (10/17, Simpson, 2:15 p.m.) reported Mueller "told the nation's police chiefs today that law enforcement must strike a careful balance between fighting crime and protecting the homeland. Mueller said while violent crime more directly affects most Americans, the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks made anti-terrorism activities the FBI's top priority. 'I wish I could assure you that there will be never be another terrorist attack in America, but I cannot. The world remains a perilous place,' said Mueller, who received a standing ovation before and after his speech."

Crawford Pleads Guilty To Charges In Stock Case. The New York Times (10/18, Stout, 1.21M) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0082500

"Lester M. Crawford, the former commissioner of food and drugs, pleaded guilty Tuesday to lying and conflict-of-interest charges in connection with stock he and his wife owned in companies regulated by the F.D.A. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, who accepted Dr. Crawford's plea to two misdemeanor charges, scheduled sentencing for Jan. 22 in Federal District Court." Crawford "could face up to a year in prison and a fine of up to $100,000 on each of the two counts, but his lawyer has said she expects him to be placed on probation."

Dow Jones (10/18) reports, "Crawford, who served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005, was charged by the Justice Department with filing misleading financial-disclosure reports about his holdings in Sysco Corp., Kimberly-Clark Corp. and Embrex Inc. … Crawford was confirmed as FDA chief in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B."

Market Watch (10/18, Schroeder) reports, "The charges against Crawford alleged he or his wife owned shares in Sysco Corp., which were regulated by the FDA, according to a Tuesday statement from the Department of Justice. … 'One of the most important principles of our ethics laws is that public officials cannot have a financial interest in any decision that they make,' U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor stated. 'Lester Crawford, who held one of the most important jobs in government, blatantly violated these principles. Today, he is being held accountable for his actions.'"

The AP (10/18, Bridges) reports, "As head of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, Lester Crawford oversaw a federal agency that regulates products that account for an estimated 25 cents of every dollar spent each year by U.S. consumers. … At the same time, Crawford, through his broker, oversaw an investment portfolio that included tens of thousands of dollars in shares in food, beverage and medical device companies regulated by the very federal agency he ran." The AP continues, "Crawford knew what he and his wife owned, but still failed to fully disclose that information as required by federal law, the Justice Department said in court papers charging him with filing false financial disclosure forms and conflict of interest. In some cases, Crawford even assured federal ethics officers that he and his wife had sold stock in FDA-regulated companies that the couple in fact continued to hold, according to the papers. … Because of that, the former FDA commissioner was set to plead guilty Tuesday to the two misdemeanor counts, said his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder. She said Crawford would not dispute the federal government's claims under the plea agreement. … A fine is likely, though the two counts each carry a maximum penalty of one year in prison."

Trial Over Bogus Degrees Delayed. Government Executive (10/18, Rutzick) reports, "Names of 135 federal employees who allegedly bought fake diplomas from an outfit in the western United States will not be revealed for at least one year, if ever, according to a U.S attorney's office." GE continues, "Last week in Spokane, Wash., during a pretrial hearing for eight people accused of selling counterfeit degrees from nonexistent universities, a defense attorney told the judge that employees from the National Security Agency and the Health and Human Services, Justice and State departments were among 6,000 people who bought the diplomas, according to the Associated Press." GE adds, "The AP also reported that Peter Schweda, attorney for alleged diploma mill operator Steven Randock, said the names of 135 government employees who supposedly purchased the degrees for promotions or pay raises would be released during the course of the trial. … The trial will not start for another year, though. Judge Lonny Suko of the District Court of the Eastern District of Washington delayed it until Oct. 1, 2007, to give attorneys more time to prepare. Suko said more than 150,000 pages of e-mails, 40 CDs of documents and up to 50 witnesses will be used. … Tom Rice, a spokesman for the U.S attorney's office in Spokane, Wash., which is prosecuting the case, said Schweda's assertions that government purchasers would be revealed 'were not necessarily accurate.' … Rice also said he cannot confirm or deny that there is a separate Justice Department investigation into federal purchasers of the fake degrees. The case was built around a sting operation by a handful of Secret Service agents."

Man Pleads Guilty To Three Idaho Slayings. The AP (10/18, Geranios) reports from Coeur D'Alene, ID, "The man accused of kidnapping two children from their Idaho home and killing their family pleaded guilty Monday to murder and kidnapping in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty." The AP continues, "Joseph E. Duncan III, 43, was charged with bludgeoning two adults and a teenager to death at the home near Coeur d'Alene so he could kidnap the family's two youngest children for sex." The AP adds, "Duncan pleaded guilty shortly before his trial was to begin Monday. Under his plea agreement, he is to be sentenced to three consecutive life terms without parole in an Idaho prison. But authorities said that sentencing would be postponed pending federal prosecution that could result in the death penalty. … Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas said the sole survivor, young Shasta Groene, had agreed to testify against the man accused of holding her captive in the woods for seven weeks. … 'This agreement is possible because of a brave little 9-year-old girl who was willing to confront Duncan face-to-face in the courtroom,' Douglas said." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors have said they intend to charge Duncan with kidnapping Shasta Groene and her brother Dylan and taking them to a primitive campsite in Montana and that they expect to seek the death penalty. Court documents allege he repeatedly molested the pair, then killed Dylan, whose body was found later at the campsite."

DOJ_NMG_0082501

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To New Jersey Stock Scam. The Atlantic City (NJ) Press (10/18, Haught) reports, "A former Ocean County (NJ) man pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to involvement in a stock fraud case that cost investors millions of dollars and involved partners from Canada, New York, Florida and New Jersey, including a man from Upper Township." The Press continues, "Joseph F. Morgan, formerly of Stafford Township and now of St. Pete Beach, Fla., admitted to U.S. District Court Judge Jerome B. Simandle that he helped swindle investors of about $10 million in a scheme that netted more than $20 million through stock price manipulations." The Press adds, "As part of the scheme, involving several co-defendants and other unindicted partners, Morgan and others used a system of illegal stock compensations, fraudulent companies and shady brokerage deals to take control of nearly 100 million shares of TeleServices Internet Group Inc. and then sold those stocks to unsuspecting investors. … The scam, which ran from December 1996 through October 2005, involved at least 16 publicly traded companies, all trading on the Over the Counter Electronic Bulletin Board System. The shares -- called penny stocks -- generally traded for less than $1, often as little as 5 cents. … An official with the U.S. Department of Justice said the scam operated like a pump-and-dump or boiler-room scheme, in which brokers drum up investors by suggesting the stock is ready for a major price lift. In this case, Morgan and others used their connections to move the stock around, giving investors the appearance of true market activity."

Florida Crime Rate Drops, Except For Murder. The AP (10/18, Royse) reports, "Crime continued to drop in Florida during the first half of this year, but the rate of violent crimes, particularly murders, went up, according to state figures released Tuesday." The AP continues, "Crimes tracked by federal officials dropped from 412,743 in the first six months of 2005 to 411,608 in the first half of 2006, statistics compiled by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement showed. … That represented a decrease of 0.3 percent, continuing a downward trend that has put the state's crime rate at its lowest in more than three decades. .. But there was a striking anomaly in this year's figures: an increase in the number of murders. Local police agencies reported 518 killings in Florida through the end of June, up 27 percent from the 408 murders the state saw in the first six months of 2005." The AP adds, "Violent crime in general is bucking the overall trend in Florida, increasing 3.2 percent in the first half of 2006 over the same period last year. … The increase mirrors a mysterious uptick in violent crimes and murders in cities nationwide. … Officials don't have a clear explanation for what may be making the murder rate jump, following small but steady declines through recent years that were attributed in part to tougher sentencing laws. … In a speech to police chiefs on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal officials are looking for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. Gonzales also acknowledged that some law enforcement agencies have been stretched a little by new duties in anti-terrorism efforts."

Federal Judge Again Strikes Missouri's Lethal Injection Procedure. The AP (10/18) reports, "A federal judge has ruled for a second time that Missouri's use of a three-drug lethal injection for executions is unconstitutional, confirming his ruling last month that the procedure could cause 'torturous' pain." The AP continues, "The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. follows his September ruling that said the death penalty protocol could subject inmates to an unreasonable risk of cruel and unusual punishment and halted all executions in the state." The AP adds, "Gaitan had first ordered in June that the Missouri Department of Corrections make sweeping changes to its execution protocol. At issue is how painful lethal injection can be if the three drugs used are not given correctly. If the injection is given improperly, an inmate could be in pain but would be paralyzed and unable to show it, Gaitan said in his September ruling. .. .In that order, Gaitan gave the state until Oct. 27 to provide a revised protocol. But the state resubmitted the same proposal Oct. 6, arguing that it was constitutional and asking the judge to reconsider his decision. … The state's attorneys had asked Gaitan to rule quickly, so they could file an appeal if he ruled against them."

Federal Prosecutors Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Insurer Case. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Richardson) reports that federal prosecutors will not charge General Reinsurance, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., the holding company headed by Warren Buffett "in their continuing criminal investigation into the collapse of a professional-liability insurer in Virginia, according to a statement by Berkshire." Berkshire "said General Re received a letter yesterday from the office of the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia in Richmond stating that the federal prosecutor 'does not currently view General Reinsurance as a target or subject in connection with the EDVA U.S. attorney's pending investigation of Reciprocal of America.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082502

Man Convicted Of Murder In New York Drunk Driving Case. The New York Times (10/18, Vitello) reports that Martin Heidgen, "who crashed into a wedding limousine last year, killing the driver and a 7-year-old girl while driving drunk in the wrong direction on a Long Island parkway, was convicted on Tuesday of two counts of murder." The verdict is the first murder conviction won in fatal drunken driving case in Nassau County, "where the high incidence of drunken driving has become a public policy issue that figured heavily in the 2005 election campaign for the office of district attorney." The "murder charge brought against Mr. Heidgen, murder in the second degree by depraved indifference, carries the same penalties as intentional murder -- a minimum of 15 years and a maximum of 25 years to life -- and has been the subject of several appellate court decisions in the last two years."

DC Mayor Seeks $11 Million To Continue Anti-Crime Measures. Washington, DC Mayor Anthony Williams asked the city council for $11 million to continue a package of emergency crime measures. The Washington Times (10/18, Cella, Doolittle) reports, "The legislation includes a request for $5 million for youth-violence prevention programs, $4.2 million for additional police overtime and $1.7 million for the city's burgeoning network of neighborhood surveillance cameras. It also would renew four key provisions of the mayor's emergency package, which is set to expire at midnight tomorrow. Those provisions authorized the use of neighborhood surveillance cameras, allowed some offenders to be held until trial, gave police access to juvenile criminal records and granted the mayor power to set the time of the juvenile curfew."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Review Finds Agencies' FOIA Administration Improving. Government Executive (10/18, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Act are for the most part complying with an executive order outlining a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law, according to a new Justice Department report." GE continues, "All 91 federal agencies subject to FOIA have prepared plans for improving the process of releasing federal documents to the public, refined the plans where necessary and posted them on their Web sites for public review, the report stated. Most agencies also fulfilled the order's first requirement successfully by appointing chief FOIA officers by Jan. 13, 2006." GE adds, "In fiscal 2005, agencies handled more than 2.6 million FOIA requests at a cost of $300 million. This represents a 35 percent increase in activity over fiscal 2001, the report stated. … The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec.14, 2005, directed agencies to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations. … A number of improvement plans failed to properly address how the agencies would address backlogs of requests for information, the report stated. A few agencies have modified plans to comply with the order, including the Education Department, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, NASA, the National Archives and Records Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission. … But a number of other agencies have yet to complete the modifications. These were the Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Homeland Security, Labor and Veterans Affairs departments; the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Trade Commission, the General Services Administration, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the National Science Foundation, the National Transportation Safety Board and the Social Security Administration."

Federal Government Won't Pay Death Benefit To Studds' Same-Sex Spouse. The federal government has refused to pay death benefits to the spouse of former Rep. Gerry Studds, the first openly gay member of Congress. The Washington Post (10/18, A19, 748K) reports, "Studds married Dean Hara in 2004 after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts. But Hara will not be eligible to receive any portion of Studds's estimated $114,337 annual pension because the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act bars the federal government from recognizing Studds's marriage. Peter Graves, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the congressional pension program, said same-sex partners are not recognized as spouses for any marriage benefits. He said Studds's case is the first of its kind known to the agency."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probing California Letter On Immigrant Voting. The New York Times (10/18, McKinley) reports, "Federal and state authorities are trying to determine who sent a letter to some Latinos in Southern California that falsely suggested that it would be a crime for immigrants to vote in the coming election." The Times continues, "The letter, written in formal, sometimes clumsy Spanish and signed 'Sergio Ramirez,' was mailed last week to an undetermined number of people with Spanish surnames in Orange County, the authorities said. It advised recipients that 'if you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration,' or deportation. … While illegal immigrants are barred from voting, legal immigrants who have become citizens are permitted to do so." The

DOJ_NMG_0082503

Times adds, "The letter also stated that the federal government had installed a computer system to verify the names of new registered voters who vote in October and November and that anti-immigration groups would be able to access that information. Election Day is Nov. 7, but early voting is allowed Oct. 20-29 in Orange County. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, which along with the California attorney general's office is investigating the letter's source, said there was no such database. … 'The letter contains false information,' Ms. Magnuson said."

Georgia Election Board Approves New Letter To Misinformed Voters. The AP (10/18) reports, "The (Georgia) State Election Board on Tuesday approved a letter that will inform more than 300,000 Georgia voters who were told they needed a photo ID to vote that they can still use 17 forms of identification to cast a ballot on Nov. 7." The AP continues, "The board also approved radio and television public service announcements to be broadcast statewide. The Secretary of State's Office will be responsible for distributing the letter and ads, and will partially fund the efforts." The AP adds, "The mailing is expected to cost $127,000, and the ads will be taped and aired using $16,000 from the election board budget previously reserved for voter education. … Both measures were approved at a special meeting called by election board member David Worley after he discovered nearly 200,000 voters - not the 20,000 initially reported by Vice Chair Claud 'Tex' McIver - were told they would need to get a photo ID at the polls. … In all, the board of elections contacted by mail 305,000 registered voters believed to lack state-issued photo identification. Most received letters after a Sept. 19 ruling by Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford declaring the photo ID law violated the Georgia Constitution as an undue burden on voters."

FBI Forwards Results Of Arkansas Police Beating Probe To DOJ. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (10/18, Hale-Shelton) reports, "The FBI has forwarded information from its investigation into Russellville police officers' fatal encounter with Bobby Joe Rylee last summer to the Civil Rights Division of the U. S. Department of Justice." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "The Washington-based office will determine whether a federal civil-rights violation occurred in the forcible arrest of Rylee on July 15 in a parking lot along Arkansas 7 in Russellville, said Steven Frazier, a spokesman for the FBI office in Little Rock. … Rylee, 61, quit breathing several hours after police took him to the Pope County jail. He died five days later in a Little Rock hospital." The Democrat-Gazette adds, "Russellville Police Chief James Bacon has said he understood the FBI was investigating at the request of Rylee's family. Frazier previously declined to comment on an ongoing investigation, which is FBI policy. .. .In August, Prosecuting Attorney David Gibbons of Clarksville declined to charge four Russellville police officers, saying they were justified in the force they used to subdue and arrest Rylee. Police said Rylee had fought with them and stabbed one officer in the arm with a ballpoint pen, which Gibbons concluded was a deadly weapon. … Rylee's family filed a federal lawsuit in Little Rock last month, contending that Russellville police officers beat Rylee before taking him to jail, where, the lawsuit said, he was refused medical attention despite life-threatening injuries. Police have said Rylee declined medical treatment."

Study Finds Racial Disparities In Breast Cancer Death Rates. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Peres, Kotulak, Gorner) reports, "A study showing an alarming gap in breast cancer death rates for black and white women in Chicago has mobilized health experts to find the root causes and recommend within a year ways to reduce the unusually high mortality among African-Americans. Why black women are more likely to die of breast cancer is unclear, but medical leaders said genetics, lack of awareness about breast self-examination, inability to afford routine mammograms and limited access to medical facilities may play crucial roles." The study," which has not yet been published or undergone the scrutiny of peers, found that the odds that a woman will die of breast cancer has been declining steadily for close to two decades, yet African-American women have been seeing the reverse."

Comedian's Mother Claims She Was Discriminated Against At Restaurant. The AP (10/17, Smith) reported, "Rose Rock, the mother of comedian Chris Rock, claims she was racially discriminated against when she was seated but ignored for more than a half hour at a Cracker Barrel restaurant along the South Carolina coast. Rock said Tuesday she planned to sue the Lebanon, Tenn.-based company." Rock "said she and her 21-year-old daughter were the only blacks at the chain's Murrells Inlet restaurant in April. She said when she asked the manager about the delay she was told they could have a free meal." The AP adds, "The Rev. Al Sharpton will join Rock on Wednesday in South Carolina to announce that Sharpton's Action Network will finance the planned lawsuit."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Gives Antitrust Nod To Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Of Gold Kist. The AP (10/18) reports, "Chicken producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. on Tuesday said

DOJ_NMG_0082504

federal regulators have cleared its proposed acquisition of Atlanta-based poultry company Gold Kist Inc., which opposes the bid." The AP continues, "Pilgrim's Pride launched its hostile $20-a-share takeover bid last month, after Gold Kist declined to make a deal in August, the company has said. The offer represents a premium of 55 percent over Gold Kist's closing stock price on Aug. 18. .. .Gold Kist has said the offer is not in the best interest of its shareholders." The AP adds, "On Tuesday, Pilgrim's Pride said the antitrust division of the Justice Department granted an early expiration to the waiting period mandated by antitrust laws. … Pilgrim's Pride President and Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby Jr. called the move 'a positive step forward in our efforts to acquire Gold Kist.'"

Kucinich Wants DOJ Antitrust Probe Of Giant Eagle Ohio Store Purchase. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/18, Lindeman) reports, "Ohio congressman Dennis J. Kucinich, concerned about losing jobs in his region, is asking federal officials to look at potential antitrust issues when considering O'Hara-based grocer Giant Eagle's plans to buy 18 stores in the Cleveland area." The Post-Gazette continues, "Rep. Kucinich, the former Cleveland mayor, presidential candidate and a fifth-term Democrat who is up for re-election, this week sent a letter to the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission asking that they investigate the potential for the sale to impact the price of food in the Cleveland area. .. .Giant Eagle, already a major player in the northeast Ohio market, said last week it would buy 18 Tops Market stores for an undisclosed amount from Dutch owner Ahold. The parent company put 46 Tops stores up for sale earlier this year and hopes to have buyers for the remaining 28 stores by the end of the year. .. .The O'Hara company supplied about 45 percent of the Cleveland-Elyria-Mentor grocery market as of June, according to TradeDimensions International in Wilton, Conn. Tops claimed a little more than 20 percent while Wal-Mart had about 6 percent." The Post-Gazette adds, "An antitrust review would try to determine if, after the sale, Giant Eagle could control the market to the point it could significantly raise prices, said Robert Fleishman, an antitrust lawyer with Washington, D.C., law firm Steptoe & Johnson. That might be hard to do in an era when supermarkets face increasing competition from retailers such as Target as well as dollar stores and convenience stores. .. .Even if the overall deal is not a problem, there might be particular Tops locations that officials would be concerned about. When the owner of Macy's bought Kaufmann's, the retailer agreed to sell certain overlapping locations to department store competitors, if possible. .. .However, Giant Eagle officials do not believe there's a problem. 'Our attorneys researched the issue carefully and have advised that there are no antitrust problems with this acquisition,' spokesman Dan Donovan said in an e-mailed response."

SCOTUS To Weigh DOJ's Ability To Renege On Immunity Deals. The New Jersey Law Journal (10/18, Brennan) reports, "A 3rd Circuit case at the door of the U.S. Supreme Court will test the federal government's power to revoke immunity from prosecution granted to antitrust violators who agree to rat on their rivals." The Journal continues, "During an Oct. 27 conference, the Court will decide whether to hear Stolt-Nielsen, S.A. v. U.S., 06-97, which would test whether a court can enjoin the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from withdrawing immunity promised under its Corporate Leniency Program. .. .The case piques the interest of not only antitrust lawyers but also white-collar criminal defense attorneys, because the lifting of immunity means that all items of evidence a cooperating company has willingly handed over can become weapons in the government's arsenal. … 'Stolt could have broad implications in every instance in which the government promises a benefit to a defendant in exchange for cooperation,' says Alison Smith, a former Antitrust Division lawyer now at Haynes & Boone in Houston. 'A corporation considering applying for immunity must now question whether the evidence it provides to the government will simply be used against it.'" The Journal notes, "Smith says an eventual ruling by the Court 'could clarify the nature and extent of the defendants' constitutional rights in these agreements' and 'could determine the limits of the government's ability to revoke agreements unilaterally and the power of the courts to restrain the government's decision to prosecute.' … Demonstrating the gravity of the case, no fewer than nine amici curiae have filed briefs supporting the petition for certiorari. One of them is the Association of Corporate Counsel, led by senior vice president and general counsel Susan Hackett. 'The impact on my members is their concern that they can no longer make rational decisions that would suggest predictable results,' she says."

Chicago Mercantile Exchange To Buy Chicago Board Of Trade. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Burns) reports that Chicago's two major futures exchanges yesterday "announced an $8 billion merger, as the stock market's hunger for their shares overcame long-standing differences." The Chicago Mercantile Exchange "said it has agreed to buy its longtime rival" the Chicago Board of Trade "in a deal that would put its leadership in control of the combined business. … The Merc's deal for the Board of Trade is expected to be completed by the middle of 2007."

The Financial Times (10/18, Cameron) reports, "A combination of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the smaller Chicago Board of Trade would create the world's largest futures exchange. The merged group would have an estimated annual $125m in synergies to fund expansion into Europe and Asia, as well as fast-growing areas such as credit derivatives and foreign exchange, which remain dominated by over-the-counter trading." The Times adds, "The announcement follows a year of talks and flirtations with rival exchanges."

DOJ_NMG_0082505

A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, Lucchetti, MacDonald, Taylor) reports, "As the biggest deal yet in a global consolidation of the financial-exchange industry, the plan sets aside more than a century of crosstown rivalry." The Journal adds, "The Chicago deal illustrates the increasingly rapid pace at which financial exchanges world-wide are consolidating to lift profits by cutting costs. Exchanges have morphed from member-owned clubs into profit-hungry publicly traded companies. This gives them an incentive to make acquisitions and also a currency, their stock, with which to do so."

An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, Carey, Hallinan) says the deal secures Chicago's place "as derivatives market to the world. … Though the two exchanges employ just 2,200, they have helped to keep the city a financial center even as its home-grown banking industry has steadily been bought out by larger rivals. The exchanges have also spawned numbers of trading firms."

The New York Times (10/18, Barrionuevo) reports, "By combining, the Chicago exchanges, to be named the CME Group, will have average daily trading volume of close to nine million contracts a day, representing $4.2 trillion in notional value, or the amount of the underlying assets, not the value of the contracts themselves. By a comparison of sorts, some 1.8 billion shares, or $87.2 billion, are traded on average on the New York Stock Exchange, the world's biggest stock market, every day, although those shares, unlike derivatives, represent direct ownership stakes."

Crain's Chicago Business (10/18) reports, "Exchange officials are assuming that antitrust concerns won't stop creation of the world's largest futures market, even though the proposed acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade would give the Chicago Mercantile Exchange a near monopoly on U.S. futures trading. … 'We've been very well advised by the Department of Justice on antitrust issues, and we're not expecting any regulatory issues,' Merc CEO Craig Donohue told investors Tuesday in a conference call." Crain's continues, "A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the regulatory outlook, nor would she confirm whether any informal meetings already have taken place on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.'s proposed acquisition of CBOT Holdings Inc. … The merger must also be approved by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and exchange officials said it faces 'modest' regulatory reviews overseas. A CFTC spokesman says the exchanges mainly have to certify that their bylaws and surveillance systems meet the agency's requirements. … That means the biggest hurdle is likely to be any antitrust questions the deal raises with either the Federal Trade Commission or the Justice Department, the latter of which is considered more likely to be the agency that reviews exchange mergers such as this."

Tata Steel Seeks To Buy Corus For $8 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Bellman, Singer) reports that Tata Steel Ltd. Has proposed to buy British steelmaker Corus Group PLC "for about £4.4 billion ($8 billion)," in what would "represent the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company and underscore the loosening of India's regulatory environment. Tata's proposal, which would create a major global steel company, is expected to receive a recommendation from Corus's board later this week. Tata is likely to quickly clear India's foreign-exchange hurdles, where in some cases a committee must give permission for an Indian company to raise money for overseas activities."

Eli Lilly Agrees To By Icos Corp. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Carreyrou) reports, "Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to acquire biotechnology company Icos Corp. for $2.1 billion in a move to gain full ownership of the erectile-dysfunction drug Cialis. As the sole owner of Cialis, Eli Lilly is expected to muster a stronger challenge to Pfizer Inc.'s Viagra, the first drug approved for erectile dysfunction and the market leader in the U.S., with more than 50% of the market. Cialis -- made by the two companies' joint venture, Lilly Icos LLC -- has a 25% market share." The Journal adds, "Under the terms of the deal, Icos shareholders will receive $32 for each share of Icos common stock. The bid represents an 18% premium to Icos's closing price Monday of $27.12."

Vivendi Sues Two Internet Companies Over Video File Sharing. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, B3, Smith, Delaney) reports, "Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group filed copyright-infringement lawsuits against two Internet companies, including one acquired by Sony Corp., over the ability they give users to upload and download video content with their Web sites. … The suits, against Sony Pictures Entertainment's Grouper Networks Inc. and Bolt Inc., mark the first time a major media company has tried to use the courts to narrowly interpret 'safe harbor' protections provided by the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998 so it would exclude video-sharing sites." The Journal adds, "Filed Monday in US District Court for California's Central District, the suits follow recent deals reached by Universal and two other big music companies to license their video and music content to video-sharing giant YouTube Inc. A person familiar with the Grouper and Bolt matters said Universal had discussed licensing agreements with those companies, but said the talks never progressed."

DOJ_NMG_0082506

Record Labels See Marketing Opportunity In Music Piracy. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, B1, Angwin, McBride, Smith) reports that "there's a growing recognition among some record executives and performers that the people who are downloading illegally are frequently huge music fans and that marketing to them may be more desirable in the long run than suing or otherwise harassing them." By planting so-called decoy files, "and then planting those files prominently on file-sharing sites, record labels and other marketers can turn what is now an antipiracy tool into an advertising medium." The Journal adds, "Audioslave, Ice Cube, Yellowcard and other music groups have used decoy files for their own version of viral marketing. With help from niche companies like Sparkart LLC and NFA Group's BuyDRM, they put snippets of a song into the files with the promise that a stream of the entire song will be 'unlocked' for everyone once the promotion is forwarded to enough people. The hope is that this will motivate people to send the file to lots of friends."

Record Industry Files 8,000 File Sharing Suits. Meanwhile, the AP (10/18, Wardell) reports, "The international record industry filed thousands more lawsuits around the world Tuesday against people it accuses of illegally sharing digital music. The International Federation of the Phonographic Industry filed 8,000 cases in 17 countries, including its first in South America and Eastern Europe. The lawsuits, which are aimed at 'uploaders,' include criminal and civil cases. Uploaders have put hundreds or thousands of copyrighted songs onto Internet file-sharing networks and offered them to millions of people worldwide without permission from the copyright owners. The industry contends that such file-sharing has cost it billions of dollars in lost revenue."

GM's Wagoner Called Corporate America's "Comeback Kid." Paul Ingrassia, a former Detroit bureau chief at The Wall Street Journal, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A20), "Rick Wagoner, the CEO of General Motors, has to be corporate America's Comeback Kid. But after a dramatic week in the battle to reshape GM and the global auto industry, Las Vegas billionaire Kirk Kerkorian -- GM's largest individual shareholder and Mr. Wagoner's nemesis -- might still hold a winning hand. Just six months ago, Mr. Wagoner seemed on the verge of being fired. … But Mr. Wagoner gamely fought back." Ingrassia adds, "Scenario No. 1 at GM, clearly the best for all concerned, is that Mr. Wagoner succeeds in producing a durable turnaround. Mr. Kerkorian would be proven wrong about Mr. Wagoner, but one suspects that doubling his $1.6 billion investment in General Motors would be ample balm for the billionaire's public wounds. … This is a high-stakes poker game among rich and powerful men to control and shape one of the world's largest and most visible industries -- and one that tugs at emotions ranging from national pride to consumers' desires. Mr. Wagoner has just won a big hand. But the best bet is that the game will continue."

ENVIRONMENT:

Nuclear Plant Security Union Criticizes New DOE Policy. Under the headline, "Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules for Nuclear Plant Guards," the Washington Post's (10/18, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Two years ago, the Energy Department announced plans for creating 'a special elite federal force' to protect high-priority nuclear plants," but the Post notes that these "elite combat units" are made up not of government workers but "contractors that provide guards and security officers." According "to union officials, the contract officers are increasingly concerned about their employment status and would like the option to shift to the federal workforce," especially since DOE "plants and facilities that use nuclear weapons material," are "expanding the number of security jobs covered by rigorous physical fitness standards, and many officers are concerned they will lose their jobs." The Post adds that the "National Council of Security Police, a union group representing officers at nuclear facilities, thinks the department's plans will undercut the goal of enhanced security in the post-Sept. 11 world."

Studies Find Benefits Of Eating Fish Exceed Risks. The Washington Post (10/18, A14, Squires) reports, "The health benefits of eating fish regularly outweigh the danger from mercury and other contaminants even for pregnant women and children, two major reports concluded yesterday as scientists tried to resolve a slippery question that has long vexed consumers." The Post continues, "The findings, which were reached by independent teams of scientists, pointed to significant benefits for both young and old. In adults, the death rate from heart disease was 36 percent lower among those who ate fish twice a week compared with those who ate little or no seafood, according to a study being published today in the Journal of the American Medical Association. Overall mortality was 17 percent lower, the study by Harvard School of Public Health researchers found. … A second, federally funded report released by the Institute of Medicine (IOM) echoed the conclusion that the heart benefits of eating seafood outweigh the risks and said infants also benefit from the healthy fats found in seafood." The Post adds, "Omega-3 fatty acids found in fish promote healthy vision and brain development in infants whose mothers consume fish or seafood during pregnancy or while nursing, the report said. These healthy fats also appear to decrease the risk of delivering a preterm, low-birth-weight baby. … Even so, because of methyl mercury concerns, the IOM report stuck with the current federal guidelines that advise women who are nursing, pregnant or plan to become pregnant, as well as children age 12 and younger, to refrain from eating swordfish, shark, tilefish and king mackerel. These two groups can safely consume up to 12 ounces of other fish per week, the report said, but they should also limit white (albacore) tuna to six ounces a week because of its high levels of methyl mercury, which can be toxic to the brain and hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0082507

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Criticizes FBI Sentinel Staffing Priorities. Federal Computer Week (10/17, Hubler) reported on its Web site, "The FBI is moving quickly to staff its six-year, $425 million Sentinel program, which will replace the agency's failed Virtual Case File project and antiquated intelligence analysis and investigative case management systems, according to a new Government Accountability Office report prepared for the House Judiciary Committee. But the report states that the Sentinel staffing process is focusing only on the program office's immediate staffing needs," and "GAO warned that 'unless the FBI adopts a more strategic approach to managing human capital for the Sentinel program and treats human capital as a program risk, the chances of delivering required intelligence and investigative support capabilities in a timely and cost-effective manner are reduced.'" FCW noted, "According to the report, the FBI has agreed with the recommendations and is taking steps to correct the program."

San Francisco Marijuana Dispensary Director Released On $1 Million Bond. The Bay City News Wire (10/17) reports a medical marijuana dispensary director who "is accused of marijuana cultivation and money laundering was granted release on $1 million bond by a federal magistrate in San Francisco Tuesday. Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative in San Francisco, is one of 15 people arrested in a sweep by federal agents on Oct. 3. … U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration regional chief Frederico Pena said after the Oct. 3 arrests that anyone who breaks the federal laws to run an allegedly lucrative drug trade 'is not compassionate, they're criminal.' An affidavit filed in the case by a DEA agent alleges that cash deposits to a New Remedies Cooperative bank account in Hercules amounted to more than $2.3 million between December 2005 and July 2006."

The San Francisco Chronicle (10/17, Egelko) reports DEA agents "seized nearly 13,000 marijuana plants, $125,000 and four vehicles, including Rose's leased Porsche, at a dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District and other sites in San Francisco and Oakland. The raid was one of a recent series of enforcement actions by federal authorities against medical marijuana clubs and suppliers in California, where voters passed an initiative in 1996 allowing patients to use the drug with a doctor's recommendation." Attorney Nanci Clarence "disputed an Oct. 3 assertion by Javier Pena, regional director of the DEA, that Rose and his fellow defendants were 'using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars' under the guise of serving medical patients."

Illinois Drug Investigation Nets Eighth Guilty Plea. The Springfield (IL) State Journal Register (10/17) reports a man federal prosecutors "say was at the center of a high-profile drug investigation last fall pleaded guilty Monday to drug charges and agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties in Springfield and Taylorville." The Journal Register says Danny J. Sidener Jr. "pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Jeanne Scott to conspiracy to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine," as well as other charges. Sidener "is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with the case, which began with indictments last fall. … The charges are the result of an Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Springfield Police Department, Illinois State Police and the Central Illinois Enforcement Group."

Nevada To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana. The AP (10/18, Chereb) reports, "Gambling, prostitution, and now pot? Organizers of a Nevada ballot measure hope voters in a state where almost everything goes will go one better and legalize marijuana." The AP continues, "If it passes Nov. 7, Nevada will be the first state to allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops." The AP adds, "The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, which has pushed medical marijuana and decriminalization laws around the country, thinks Nevada - with its embrace of certain vices and its streak of Western independence - is a perfect venue. … In an editorial last spring, the rural Lahontan Valley News argued that gambling, Nevada's most powerful industry, caters to 'visceral pleasures,' and that it would hypocritical to oppose the legalization of marijuana on moral grounds. … Proponents of the measure also argue that the legal system wastes time and money on low-level marijuana offenses, and that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement to focus on violent crime and more dangerous drugs such as methamphetamine." The AP notes, "Opponents, including law enforcement, the nation's drug czar, and civic and business groups, argue the measure would encourage the use of other drugs, and they question whether it will even prove to be a good source of tax revenue."

DOJ_NMG_0082508

US Anti-Narcotics Official Notes Increasingly Pure Heroin, Warns Of Price Drop. The AP (10/17) reports a senior U.S. anti-narcotics official said Tuesday that "Skyrocketing opium production in Afghanistan has led to increasingly pure heroin being sold in Europe and prices could fall if the trend continues. Thomas Schweich, principal U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics, issued the warning after the United Nations reported last month that Afghanistan's opium production for 2006 increased 49 percent from last year, exceeding the demands of the world's heroin users by a third. … Despite the strong increase in Afghanistan's opium production for 2006, the Afghan and U.S. governments have no plans to change counter-narcotics strategy in the region, Schweich said. 'When the U.N. came out with those statistics, that's for planting that occurred the previous fall,' said Schweich. 'They really reflect the relatively ineffective delivery of the program in its very first year.'"

UN Calls On NATO, Afghan Troops To Attack Heroin Labs. The AP (10/17) reports Afghanistan's opium production "has soared 'out of control,' the U.N. drugs and crime agency warned Tuesday, adding that proceeds from the opium harvest were being used to fund the resurgent Taliban. The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime is calling on NATO and Afghan troops to attack heroin labs, opium bazaars and convoys transporting the narcotic, said Preeta Bannerjee, a spokeswoman for the agency. Opium production in Afghanistan rose 59 percent in 2006 to a record 165,000 hectares (408,000 acres) — representing 92 percent of the world's opium, according to U.N. figures."

UN: Opium Poppy Cultivation Drops In Golden Triangle. UPI (10/17) reports Opium poppy cultivation in Laos, Myanmar and Thailand, the Golden Triangle, "dropped 29 percent last year, the U.N. drug agency reported Monday. The region is the world's second-largest source of opium, although it is now dwarfed by Afghanistan, the Office on Drugs and Crime report said. Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa said Afghanistan will soon be the only source if the trend continues."

On its Web site, Voice of America (10/16) reports, "Burma, the main poppy growing country of the region, reported a more than 30-percent decline in areas under cultivation from the previous year. … The decrease in Burmese production means that a plan to eradicate opium in the Golden Triangle by 2014 remains on target."

Report: Aghan Government Orders Closing Of Senlis Council Offices. BBC News (10/17) reports the Afghan government "has ordered the closure of all offices of a group that wants to promote new ways of dealing with the global drugs problem. The Interior Ministry said the Senlis Council, had been 'confusing farmers' and had been a factor in the increase in poppy cultivation. Senlis has suggested the legal use of Afghan opium for medical purposes." However, a spokesman for Senlis "said it had not received any formal notification that its offices were to be closed."

IG Report Finds Prisoner Flights Expensive. The AP (10/18, Jordan) reports, "Pricey contracts and empty seats plague government flights that move U.S. prisoners to new jails and deport illegal immigrants, a Justice Department review concluded Tuesday." The AP continues, "Additionally, the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transport System does not always have large enough crews to subdue onboard security threats, Justice Department Inspector General Glen A. Fine found. … 'Given the variety of transportation needs and the nature of the individuals being transported, inherent risks exist in managing a transportation system like JPATS,' Fine concluded, using the acronym for the air transit system." The AP adds, "The U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement use and pay for the flights. More than 305,000 prisoners and illegal aliens flew on them last year, costing an estimated $87 million. … The program makes sure prisoners and illegal immigrants make their court appointments, are transferred efficiently and are deported quickly. … But the review found several flaws, including that: … The government pays far more to lease large jets under multiple-year contracts than it would by buying the aircraft outright. … Poor planning led to empty seats on the flights, some of which were only half-full during an audit between 2004 and the last three months of 2005. … Only 13 percent of 1,028 flights audited had a larger security crew aboard than required."

The Washington Times (10/18, Seper) reports, "A government-operated service that transports prisoners and aliens in federal custody throughout the United States, Central America and the Caribbean does not have the means to ensure that safety procedures are being followed and lacks the ability to predict long-term capacity needs, according to a report released yesterday. The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS), run by the U.S. Marshals Service and known to many as 'Con Air,' also needs to reduce costs by maximizing the number of passengers scheduled for each flight."

Washington Women Crossed Line From Environmental Activism To Arson. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/18, Phuong, 129K) reports, "Jennifer Kolar and Lacey Phillabaum seem unlikely criminals. Well-educated young women passionate about environmental causes, they share a love of the outdoors and similar backgrounds. Both grew up in Spokane and attended the same public high school. … The women were concerned about what was going on around them -- the logging of old-growth forests, the slaughter of animals for sport. Like many Northwest activists, they pushed for change. But their activism morphed into something more dangerous -- and now both are headed to prison" for their roles in the 2001 ELF firebombing at the University of Wisconsin. The P-I notes, "Both women are cooperating with authorities and have admitted to belonging to ELF and participating in the UW firebombing. The FBI has branded ELF an underground radical group and a top domestic terrorism threat."

DOJ_NMG_0082509

IMMIGRATION:

White House Wants Congress To Send Border Fence Bill For Bush Signing. The Washington Times (10/18, Dinan, 88K) reports the White House is "pleading with Congress to send over the bill authorizing 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border so the president can sign it immediately, but Republican leaders on Capitol Hill want to wait until closer to the election and to have a public signing ceremony." A senior Administration official said, "Send us the damn bill. We'd like to autograph it." The Times adds congressional Republicans "are convinced the issue is a political winner and want to hold onto the bill so it will be signed closer to next month's congressional elections. Once the bill is sent to the president, he has a limited amount of time to sign it before it dies as a pocket veto."

House Report Says US Border Officials Outgunned By Drug Smugglers. The Washington Times (10/18, Seper, 88K) reports a House Homeland Security subcommittee report says "law-enforcement authorities along the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned and outmanned by drug smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems." The 39-page report "said drug-trafficking organizations and alien-smuggling networks are 'proliferating and strengthening their control' of key corridors along the nation's Southwest; that Mexican drug cartels wield 'substantial control' over the U.S.-Mexico border; and that criminal organizations and networks are 'highly sophisticated and organized.'" It also 'found that drug-trafficking cartels, alien-smuggling networks and U.S.-based street gangs, including MS-13, are increasingly coordinating with one another to achieve their objectives, and that federal, state and local law-enforcement report 'new and ever-increasing levels of ruthlessness and violence' associated with the gangs."

Mayor Touts Hazleton's Ordinances Aimed At Illegal Immigrants. On the CBS Evening News (10/17, story 11, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M), Hazleton, Pennsylvania Mayor Lou Barletta discussed his effort to limit illegal immigrants: "There are up to 20 million illegal aliens in this country right now. They have imposed a tremendous burden on many of America's cities. That's why I took action. I saw my city gripped by fear. Because of violent acts committed by illegal aliens, my residents were afraid to shop or even drive on certain streets. Illegal immigration was draining Hazleton's limited resources. Our small police department, our schools and health care system were beginning to feel the strain. Legal residents were on the verge of being denied the services their tax dollars paid for." In Hazleton, "we created ordinances designed to deter landlords and businesses from representing to and hiring illegals. Those who knowingly break our laws will face financial penalties. These laws will make Hazleton one of the toughest cities in the nation for illegals."

TAX:

Snipes Indicted For Conspiracy, Tax Fraud. Federal officials announced Tuesday that actor Wesley Snipes has been indicted on charges of conspiracy and tax fraud. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Munoz, Muskal) reported on its web site, "Snipes, 44, was also charged with six counts of failing to file income tax returns. If convicted of all of the charges, he could be sentenced to as much as 16 years in prison." Tuesday's indictment "accuses Snipes, formerly of Windermere, Fla., Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., with conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service and presenting a fraudulent claim for payment to the IRS."

USA Today (10/18, Farrell) reports, "According to the indictment, Snipes allegedly not only avoided paying millions in income taxes from 1999 through 2004, but he fraudulently tried to get an $11 million refund for taxes paid in the 1990s."

The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Matthews) reports, "The charges stem from a well-known but illegal scheme that asserts that US citizens only have to pay taxes on income earned from foreign sources. The scheme purports that wages and other income earned in the US aren't taxable. The Internal Revenue Service and various courts have ruled that the argument is a misreading of the tax code." The Journal adds, "If convicted on all eight counts handed up against him, Mr. Snipes could be sentenced to a maximum of 16 years in prison."

The AP (10/18, Davis) reports, "The indictment said Snipes conspired with American Rights Litigators' founder Eddie Ray Kahn and tax preparer Douglas P. Rosile Sr. to file false refund claims based on a bogus argument that only income from foreign sources was subject to taxation. … That included a claim for a $7.3 million refund for 1997, in which an amended tax return reported Snipes' adjusted income as zero. … The Justice Department sued Rosile in 2002 for allegedly filing bogus tax refund claims totaling more than $36 million on behalf of clients in 32 states. The suit is still pending."

DOJ_NMG_0082510

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Defense Spending Bill, Details Reservations About Specific Provisions. The AP (10/18) reports, "With a long list of caveats, President Bush signed a bill Tuesday authorizing $532.8 billion in defense spending, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for members of the military. The measure, for the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1, authorizes $70 billion in supplemental funding to support the war on terror's operation costs, personnel expenses, equipment needs and other costs." The White House "released two pages of administration disagreements and reservations about provisions that lawmakers put in the bill." Bush "took issue with a provision that would require the Navy to keep its current number of 12 aircraft carriers. The administration is seeking permission to retire the USS John F. Kennedy." The statement "singled out about a dozen provisions that would require the White House to provide Congress with information on various subjects. … Among other disputed areas, the statement said sections of the bill purported to make consultations with certain lawmakers a precondition to carrying out the law. The statement said it would regard that requirement 'as calling for but not mandating such consultation.'"

Bill Limits Interest Rates On Consumer Loans To Servicemen. USA Today (10/18, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "Consumer loans to servicemembers will be limited to 36% annual interest next year under a law…Bush signed Tuesday that is aimed at store-front lenders clustered around military bases." The law "is a response to 'payday advance' stores that market short-term loans, typically charging $15 or $20 per $100 loan for periods of up to two weeks or a borrowers' next payday. Borrowers generally renew loans several times before paying them off, and the fees result in effective annual interest rates of 400% or more, a Defense Department study concluded." Military officers "pushed for the law, saying the loans saddled low-paid enlisted men and women with debts that ruined their finances, jeopardized security clearances and left them unable to deploy to Iraq or other assignments."

Bush Signs Updated National Space Policy. The Washington Post (10/18, Kaufman, 748K) reports on its front page that President Bush "has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone 'hostile to U.S. interests.'" The document, "the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy largely in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy." In written comments, NSC spokesman Frederick Jones said an update "was needed to 'reflect the fact that space has become an even more important component of U.S. economic, national and homeland security.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/18, 918K) publishes a brief report based on the Washington Post story, while UPI (10/18) notes, "Steven Aftergood, the government transparency campaigner at the Federation of American Scientists, says the new policy, released recently by the White House, 'creates overlapping and possibly conflicting responsibilities' for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld."

Bush Officials Say Faith-Based Initiative Critic Kuo Got It Wrong. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/17) reported, "An even-tempered White House is disputing former faith-based staffer David Kuo's claim in his new book that the President only gave lip-service and chump change to social conservatives. While his sharply critical 'Tempting Faith: An Insider Story of Political Seduction' has generated a lot of anger in some White House circles, officials who've worked on the faith-based initiative and interacted with social conservatives are gently rapping Kuo for missing the whole point of President Bush's efforts on behalf of the target group. Two told the Bulletin and US News that conservatives, while certainly eager for the millions of dollars promised but not fully delivered by the faith-based initiative, are more interested in the policy and long-lasting appointments made by the President." One official said, "The narrative of the book is that social conservatives get spin and trinkets but no policy." But he added "the President has delivered 'in spades' on issues the conservatives, especially evangelicals, care about. The officials listed four key issues: abortion, marriage, judges, and character." MSNBC's Hardball (10/17, Matthews) said "the Bush administration is up in arms" over the book.

Towey Takes Issue With Book's Assertions. Jim Towey, former Director of the White House Office of Faith Based Initiatives, said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/17), "The problem is that he's allowing the impression that the faith-based initiative was political, that the President's a hypocrite, that the people on the staff were manipulating evangelicals. And all of that's just not true. So yes, it's a problem for me because it goes to the heart of the integrity of the work we do at the White House. I was very proud as a Democrat on senior staff to do a very even-handed job with the initiative. We helped with the poor. We expanded some compassion programs, did it in a constitutional way. And the President had given me marching orders to keep it focused there and we did. So a book comes out like this, it's a shock to us."

DOJ_NMG_0082511

SCOTUS Sees Increase In Sealed Filings. The Legal Times (10/18, Mauro) reports, "When the Supreme Court debates the constitutionality of the federal 'partial birth abortion' law next month, it will have some sensitive information in its hands that no member of the public can see." The Times continues, "Specifically, the justices will have the full transcript of a 2004 deposition by an Oregon doctor who apparently mentioned the names of colleagues in the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists who may have performed abortions. … It was part of the file in the case of Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, but when it made its way to the Supreme Court this summer, the organization and Planned Parenthood requested that the parts of the doctor's deposition that name doctors be filed with the Court under seal." The Times adds, "Solicitor General Paul Clement concurred and filed a motion, and on Oct. 2, the Court said yes -- one of six cases that day in which the Court granted motions to file petitions under seal. It was, according to a database search, the largest number of unrelated cases in which the Court granted such motions in a single day. .. .In the Planned Parenthood case, the Court's action means an extra measure of privacy for a handful of physicians. As Daniel Edelman, a lawyer for the physician who was deposed, put it, 'The last thing we'd need is for some lunatic to get names from the deposition and go and attack one of the doctors.'" The Times notes, "But in some of the other cases, the justification for secrecy is less obvious. And to some, the day's actions symbolize a little-noticed trend over the past decade toward allowing secret filings at the Supreme Court. Whereas decades ago such motions were discouraged and often denied at the Supreme Court, now they are routinely granted. No motion to file under seal has been denied since 2003. The Court itself votes on the motions without any hearing at which opposition can be heard. Typically, when the Court grants a motion to seal, a redacted version is made part of the public record. … The number of filings under seal is still tiny -- only 12 in this calendar year out of more than 7,000 petitions filed. And Court insiders assert that the spike in motions granted is a fluke, not a reflection of any change in policy."

Bush To Tout NCLB At North Carolina School. WXII-TV Winston-Salem, North Carolina (10/17, 11:39 am EDT) reported, "President George W. Bush is visiting North Carolina for the third time in 2006 and appearing in the Piedmont-Triad for the first time in more than 10 months. Bush on Wednesday will visit Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School in Guilford County" where he will "speak about the No Child Left Behind Act." NC13 Rep. Brad Miller (D) "called the No Child Left Behind Act one of Bush's 'most well-known policy failures.' Miller claimed the Bush administration has underfunded the initiative by $40 billion over the last four years."

The Reidsville Review (NC) (10/18, Williams) reports, "Rockingham County Schools Superintendent Rodney Shotwell has plans to attend the presidential address Wednesday at Falkener Elementary in neighboring Guilford County." Shotwell said that "there are positives and negatives to the NCLB legislation." The positive is that NCLB "forces us to look at all of a school's subgroups." But Shotwell "would like to see a change in the funding formula under NCLB so that schools would not suffer."

Math Study Says Other Countries Expect More From Their Students. The AP (10/18, Ben Feller) reports, "Kids who are turned off by math often say they don't enjoy it, they aren't good at it and they see little point in it. Who knew that could be a formula for success? The nations with the best scores have the least happy, least confident math students, says a study by the Brookings Institution's Brown Center on Education Policy." Author Tom Loveless said, "We might want to focus on the math that kids are learning and just be a little less obsessed with the fact that they have to enjoy every minute of it." He added that "other countries do better than the United States because they seem to expect more from students."

USA Today (10/18, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the study found that "the 10 'happiest' nations all performed below the international average. The 10 'unhappiest' all scored above average." And "U.S. eighth-graders fell somewhere in the middle and followed the same pattern." The study is based on the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study.

The Washington Post (10/18, A2, Mathews, 748K) reports the report "is likely to stoke a debate over teaching math and other subjects that has divided the United States for at least a century." The study also found that "in most countries, including Korea and the United States, students who like math and think they are good at it have higher math scores than those who don't."

Reid To Repay Campaign For Condo Staff Tips. ABC World News (10/17, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid, is dealing with a new ethics controversy. He says he's going to repay his campaign for $3,300 in campaign funds that he used to give his apartment building staff Christmas bonuses. Federal law bars campaign funds for personal expenses. Yesterday, Reid said he will file a new disclosure statement on a controversial land deal that earned him $700,000 in profit."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Blitzer) reported Reid is "facing some new legal and ethical questions today." Reid "already was on the defensive over a land deal. Now he is dealing with a flap over tips and how he paid for them and it's definitely not helping Democrats make their culture of corruption argument against Republicans." CNN (Bash) added, "It's not a leading issue in this midterm campaign, but Democrats do, as you say, like to talk about what they call a Republican culture of corruption, both here in the capital and out on the campaign trail. Now, three weeks before election day, Republicans say Democrats have a problem of their own. Democratic leader Harry Reid lives in this Ritz Carlton in Washington. At Christmas time the Senator gave doormen and other employees $3300 in tips over three years, a generous gesture, but the money came from Reid's campaign coffers, a possible violation of election law." Reid "said his lawyers had assured him it was OK, but to be safe, he is, quote, reimbursing the campaign from my own pocket."

DOJ_NMG_0082512

The Hill (10/18, Schor) reports, "Conservative group Citizens United yesterday announced plans to file a complaint with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) about Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) use of campaign funds to contribute to the Christmas fund in his condominium." Citizens United President David Bossie said, "Senator Reid knows better than to use political contributions for personal services."

Lewis Spent $750,000 On Legal Fees. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Simon, 918K) reports Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), "the House Appropriations Committee chairman whose ties to lobbyists have come under scrutiny, has spent more than $750,000 from his campaign fund for defense lawyers, according to his latest spending report." Lewis has "denied any wrongdoing. But the investigation is taking a toll on his campaign treasury." Legal fees "were his single biggest expense for the most recent period: More than $550,000 was paid to the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher between July 1 and Sept. 30. And he paid the firm a $200,000 retainer in June."

Election Angst Boosted Textile Industry Priorities In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A4, Hitt, 2.03M) reports that as lawmakers "hit the home stretch of tight races, textile makers are leveraging voters' economic anxieties to win industry protections and derail free-trade initiatives." Before the congressional recess, "anxious lawmakers shelved several items that the Bush administration had pushed as part of its trade agenda, but which the textile industry opposed. Now the question for the White House is how to get those efforts back on track -- especially if Democrats, who are traditionally less friendly to free trade, take control of one or both houses of Congress in November's voting." The textile industry's "maneuvering shows how Republican vulnerabilities in midterm elections have created opportunities for some special-interest groups." When Rep. Bill Thomas, "chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill Sept. 21 that would give trade preferences to Africa and Haiti, lobbyists for Amtac and the National Council of Textile Organizations, another textile group, swung into action. They were especially worried about provisions in the bill that would allow Haiti to use more foreign-made fabric, such as cheap cloth from China, to make clothes, while still qualifying for duty-free access to the U.S. market." The groups "appealed to Rep. Robin Hayes, a North Carolina Republican, for help." Hayes "agreed to lead the opposition against the Haiti bill," and he "spoke to party leaders, then wrote a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert arguing that the legislation could expose U.S. workers to 'devastating' new competition."

OTHER NEWS:

Economic Data Suggest Cooling Economy. USA Today (10/18, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Wholesale prices fell in September at the fastest pace in more than three years as energy costs plunged, the government said Tuesday in a report that offered some assurances that inflation is easing. The producer price index, which measures prices paid to factories, farmers and other producers, fell 1.3% in September." That was "the first drop since February and the biggest decline since April 2003, the Labor Department said." The falloff in September "was led by a dramatic drop in energy costs. Gasoline prices fell a record 22.2% last month, while costs for heating oil and natural gas also declined."

NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 4, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Inflation at the wholesale level last month dropped sharply because of those lower oil and gas prices we've been talking about. But the so-called core inflation rate, that's what happens had you strip away all the changeable food and energy prices, jumped sharply." The New York Times (10/18, Peters, 1.21M) titles its report "Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist."

The Financial Times (10/18, Chisholm) reports, "Fears that the US economy may yet experience a hard landing were revived on Tuesday after a report showed industrial production in September fell by much more than expected. … Manufacturing output fell 0.3 per cent, while mining expanded by 0.7 per cent." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A8, Conkey, 2.03M) says the data "suggest a cooling US economy in which inflationary pressures are easing, a combination that could keep the Federal Reserve from changing interest rates anytime soon. … Output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities fell 0.6% in September after a flat performance in August, the Federal Reserve reported." The decline "was particularly sharp at utilities, which produced less power than usual because of mild weather. Many manufacturing industries also ramped down production because of weaker demand for cars and houses." The Labor Department, meanwhile, "said a big drop in oil prices pushed wholesale prices down 1.3% in September, the first time producers of food, energy and materials have seen prices fall since February."

DOJ_NMG_0082513

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (10/17, story 3, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was down today about 30 and a half points [to close at 11,950.02]. NASDAQ was also down just under 19 points [to close at 2,344.95]." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, C1, Ng, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.37%, or five points, to 1364.05 and is up 9.3% this year."

Ex-President Bush Says Although Economy Is Good, Consumers May Not See It That Way. The Dallas Morning News (10/18, Robinson-Jacobs, 500K) reports, "Former President George Bush said Tuesday that although he believes the US economy is strong, he's worried that the average citizen might not be getting that message. … 'The unmistakable picture that those statistics mean to me is that the economy is strong,' the 41st president told attendees of the Multi-Unit Foodservice Operators conference, who gave him a standing ovation when he entered the room. 'There is a concerted effort to make it appear that the economy is bad,' said Mr. Bush, the father of President George W. Bush."

Gasoline Tax Hike Considered Unlikely Despite Economists' Support. In an analysis, the Washington Post (10/18, D1, Mufson, 748K) says raising taxes on gasoline or crude oil "might be a simple way to trim U.S. oil imports, reduce greenhouse-gas emissions, encourage alternatives to petroleum and ease world energy shortages. ... Economists and policy experts across the political spectrum think it's a good idea. And with gasoline prices falling, now might be the perfect time to do it without eliciting cries of pain from U.S. drivers... ." However, "Because of the thorny politics of raising taxes, the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal gas levy hasn't changed since Oct. 1, 1993. And few policy experts expect a higher tax soon." The Post says, "Many economists support oil taxes because otherwise the prices paid by consumers do not include costs -- such as pollution -- that society pays separately." An "illustration of political gridlock on the issue is a new Council on Foreign Relations task force report on how U.S. dependence on oil imports undermines U.S. foreign policy. The group agreed that there is a big problem but couldn't agree on how to curb gasoline consumption."

LATimes Calls Alternative Energy Development A National Security Priority. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (10/18, 918K) writes, "For China, India, Japan and every other industrial nation, a steady supply of oil is essential to economic growth. And as competition for oil increases, so does the temptation to make it the focus of foreign policy. Bush has warned against the hazards of this approach, and US history -- especially in the Middle East -- is a catalog of its dangers." But "he'd be more convincing...if his policy more closely matched his rhetoric." Asian powers' "pursuit of policies designed to secure a steady supply of oil...is a geopolitical watershed... . Even if the US were to reduce its oil dependency, its ability to act multilaterally could be constrained by the energy arrangements of other nations. For these and other reasons, the development of alternative energy technologies that can reduce demand at home and be exported abroad is both an economic necessity and a national security priority. It's far too important to be left to the environmentalists -- or the states, the lobbyists (for nuclear power or ethanol) or even to philanthropists such as Richard Branson. In our globalized economies, lasting peace is unlikely without energy security."

Samuelson Says Politicians' Proposals To Curb Oil Dependence Are Deceptions. In a Washington Post (10/18, 748K) op-ed, columnist Robert J. Samuelson writes that, for years, some remedies to US dependence on imported oil "have been obvious: Tax oil heavily to spur Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to drive a bit less, raise sharply the government's fuel economy standards so those vehicles are available, and allow more oil and gas drilling. In recent years, we've done none of these things." He writes, "Unfortunately, the steps we should take involve immediate political costs -- they'd be unpopular -- while the benefits would emerge slowly and seem modest. ... Any realistic proposal would ignite a firestorm of protest. Environmentalists would denounce more drilling. Auto companies would protest new fuel economy standards. Most important, the public would denounce a steep energy tax... ." Samuelson concludes, "Because Americans want painless salvation, our politicians proffer visions that promise just that: a shift to hydrogen fuel or a surge in ethanol. The first may be futuristic wishful thinking; the second is mainly a costly giveaway to farmers. Both are deceptions, new excuses not to do the 'right thing.'"

Chicago Sued Over Red Light Cameras. USA Today (10/18, Parker) reports, "Cameras that snap photos of motorists running red lights have been upheld as constitutional by courts in five states and Washington, D.C., but some car owners refuse to concede defeat and are continuing to challenge them. … Three Chicago-area car owners are suing the city, which the trio claims ticketed each of them for running red lights even though none of them was at the wheel. In a class-action lawsuit, Parveen Idris of Bloomingdale and two other plaintiffs say the city's ticketing program is unconstitutional because it cranks out $90 tickets to vehicle owners no matter who is driving the car. … Jennifer Hoyle, a spokeswoman for the city's Law Department, says the city expects to prevail in court because other city ordinances that are similarly enforced have survived court challenges."

DOJ_NMG_0082514

LATimes Endorses Judges For Reelection. The Los Angeles Times (10/18) editorializes, "Two of California's seven Supreme Court justices are up for retention this year. Carol A. Corrigan was appointed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in January and is facing voters for the first time. Joyce L. Kennard was appointed by former Gov. George Deukmejian in 1989 and has weathered previous elections. Both of these excellent jurists should be retained." The Times adds, "California's Court of Appeal is an intermediate court divided into six geographic districts. … The following justices are on the ballot, have served with distinction and deserve a 'yes' vote: Robert M. Mallano, Frances Rothschild, Roger W. Boren, Victoria M. Chavez, Patti S. Kitching, Richard D. Aldrich, Norman L. Epstein, Thomas L. Willhite, Nora M. Manella, Steve Suzukawa, Richard M. Mosk, Sandy R. Kriegler, Arthur Gilbert, Dennis M. Perluss, Fred Woods, Laurie D. Zelon, Candace D. Cooper and Madeleine Flier." The Times also notes, "For Los Angeles Superior Court, four offices offer voters a choice. For Office No. 8, Bob Henry, a California deputy attorney general, has broad experience in criminal and civil law. For Office No. 18, Daviann Mitchell is a former police officer who now prosecutes gang crimes as a Los Angeles deputy district attorney. Two other current deputy district attorneys also deserve to be elected: Hayden Zacky for Office No. 102 and David W. Stuart for Office No. 144."

Study Finds Widespread Risk Of Reactions To Some Medicines. CBS Evening News 10/17, story 9, 2:45, Couric) broadcasted, "In other health news tonight, did you know 82% of Americans take at least one medication, but sometimes drugs meant to make us better actually do us harm. Dr. Jon Lapook now reports on an important study out today." CBS (Lapook) added, "In a report today, the 'Journal of the American Medical Association' estimates that 700,000 people a year, especially the elderly, experience adverse drug events that lead to emergency room visits."

The AP (10/18, Tanner) reports, "Accidental overdoses and allergic reactions to prescription drugs were the most frequent cause of serious illnesses, according to the study, the first to reveal the nationwide scope of the problem. People older than 65 faced the greatest risks." Patient-safety specialist Bruce Lambert, a professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's college of pharmacy, said, "This is an important study because it reinforces the really substantial risks that there are in everyday use of drugs." Even so, "the study authors and other experts agreed that the 700,000 estimate was conservative because severe drug reactions can often be misdiagnosed."

Blue Cross Of California To Settle Lawsuits Over Illegal Cancellations. The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Girion) reports, "Facing the threat of punishment from regulators, Blue Cross of California has agreed to settle more than 70 lawsuits and claims filed by patients who accused the state's largest health insurer of illegally canceling their coverage after they got sick. The settlements, according to lawyers involved in the cases, include undisclosed monetary awards that would allow former holders of policies sold to individuals to pay off hefty medical bills they were stuck with after losing their insurance. In exchange, the former policyholders agreed to drop allegations that Blue Cross was canceling policies to avoid paying for treatment."

Pirro, Cuomo Clash In Final Debate. The New York Times (10/18, Hicks) reports that New York attorney General candidates Jeanine F. Pirro (R) and Andrew M. Cuomo (D) squared off in their final debate on Tuesday. Pirro attacked Cuomo as an "inexperienced prosecutor devoid of ethics or integrity." She repeatedly targeted Cuomo's "ethics, charging that while housing secretary, he pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials in an agreement signed by Mr. Cuomo's counsel. Years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign." Cuomo "cast Ms. Pirro as a career politician with little experience outside criminal prosecution. He also offered a new attack against his Republican rival. He cited an article in The New York Sun on Tuesday detailing a letter written by" U.S. Senate candidate John Spencer (R), "when Mr. Spencer was mayor of Yonkers. The article stated that Mr. Spencer wrote a 15-page letter to Attorney General Eliot Spitzer accusing Ms. Pirro of using her position as district attorney to protect public officials from scandal and to punish political opponents. 'The office she's seeking is investigating her,' Mr. Cuomo said. Immediately after the debate, Cuomo campaign aides supplied copies of the article to reporters in the television studio, and Mr. Spitzer's office said it had an 'open investigation' into the matter."

Both Parties Mulling Impact Of Potential GOP Congressional Loss. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Baker, Fletcher, 748K) reports that if Democrats "win one or both houses of Congress on Nov. 7, the result will transform the remainder of" President Bush's "time in office and dramatically shift the balance of power in Washington. Ending a dozen years basically passed in exile, congressional Democrats would have a chance to help steer the nation again -- following a campaign spent mostly assailing Bush's vision rather than detailing their own." The White House "says it is not making contingency plans for a Democratic win, but Bush advisers are bracing for what they privately recognize is the increasing likelihood. And Democratic leaders have been conferring about what they would do should voters return them to power." Democrats "could use their ascendance to block Bush's agenda, force him to respond to theirs and begin a new era of aggressive oversight and investigation. A Democratic victory, analysts in both parties said, could mean that some of Bush's tax cuts would not be renewed, attempts to revive his Social Security investment plan would be doomed and efforts to further broaden national security powers in the face of civil liberties concerns would be thwarted." What is "most worrisome to the White House is the subpoena power that Democrats would gain with a majority in the House or Senate." But some Republicans "think that Bush could play off overreaching Democrats as Clinton did with Gingrich. Or he could pivot to the more bipartisan mode he promised to bring from Texas and seize opportunities for progress in areas such as immigration, where his proposed guest-worker program has been blocked by his own party."

DOJ_NMG_0082515

Bartlett Says Conservatives Should Not Fear A Democratic Victory In November. Bruce Bartlett, an official under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush, writes in the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M), "Even before the Mark Foley scandal broke, Democrats' chances of getting control of the House of Representatives were pretty good. Now, with the incompetence of the Republican leadership's handling of that affair, the odds of Democratic control are looking very good indeed." Bartlett adds, "My Democratic friends no doubt feel the way we Republicans did in those heady days of 1994 before political reality came knocking. … To all this I say: Ain't gonna happen. For starters, President Bush will still occupy the White House for the next two years. And although his veto pen may have been misplaced for most of the last six years, he found it again this summer." Bartlett concludes, "In short, there is really no reason for conservatives, businessmen or investors to worry particularly about a Democratic victory in November. Congress will be on automatic pilot for the next two years regardless of which party is in control."

Centrist Politics Seen As Making Comeback. In his Washington Post column (10/18, A21), David Ignatius examines the "overarching battle this year between two visions of America: testing whether it's a country defined by its political center or one defined by its political extremes. This assessment of America's meta-politics is distilled in 'The Way to Win' by Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post. They see "two basic strategic ideas at work in today's politics: the 'synthesizer' approach of former president Bill Clinton, and the 'clarifier' tactics of President Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove." Halperin and Harris say "Clinton Politics" is "the politics of the center. It holds that Americans for the most part, with the exception of irate groups at the edges, are less interested in ideology than in practical solutions to basic problems. People would prefer politics to be polite, civil, and compromise-minded." On the other hand, they say, "Bush Politics is the politics of the base. A successful leader will stand forthrightly on one side of a grand argument. Then he or she will win that argument by sharpening the differences and rallying his most intense supporters to his side." Ignatius adds, "So what's working this campaign season? As I read this year's races, the centrist approach seems to be making something of a comeback."

Democrats Said To Have "First Tier" Of Legislation. In his Washington Post column (10/18, A21), Harold Meyerson says if Democrats win the House, they have "made clear that there's a first tier of legislation they mean to bring to a vote almost immediately after the new Congress convenes. It includes raising the minimum wage, repealing the Medicare legislation that forbids the government from negotiating with drug companies for lower prices, replenishing student loan programs, funding stem cell research and implementing those recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that have thus far languished." And "cognizant that they will owe their victory in part to the public's revulsion at the way Congress does (or avoids) business, the Democrats also plan to revise House rules to enable the opposition party to introduce amendments and to sit on conference committees, from which Republicans have routinely excluded them since Tom DeLay became majority leader. They also will ban members from accepting gifts and paid trips from lobbyists."

Rove "Confident" GOP Will Hold Onto Both House, Senate. The Washington Times (10/18, Curl, 88K) reports Karl Rove "confidently predicted that the Republican Party would hold the House and the Senate in next month's elections, dismissing fallout from the sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley." At a "luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times, Mr. Rove -- who is widely credited as the architect of the party's historic 2002 midterm election gains -- said Republicans are beginning to make significant headway in defining their party's differences from congressional Democrats, especially on national security." Rove said, "I'm confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House. The Foley matter has impact in some limited districts, but the research we have shows that people are differentiating between a vote for their congressman and a member from Florida." Rove added President Bush has "begun to paint this year's election as a choice between strength and weakness on national security -- and the stark differences will show Americans the true nature of Democrats."

Cheney Said To Sound Unsure GOP Will Keep Majorities. The AP (10/18) reports that while President Bush "says flatly that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate," Vice President Dick Cheney "doesn't sound quite so certain." In an interview with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, Cheney said, "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House."

DOJ_NMG_0082516

Democrats Said To Have Shot At Winning Both Houses. CBS Evening News (10/17, story 4, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "There's a growing sense up here on Capitol Hill that the Democrats now really have a shot at regaining control of both Houses of Congress. Conventional wisdom has been that it's the Republican control of the House that's really in danger." Democrats "need to take away six Republican seats to win the Senate back. And that has looked unlikely until now. That's because with scandals, the war, and the President with low approval ratings, this is a very difficult environment for Republicans to run, so, Katie, they're just trying to turn out their voters." The GOP advantage on turnout will be "very important to them, particularly in House districts where there may be a one- or two-point margin between the candidates. It's also going to help them get out their conservative base voters." But if "you're running about eight to 10 points behind, forget it. No great voter turnout operation is going to save your seat."

Morris, McGann Say GOP Base Has Deserted. In their column in The Hill (10/18), Dick Morris and Eileen McGann say, "The Republican base, that vaunted entity whose every mood swing has controlled the zigs and zags of the Bush Administration policy, has moved out, according to the latest Gallup polling. Karl Rove's heroic efforts to preserve its fealty have failed to move Republican base voters. Karl cannot compensate for Bush's failure to project his issues as the midterm disaster for the Republican Party nears." The Gallup poll "of Oct. 6-8 shows that, in the wake of the Foley scandal, the number of 'white frequent churchgoers' who are planning to vote Republican has dropped from 58 percent to 47 percent since last month. The margin of their support for Republicans over Democrats, 26 percentage points in September, has entirely disappeared and the parties are tied among this core element of the Republican base." The Foley scandal "has wrought extraordinary damage to the Republican Party and appears to have had a particularly negative impact on the base."

GOP Incumbents Running Short On Campaign Funds. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A4, Cummings, 2.03M) reports most "embattled Republican House incumbents have less campaign cash than they expected, despite raising more money than their Democratic challengers. Republicans had to spend heavily in recent weeks to buck an unfavorable national climate for the party." The Journal cites the example of Connecticut Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson "spent $3.5 million on her re-election bid through Sept. 30 compared with Democratic challenger Christopher Murphy, who spent just $1.5 million, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission." Johnson "ended the third quarter with $1 million in the bank compared with about $368,000 in Mr. Murphy's account," but "her race is still considered a 'toss up'" by the Cook Political Report. Colby College analyst Anthony Corrado said, "In some ways, the major Republican opponent hasn't been the Democratic challenger as much as it's been the daily news cycle." The Journal adds most Democrats "running for open House seats held by retiring Republicans have raised more cash than their opponents, giving their party a chance to make net gains in the race for control of that chamber."

The Hill (10/18, Kaplan, Blake) reports House Republican incumbents have "socked away more money than their Democratic challengers in 34 of 52 competitive districts and in some cases Republicans lead Democratic challengers by a ratio of seven to one, said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti in a statement." But "some of those figures are misleading because some candidates, such as Democrats Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and Joe Courtney (Conn.), have spent exorbitant sums on television advertising buys." In "seven competitive Senate races, state Treasurer Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) lead incumbent GOP Sens. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.)." In Tennessee's "open seat race, Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) holds a narrow lead over former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R). In Maryland and Minnesota, the candidates are within $500,000 of each other in cash on hand." Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) "holds a commanding lead over Democrat Jim Webb, but Webb raked in $3.4 million in the third quarter. And in Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) has a $4 million lead over challenger Claire McCaskill (D) largely because she has made a large media buy for the final weeks leading up to Election Day."

The Washington Times (10/18, Hurt, 88K) reports National Republicans are "dumping more than $1 million into Senate races in the Democratic strongholds of Maryland and New Jersey but are facing a bleak field elsewhere, strategists from both parties say." While Republican strategists "privately acknowledge that the races look tough for the GOP, they remain confident that they will keep Democrats from gaining the six seats they need to win control of the chamber."

Lack Of Money Hindering Democratic Efforts To Expand Field. The Washington Post (10/18, A12, VandeHei, 748K) reports top Democrats said "they are planning to significantly expand the number of GOP House seats they will target during the final 20 days of the campaign but that financial disputes and fundraising problems are hindering the effort." Democrats said "private polls have convinced top party officials that they could pick up 40 or more seats -- nearly double their internal projections from a week ago -- if they spend enough money on television advertising for long-shot races. Strategists James Carville and Stan Greenberg are among those pleading with party leaders to go deep into debt to run ads in as many as 50 GOP-held districts." Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) "has privately signed off on targeting a new group of GOP incumbents who were once considered safe for reelection, starting with Rep. Gil Gutknecht in rural Minnesota, officials said." Emanuel said he "believes as many as 58 seats are now in play." The Post adds, "Still, several Democrats complained that the party is on the verge of blowing a once-in-a-decade political opportunity because of financial troubles." Harold Ickes – "a Democratic operative who recently created an independent political group called the September Fund with a goal of raising $10 million to $20 million for House and Senate campaigns -- said his group cannot afford to target races beyond those that Democrats have already identified as must-wins to capture control of the House for the first time since 1994." Ickes said his group "has raised between $5 million and $10 million, half its original goal." Ickes said, "It has been more difficult raising money than I expected."

DOJ_NMG_0082517

Flake Says GOP Reliance On Earmarks Leave Majority At Risk. USA Today (10/18, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) reports Rep. Jeff Flake, a "leading Republican critic of special-interest spending earmarks," said the GOP "risks its congressional majority by defending the practice." Flake "said a report Tuesday in USA TODAY was the latest in a series of revelations casting an ethical cloud on earmarks." Flake's opposition to earmarks "helped prompt a temporary House rule change requiring the disclosure of some sponsors of earmarks. He said he hoped that rule could be made permanent but faced opposition from Republican supporters of earmarks." Flake said, "Until we change that mindset, I don't know that we're going to curb the practice (of earmarking). Maybe it'll take two years in the wilderness of being in the political minority. I hope that's not what it takes." USA adds it found "that lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write."

Majority Think Lobbying By Lawmaker's Relatives Wrong. USA Today (10/18, Eisler, Kelley, 2.27M) reports an "overwhelming majority of Americans believe it's wrong for lawmakers and their staffs to have contact with relatives who are lobbyists regarding government matters. But a survey of lawmakers suggests they don't see a problem." A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll "shows that 80% of respondents believe such actions are inappropriate. By contrast, few members of the House and Senate appropriations committees say they have policies that prevent lobbying by relatives." Four committee members "who responded to a USA TODAY survey have policies that prevent relatives from lobbying them or their staffs. All are senators: Dick Durbin, D-Ill., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa." None of the House members "who responded reported having such a policy. The newspaper surveyed all 94 members of the appropriations committees; 37 answered the survey."

Democratic Ads Link Minimum Wage, Congressional Pay Raises. USA Today (10/18, Stone, 2.27M) reports Democratic challengers "in more than two dozen House and Senate races are attacking Republicans in Congress for taking pay raises while voting against a minimum wage increase." The attacks are "contained in television and radio ads running from Washington state to Virginia. In some races, such as House contests in Indiana and Connecticut, Democrats also link pay raises to Republican votes against combat bonuses for U.S. troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." While some of the ads "may fudge the facts, political analysts say the message appeals to the pocketbook concerns of voters."

Taxes Seen As GOP Fallback Issue For Midterm Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (10/18, Feldmann, 58K) reports that in an "election season where the Republicans can't seem to buy a break, the party's highest-profile campaigners," President Bush and Vice President Cheney, "have gone back to a bedrock GOP issue: taxes." While the President "tends to keep his remarks general, Mr. Cheney and Republican National Committee chair Ken Mehlman get personal. They target in particular Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York, who would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win control of the House." The GOP leaders "assert as fact that Mr. Rangel favors 'across-the-board tax increases,' which Rangel and the Democrats vigorously deny. But the debate has been framed, and it is one that has resonated for decades in the back and forth of partisan politics." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "It plays to the basic party stereotypes, and of course most people, if you give them an unalloyed choice of paying more taxes or less taxes, they'll pick less taxes every time."

Forty State Ballot Measures Deal With Taxes, Spending Levels. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, Wells, 2.03M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "Nationwide, there are some 40 measures to increase or decrease taxes or to restrict spending, according to a University of Southern California survey. But many are gaining little publicity in an election year dominated by the possible change of control in Congress. Unlike many state tax measures in past years, this year's measures have sparked little taxpayer outcry."

DOJ_NMG_0082518

NYTimes/CBS Ohio Poll Shows Brown, Strickland Ahead By Double Digits. The New York Times (10/18, Broder, Thee, 1.21M) reports a New York Times/CBS News poll of Ohio voters shows "the Democratic candidates for governor and Senate hold commanding double-digit leads over their Republican opponents in the poll, and respondents said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate for the House in their district by 50 percent to 32 percent." The poll found "a striking slippage in the president's standing among white evangelical Christians, a constituency that has provided a strong vote cushion for Republican candidates in recent elections. In November 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush." In the current survey, "49 percent approved while 45 percent disapproved" of Bush's job performance. Republican Sen. Mike DeWine trails Democrat Sherrod Brown "by 34 percent to 48 percent," while Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland, "is leading the Republican nominee, J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Ohio secretary of state, by 53 percent to 29 percent."

CBS Evening News (10/17, story 5, 3:15, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "According to a new CBS News/'New York Times' poll, 31% of likely voters here see this race as a chance to vote against the President. The Republican Senator is now 14 points behind his Democratic challenger Congressman Sherrod Brown." Just "how their campaigns are viewed here in Ohio could determine how the rest of the nation votes in November." Still, DeWine is "far from out. He's been a fundraising machine, and even Brown worries the Republicans may have enough money to make a comeback."

GOP Scales Back Ad Buy In Ohio For DeWine. The AP (10/18, Kuhnhenn) reports the "Republican Party placed $700,000 in television ads in Ohio Tuesday, a scaled-back ad campaign amid growing doubts by party officials that GOP Sen. Mike DeWine can win re-election in the battleground state." The ads "are smaller than recent million-dollar ad buys by" the National Republican Senatorial Committee, "but party officials touted the ads as evidence that they were not abandoning the state or giving up on DeWine." The AP adds GOP officials "are turning their sights to Virginia to offer needed help to Sen. George Allen, who has been unable to stop a rapidly tightening race with Democrat Jim Webb. Virginia already is part of the party's aggressive voter turnout operation and party officials are said to be weighing a substantial ad campaign in the state as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee already is spending about $1.1 million on ads in Virginia against Allen." Republicans also "spent $500,000 to air ads in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, who is being closely challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr." Meanwhile, the National Republican Congressional Committee is "paying for polling in the Kentucky congressional district of Rep. Anne Northup and the Pennsylvania district of Rep. Melissa Hart." Both parties also "signaled that they will begin airing television ads in GOP Rep. Gil Gutknecht's re-election race in Minnesota, a campaign not previously considered competitive."

Pro-GOP Ads Said To Distort Truth On Iraq. McClatchy (10/18, Thomma) reports when "a shadowy group pouring untraceable millions into this fall's campaign makes" the claim to be "a 'political truth squad,'" that "bears a little truth-checking itself." Television ads "from the group, Progress for America, manage to grab the heart, but also stretch or twist the truth as they work to boost support for the Iraq war." They "feature David Beamer, whose son led a counterattack against the terrorists who hijacked United Flight 93 on Sept. 11, 2001." In the ad, David Beamer says, "Al-Qaida killed 3,000 Americans on 9/11 and will do anything to destroy us and our way of life. Todd and United 93 fought back. We continue this fight in Iraq today. This enemy must be destroyed in Iraq and wherever we find them." McClatchy adds that "makes it sound as though the war in Iraq is retaliation against al-Qaida. It's not. Iraq had nothing to do with al-Qaida's attack on us." Asked to "back up its ad, the group pointed to news articles about al-Qaida in Iraq now. But we didn't 'find' al-Qaida in Iraq. They came in to fight us after we invaded." Misleading assertions "like those made by Progress for America feed a lingering misunderstanding of the Iraq war."

Investigators Probe Whether Beauprez Camp Used Federal Database. The AP (10/18, Paulson) reports Colorado authorities "have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack ad run by GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez against his opponent for governor illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database." Democrat Bill Ritter's campaign "has suggested the information was taken from the computerized crime records." Beauprez spokesman John Marshall "said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign is cooperating with investigators." The TV ad "in question refers to Carlos Estrada Medina, a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says Ritter chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, Medina avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor." The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) runs a short version of the story.

WPost Endorses Webb In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Post (10/18, A20, 748K) endorses Democrat James Webb, saying Republican Sen. George Allen is "a mediocre senator whose six years of undistinguished service

DOJ_NMG_0082519

do not justify rehiring." Webb is "admirably independent-minded," while Allen "has spent his time in the Senate in lock step with the Bush administration, embracing tax cuts that have imperiled the nation's fiscal health; subsidies for oil and gas companies that hardly needed the help; prisoner detention policies that have undercut America's image abroad; and restrictions on embryonic stem cell research despite its medical potential."

Webb Writings Said To Show Dignity Of "Redneck" Culture. The Washington Post (10/18, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports over "the course of his career, in books and more recently in screenplays, Webb, 60, has been writing about the dignity of his people" from Southwest Virginia, "the gun-loving, country-music-singing, working-class whites of Scotch-Irish descent who fight in wars, staff the nation's factories and shop its Wal-Marts." He "knows that some folks might call his people rednecks. We pity those folks if Jim Webb is around when they say that."

Menendez, Kean Touch On Familiar Themes Of Iraq, Corruption. The AP (10/18, Santi) reports that Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican Thomas Kean Jr. "were at it again Tuesday, in a 90-minute radio encounter that opened with a lengthy exchange on the war in Iraq." Kean "repeatedly refused to say whether he would vote to authorize sending U.S. troops into Iraq, even if he had intelligence information that was not available when the war began." Menendez "voted against the resolution authorizing the start of the war and has called for a timely withdrawal of U.S. troops." After the debate, "which aired live on Millennium Radio Network stations, Kean was asked again and again to articulate his position on authorizing the war and each time refused to answer the question directly." Kean "has made ethics a centerpiece of his candidacy and has tried to paint his opponent, who rose through the ranks of rough-and-tumble Hudson County politics, with a broad brush of political corruption. That familiar line of attack was evident again Tuesday night."

NBC Nightly News 10/17, story 7, 3:05, Reid) reported Kean, "who rarely mentions he's a Republican, has used his family name his father's the popular former Governor of New Jersey and a relentless attack on Menendez's ethics to turn this race into a toss-up." Tom Kean Jr.: "Clearly Bob Menendez's financial records are under investigation by the US attorney. That's clear." Reid: "Mincing no words, Menendez calls Kean a liar, insisting there's no evidence he's under investigation, though it's not entirely clear who's right."

Kean Taps $400,000 Of Own Money For Campaign. The Hill (10/18, Bolton) reports that twice in the past week, Kean "took a day out of his campaign schedule to attend to the seemingly mundane tasks of committee work, while his opponent, with whom he is locked in a neck-and-neck race, stumped for votes." While appearances "this week suggest Kean is not as committed to the race as Menendez is, Kean has made it clear that he's in this battle to win." Kean this week "decided to spend at least $400,000 of his own money to defeat Menendez in a race that represents the GOP's best chance of capturing a Democratic Senate seat next month. The personal contribution will appear on fundraising reports to be made public today." One GOP official "estimated the $400,000 could help Kean's campaign increase his television presence by about 25 to 30 percent. It will also narrow Menendez's financial advantage. Newly filed finance reports show that Menendez had $5.5 million and Kean $3.2 million in their campaign accounts at the end of September."

Steele Accuses Hoyer Of Racial Insensitivity. The Washington Post (10/18, B2, Marimow, 748K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "accused a leading Democratic congressman yesterday of racial insensitivity for saying the Republican candidate has 'slavishly' followed the GOP." Steele "was reacting to remarks by House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, who characterized Steele this week as having had 'a career of slavishly supporting the Republican Party.'" After "speaking to members of the Maryland Chamber of Commerce gathered in Ocean City, Steele called the description 'the height of arrogance.'" Steele said, "It goes to just the sheer craziness of some in the Democratic Party who think they can use racist terms and infer things about me just because I'm an African American Republican."

Former Boxing Champ Tyson Heartily Endorses Steele. The Washington Post (10/18, B2, Mosk, 748K) reports former heavyweight boxing champ Mike Tyson "says he is so bullish on Republican Michael S. Steele's campaign for the U.S. Senate, he would return to the ring if Steele thought it might help him." Tyson said, "I would do anything to help Michael. I would box an exhibition for him. I would even fight again to help Mike. I would do anything." The Post adds, "Iron Mike's little-known but long-standing devotion to Steele dates to the boxer's former marriage to Steele's half-sister, Monica Turner."

Lieberman Says Democrats Must "Change The Tone" In Washington. The AP (10/18, Christoffersen) reports Sen. Joe Lieberman "said Tuesday he hoped Democrats seize control of Congress — with one caveat: a Democratic-led Congress, he said, must change its ways." Lieberman said, "It won't represent progress that's real. It's not going to be much of a step forward if there's a new Democratic leadership that doesn't change the tone in Washington." The AP adds that as "recently as Friday, Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat who was his party's nominee for vice president in 2000, would not say whether he thinks the nation would be better off with the Democrats in control of Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0082520

Obama Reportedly Mulling Presidential Run In 2008. The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Zuckman, 623K) reports while Sen. Barack Obama "launches the most public of book tours, with appearances on 'Oprah Winfrey,' the 'Today' show, 'Larry King Live' and 'Meet the Press,' he also is more intensively examining whether to run for president in 2008, reaching out to Democratic operatives and trying to reconcile the demands of a national campaign on his family." Obama (D-Ill.) has been "having quiet conversations with colleagues and friends about a prospective White House run, but a key concern is whether his wife, Michelle, would support it and whether he could manage the time away from their two young daughters." Donna Brazile said, "He has gotten the presidential bug bite. Barack is constantly calling, he's constantly talking to people. He's not calling me to check on the weather. I'm not saying he's in, but he's checking the water. He's having lots of conversations."

Laura Bush To Stump For GOP Texas State Senate Candidate. In its "The Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (10/18, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports, "GOP first-time candidate Dee Margo is running an uphill race against a longtime incumbent to represent heavily Democratic El Paso in the Texas Senate. So how'd he get the most popular Republican campaigner in the nation to stump for him? Easy: Laura Bush is good pals with his wife. Gallery owner Adair Wakefield Margo and the first lady first clicked years ago when Adair wrote a book about El Paso painter Tom Lea, whose 'Rio Grande' now hangs in the Oval Office. Laura and Adair traveled to Mexico to scope out artists' studios. The Margos raised big bucks for Dubya 's campaigns, and Adair now serves as chair of the President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities. Tomorrow, the first lady visits El Paso to speak at a private campaign luncheon for Dee."

Dowd Accuses McCain Of "Dissembling" About Drinking Incident With Clinton. Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) that Sen. Hillary Clinton "always struck me as the sort of buttoned-up and driven woman who would be really fun if you could get her out for a night of dulces de leche in Cuba, as Marlon Brando did Jean Simmons in 'Guys and Dolls.'" Dowd adds, "Anne Kornblut wrote that two summers ago, on a Congressional trip to Estonia with Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins, Senator Clinton astonished her traveling companions by suggesting that the group do what one does in the Baltics: hold a vodka-drinking contest. … But a few days after the anecdote appeared, Mr. McCain flatly denied it on Fox News as 'Not true.'" … Joshua Green, reporting the cover profile of Hillary for the latest issue of The Atlantic Monthly, was rebuffed when he asked for an interview with Mr. McCain about the night Hillary poured shots for fellow lawmakers. But Mr. Green ran into Mr. McCain walking through the Capitol and asked him about the Baltics escapade. 'McCain lit up at the recollection,' he wrote. 'It's been 50 years since I'd been in a drinking game,' said McCain. ... He added, admiringly, 'She can really hold her liquor.'" Dowd adds, "The once candid senator is starting to sound downright Clintonian with all this silly parsing and dissembling. I did not have drinks with that woman!"

WSJournal Says Organized Labor Is Behind Anti-Wal-Mart Campaign. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (10/18, A20, 2.03M) says Wal-Mart "has become the Democratic Party's favorite pinata. The media like to portray this as a populist uprising against heartless big business. But what they don't bother to disclose is that this entire get-Wal-Mart campaign is a political operation led and funded by organized labor." The Journal adds, "If Wal-Mart were suddenly unionized, Big Labor's membership would double overnight and union leaders would collect an estimated $300 million in additional dues each year to sway more politicians. Short of that, their goal is to keep Wal-Mart out of cities so their union shops have less competition. That's what the war against Wal-Mart is truly about."

NYTimes Praises Disney Effort To Promote Healthy Food Choices To Kids. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "With obesity rates soaring among the young, the Walt Disney Company has announced promising new guidelines for the way it promotes food to its impressionable clientele. Over the next two years, the company that brought you Buzz Lightyear and Goofy and the Lion King plans to make sure that its animated characters endorse healthier children's foods with less fat and sugar and fewer calories." The Times adds that "the Bush administration and Congress seem content to keep studying the problem. … It's heartening that a few [corporations], mainly Kraft and now Disney, recognize that we can't wait forever for Congress to act, and are actually doing something now."

Rice Heads To Asia Amid Talk Of Possible Second North Korean Test. CNN's The Situation Room (10/17, Malveaux) reported, "Bush Administration officials and US spy satellites keeping a very close eye on North Korea's nuclear testing site where there has been some activity." The thinking "at the White House, is if they were to conduct a second test…this would actually embolden the Bush Administration's argument that North Korea's neighbors have to get tough." The AP (10/17, Lim) reports satellite images confirm North Korea "appears to be getting ready for a second nuclear test," even as China, "the North's longtime ally and biggest trading partner, warned Pyongyang not to aggravate tensions." The Financial Times (10/18, Fifield, McGregor, Sevastopulo) reports South Korea said it had "detected activity" suggesting a second test may be in the works.

DOJ_NMG_0082521

The Los Angeles Times (10/18, Miller, 918K) reports the White House "did not rule out the possibility of a second test. 'Let me put it this way: The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative,' White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said." The Washington Times (10/18, Gertz, 88K) quotes Secretary Rumsfeld, who "told reporters that there is 'speculation,' but no specific information," about an impending test. Rumsfeld said, "There's speculation that they may want to do something additional. There's also speculation they may not. So, only time will tell."

The North Korean nuclear standoff continues to receive heavy coverage, leading two network newscasts and receiving just over eight minutes of coverage between the three. CBS Evening News (10/17, lead story, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) said Secretary Rice "is heading to Asia tonight to put some new pressure on North Korea's neighbors to enforce those UN sanctions, and…she's getting there none too soon." CBS (Martin) added, "As North Korea staged a spectacular torch light show of defiance with what it called a 'Down With Imperialism' rally, its officials publicly denounced economic sanctions passed by the UN as a declaration of war. Privately, they put out the word that they intend to conduct three more underground nuclear tests and nothing can stop them. But they could be saying that just to make anything less than three look like a concession."

NBC Nightly News (10/17, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) focused on US diplomacy with China, saying the US "finds itself yet again in a strange and uneasy partnership half way around the world." The North "is threatening to do it again, blow off another nuclear weapon if not several more. China and the United States find themselves on the same side in this. They both have limited options and they know it." NBC (Mitchell) added, "China today threatened to stop providing critical fuel and food to the north, if it didn't stop testing."

ABC World News (10/17, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) did not lead with the story, even though correspondent Diane Sawyer was "the only Western reporter now allowed inside" North Korea. Reporting from Pyongyang, Sawyer said, "Tonight, there is a 100,000-person rally taking place. … It's something that's been planned for months and months and months. It is the anniversary of the socialist revolution. At the same time, it is an opportunity and not lost on anyone, to denounce the United States, once again."

The Chicago Tribune (10/18, Dorning, 623K) reports Secretary Rice will seek commitments from North Korea's neighbors for a "sweeping inspections program to monitor almost all cargo shipped to or from" the North. USA Today (10/18, Slavin, 2.27M) says the Bush Administration plan to "argue for a strict interpretation" of the UN sanctions "could further raise tensions in the region."

The New York Times (10/18, Shanker, 1.21M) says that while Rice will urge northeast Asian states "to create a strict system of radiation monitoring and inspection," in what "appears to be an effort to cajole China to enforce" the new UN sanctions, the US "will ask the countries to focus their efforts on conducting inspections in their own territories, including ports, and on suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft rather than every piece of cargo." The Wall Street Journal (10/18, A8, King, 2.03M) reports Rice "sought to allay concerns that the U.S. envisioned a sort of blockade, saying that ship interdictions would largely come about as the result of tips. 'We are not looking at inspecting every ship,' she said." McClatchy (10/18, Strobel, Johnson) also reports on Rice's goals.

The AP (10/17, Gearan), meanwhile, reports Secretary Rice said en route to Asia that the North's test "could set off an atomic arms race in Asia." Rice said, "Obviously an event of this kind does carry with it the potential for instability in the relationships that now exist in the region. That's why it's extremely important to go out and to affirm, and affirm strongly, U.S. defense commitments to Japan and to South Korea."

Kerry Calls Bush North Korea Policy "A Disgrace." The Des Moines Register (10/18, 163K) reports Sen. John Kerry, in Iowa, said the North Korean "crisis is of the Bush administration's own making." In an interview, Kerry said, "The Bush policy is a disgrace. If Ronald Reagan could talk to the evil empire and negotiate with the Soviets, surely George Bush could do the same with North Korea. But he's a prisoner of rigid ideology."

High-Level Defector Says Only Kim's Ouster Would End Nuclear Aims. The AP (10/17, Kim) reports Hwang Jang Yop, the "highest-ranking North Korean government official ever to defect" to the South and "the man once considered the mentor" of Kim Jong Il, said Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program cannot be stopped unless Kim is removed from power. But he said Kim's "total grip on the communist society makes that only a remote possibility." Hwang "is also skeptical" that UN sanctions will hurt Kim.

American "Unrepentant" About Defecting To North Korea. The Washington Times (10/18, Salmon, 88K) runs a feature on James "Comrade Joe" Dresnok, the "last living American defector in North Korea," who tells his story in the film "Crossing the Line." Dresnok, "unrepentant and professing support for communism," says, "I have never regretted coming to [North Korea]. I feel at home."

Envoy Rejects Linkage Of Iran's Nuclear Program With North Korea's. In a letter to the editor of the Washington Times (10/18, 88K), responding to the October 11 editorial "North Korea and Iran," M.A. Mohammadi, press secretary for the Iranian mission to the UN, writes that Iran "strongly rejects any comparison of Iran's nuclear program with other countries'. Iran's nuclear program is legal, fully within the framework of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, peaceful and transparent."

DOJ_NMG_0082522

Bush Boosts Croatia Bid For NATO Membership. The AP (10/18) reports, "President Bush gave a boost Tuesday to Croatia's aspirations to join NATO, saying it should be admitted to the Western alliance within two years." Bush "said he would recommend the 2008 timetable when he attends a NATO summit next month in Riga, Latvia. He also said he supports Croatia's membership in the European Union." The President "expressed his views during an Oval Office meeting with Croatian Prime Minister Ivo Sanader."

Abbas Threatens To Dissolve Hamas Government. The New York Times (10/18, Myre, 1.21M) reports that in "the clearest signal yet that he was prepared to act against the Hamas government," Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas "warned Tuesday that the current Palestinian political crisis was intolerable, and suggested he would dismiss the Hamas-led government if the rival factions could not agree soon on a national unity government." While "Abbas said he still sought a national unity government" between Hamas and Fatah, he added "that if no agreement was reached soon he might dismiss the government and replace it, at least temporarily, with technocrats," which he called, "the simplest and most practical solution." Abbas "set no deadlines for a decision. But there has been speculation that he may be prepared to act soon after the Muslim holy month of Ramadan." However, "Hamas could resist such a move, and the Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, is somewhat vague on how to resolve political disputes."

Hamas Official Critiques Palestinian Violence. In an article focusing on clashes between the Israeli military and Palestinians, the Washington Post (10/18, A16, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Ghazi Hamad, a senior Hamas official, published his second critique of Palestinian society in two months. In a column for the daily newspaper al-Ayyam. Hamad, a senior adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, asked if violence had become 'a Palestinian disease,'" and "whether violence had become 'a culture implanted in our bodies and our flesh,' adding that it 'has taken away the language of brotherhood and replaced it with arms.'"

Blair Calls Veils A "Mark Of Separation." The New York Times (10/18, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair joined a passionate and increasingly contentious debate on Tuesday over the full-face veils worn by some British Muslim women, calling it a 'mark of separation,'" marking "the first time Mr. Blair had so explicitly backed Jack Straw" for his comments about veils. Blair's "remarks reflected a sense that British society is heading toward ever deeper fissures between Muslims and non-Muslims, evoking questions about the nation's readiness to embrace Muslims, and Muslims' willingness to adapt." Meanwhile, "there are signs that the dispute had spread farther across Europe. In an interview in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi was quoted Tuesday as saying that women should not be hidden behind veils."

Stalemate Continues Between Venezuela And Guatemala In Bid For Security Council Seat. The New York Times (10/18, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year lagged Tuesday for a second straight day, but Guatemala, the persistent leader after 22 ballots, was unable to win enough votes to secure the position." This "setback was particularly stinging for Venezuela," as its president, Hugo Chávez, "has made the contest a centerpiece of his continuing campaign against Washington, financing it liberally with oil proceeds, promoting it with personal appearances around the world and frequently predicting that Venezuela would prevail." Diplomats suggested "that it might be time for the Latin American group to switch to a compromise candidate. But neither country was prepared to step aside." Gert Rosenthal, the foreign minister of Guatemala, said, "under normal circumstances our competitor would stand down graciously… but for reasons well known, he's not willing to do that." Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said, "Why doesn't Bolton come to this microphone and declare that the United States will remove the pressure, will withdraw the money, and then countries will have the liberty to vote their conscience." Ambassador Bolton responded, "Look, we have made our position clear in a very low key way. It is motivated by our concern for Venezuela's behavior, and that's another example of it." He added, "You can draw one conclusion from the results…Venezuela is not going to win."

The Washington Post (10/18, Lynch, Forero, Brubaker, 748K) says, "Venezuela was stymied for a second straight day," which a "shocked" the delegates at the United Nations who "once predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat." The votes "represented a personal blow to Chavez," and "has come as a relief to the United States." Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga, said "the race was 'perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela.'" According to some delegates, Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol." However,

DOJ_NMG_0082523

"Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and 'swayed' others to vote against it." Meanwhile, Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election, said "the government's failure to secure a seat was called 'an embarrassing defeat.'"

The Financial Times (10/18) reports, "The impasse has prompted other Latin American countries to suggest regional talks on a way to avoid a recurrence of divisions that afflicted the region at the height of the cold war."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/18, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "In the war of Hugo Chávez versus George W. Bush, Venezuela versus the United States, and anti- Americanism versus American leadership, the latest battle is...a draw." The AP (10/18, Wadhams) and McClatchy (10/18, Bachelet), among other sources, also reports the story.

Increasing French Fertility Rates Linked To Government Spending. The Washington Post (10/18, A1, Moore, 748K) reports, "While falling birthrates threaten to undermine economies and social stability across much of an aging Europe, French fertility rates are increasing." France "now has the second-highest fertility rate in Europe -- 1.94 children born per woman, exceeded slightly by Ireland's rate of 1.99. The US fertility rate is 2.01 children." The Post adds that "the propensity of women here to have more babies has little to do with notions of French romance or the population's formerly strong religious ties to the Roman Catholic Church. France heavily subsidizes children and families from pregnancy to young adulthood with liberal maternity leaves and part-time work laws for women. The government also covers some child-care costs of toddlers up to 3 years old and offers free child-care centers from age 3 to kindergarten, in addition to tax breaks and discounts on transportation, cultural events and shopping."

NYTimes Urges UN Rights Monitors For Sri Lanka. The New York Times (10/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "On Monday, 94 people died and 150 were injured when a truck loaded with explosives rammed into a military convoy in Sri Lanka. The government blames the Tamil Tiger guerrillas -- the pioneers of the suicide bombing -- for the attack. The rebels have not said anything." The Times adds, "Colombo is eager for international aid and support in its fight against the Tamil Tigers. With UN rights monitors bearing witness, the government may feel pressure to rein in army and police abuses. Monitors could also bolster the country's weak judicial system, which barely investigates crimes against Tamil civilians. The guerrillas, who count the forced recruitment of child soldiers among their crimes, are less vulnerable to international shame. But shining a spotlight might help persuade overseas Tamils to choke off funding."

WSJournal Warns Investors China Bank IPO May Not Be As Safe As Expected. The Wall Street Journal (10/18, 2.03M) editorializes, "Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, meet" Industrial Commercial Bank of China. China's largest bank "joins the ranks of publicly listed companies next week when it unveils what may be the world's largest-ever IPO in Hong Kong and Shanghai. But as with America's mortgage behemoths, investors are betting as much on implicit government support as on ICBC itself." That's because "the comparison with the two U.S. 'government-sponsored' mortgage giants is startling. Investors comforted by implicit American taxpayer support have had to endure several years of uncertainty and lower returns as fraud and false accounting have been uncovered at Fannie and Freddie. Perhaps that's a warning for ICBC investors."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Signs Tough Rules On Detainees."
"The Road From Ruin."
"In Car No. 9, She's 16 Trying To Go 70."
"Some Seek 'Pink Purge' In The GOP."
"Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits."
"No Counting On The Identity Of 300 Millionth Resident."

USA Today:
"More Benefits Than Risks In Higher Fish Consumption."
"New Rx Help People To Avoid Getting Sick."
"Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works."
"Screening."
"Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists."

New York Times:
"Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police."
"$5.4 Billion Bid Wins Complexes In New York Deal."
"Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case."
"Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million."
"Not Coming Soon To A Lot Near You: Chinese Cars."
"A Republican With Unfortunate Timing Believes His Time Is Now."
"Geriatrics Lags In Age Of High-Tech Medicine."
"Glorious Food? English Schoolchildren Think Not."

Washington Post:
"Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare."
"53% of Voters Say They Back Va. Gay Marriage Ban."
"U.S. Faces Guantanamo Obstacles."
"Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe."

DOJ_NMG_0082524

"In-Flight Fires An Unresolved Safety Threat."
"FDA Is Set To Approve Milk, Meat From Clones."

Washington Times:
"Border-Fence Bill Awaits Signing."
"Rove Foresees GOP Victory."
"U.S., Allie Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang."
"U.S. Rules May Hit Caribbean."
"Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year."

Detroit Free Press:
"Civil Rights Proposal Has Voters Conflicted."
"Behind The Scenes At Comerica Park."
"Inventory Glut Could Raise Chrysler's Losses."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"State Backtracks On Voter ID Alert."
"DeKalb Housing Chief Is Removed."
"What's Next For U.S. Population?"
"Ex-UGA Coach Wanted Athlete To Dump Major."
"Judge Erases Conviction Of Enron Founder."

Houston Chronicle:
"Judge Voids Convictions Against Lay."
"Romance Novel Fuels Passionate Debate."
"Houston's WNBA Dynasty Up For Sale."
"Melee Could Put The Hurt On Houston's Music Scene."
"CSI: Baghdad – No TV, This Is Gruesomely Real."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: 300 Million Population Mark; Americans Having Babies; Inside North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian violence; Detainee Bill Signed; Reid Under Fire; Improved Care; Subway train Accident-Rome; Safe To Eat Fish; Cars Parking Themselves.
CBS: North Korean-Sanctions; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Detainee Bill Signed; Midterm Elections; Ohio Senate Race; Foley Investigation; New Diabetes Drug Approved; Eating Fish; Dangerous Medicines; 300 Million Population Mark; Mayor Lou Bartletta Opinion-Immigration; Christopher Glenn Obit; Mentors For Kids.
NBC: North Korea Sanctions; Detainee Bill Signed; Stock Market; Inflation; Eating Fish; 300 Million Population Mark; New Jersey Senate Race; Madonna's Baby Adoption; Christopher Glenn Obit; Green Roofs.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Military Commissions Legislation; Rice-Asia Trip; CA-Hispanic Voter Suppression Effort.
CBS: Glen Obit.; Iraq-US KIA; North Korea-Nuclear Test; Rice-Asia Trip; MLB Playoffs.
NPR: Bush-Military Commissions Legislation; NY-Snowstorm Cleanup; Top Ten Fuel Efficient Cars List; Oil Prices; UN-Eritrea, Ethiopia Negotiations; US-Burundi Civil War Refugees; Lay Conviction Voided.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a luncheon with community leaders, Greensboro, NC; participates in Visit to Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Greensboro, North Carolina; makes remarks on No Child Left Behind, Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Greensboro, North Carolina; visits Victory Junction Gang Camp, Inc. Randleman, NC; attends a Republican National Committee Dinner, Private Residence, Greensboro, North Carolina.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Visits the Jenna Welch and Laura Bush Community Library, El Paso; speaks at a Dee Margo for Texas Senate luncheon, Private residence, El Paso; visits the Ben Franklin: In Search of a Better World exhibition, Houston Museum of Natural Science.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER IVO SANADER OF CROATIA _ Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Speaks at the Nitze School of Advanced International Studies. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. Contact: Felisa Neuringer Klubes, 202-663-5626. Note: Preset by 7:45 a.m. Media RSVP required.

NUCLEAR FUELS _ The National Academies holds a conference on the internationalization of the civil nuclear fuel cycle. Location: 2100 C St. NW.

GENERIC DRUGS _ The Generic Pharmaceutical Association holds its Fall Technical Conference. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Steven Galson, Director, FDA Center for Drug Evaluation and Research. Location: Bethesda North Hotel and Conference Center, 5701 Marinelli Rd., North Bethesda.

HEALTHCARE TECHNOLOGY _ The National Institute of Standards and Technlology holds a summit to focus on healthcare technology. Highlights: 9 a.m. Keynote addresses - HHS Secretary Leavitt and Intel Board Chairman Craig Barrett. Location: Red Auditorium, NIST, Gaithersburg.

COMMON GOOD _ 8:15 a.m. - 12 p.m. the Center for American Progress will hold a half-day conference on the common good, with an opening address by Queen Noor of Jordan. A keynote address will be given by former President William J. Clinton. Location: Georgetown University, Gaston Hall, 37th and O Streets NW.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY PROTECTION _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The Washington Embassy Network meets to discuss consideration of recent events at the World Intellectual Property Organization General Assembly, held from Sept. 20 through Oct. 5 in Geneva, Switzerland.

DOJ_NMG_0082525

Location: Commerce Department, 1401 Constitution Ave. NW.

BROWN REPORT-EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. Tom Loveless, director of the Brookings Brown Center on Education Policy and author of the 2006 Brown Center Report on American Education, holds a news briefing to release the report, which evaluates the role that student happiness and confidence play in achievement, and examines whether states are artificially inflating the number of students meeting proficiency standards mandated by the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) Act of 2001. Location: The Brookings Institution, Saul and Zilkha Rooms-First Floor, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. The Pew Center on Global Climate Change holds a news briefing to release a detailed ``how to guide" to help corporate decision makers navigate global markets that are rapidly changing in response to climate change. Location: National Press Club.

EUROPE-HEALTH CARE _ 10 a.m. Four health policy experts who live under various European health systems discuss the various systems. Participants include Alphonse Crespo, M.D., Institut Constant de Rebecque; Helen Disney, Stockholm Network; Johan Hjertqvist, Health Consumer Powerhouse; and Stephen Pollard, Centre for the New Europe. Location: Room 216, Hart.

GULF SECURITY _ 10 a.m. The International Institute for Strategic Studies holds a briefing by senior fellow Mamoun Fady on ``The Shia Question and Gulf Security." Location: Suite 300, 1850 K St. NW.

IRAQ-CHRISTIANS _ 10 a.m. The Iraq Sustainable Democracy Project holds a news conference with former Iraqi Minister Pascale Warde about developments in her nation regarding Assyrian Christians. Location: National Press Club.

PENTAGON-AFGHANISTAN _ 10 a.m. US Army Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, will brief live from Afghanistan with an update on U.S. reconstruction operations in Afghanistan. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

CONTRIBUTIONS-CONGRESS _ 10:30 a.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to release a report on how much money members of Congress have received from special interest sources. Notes: This event originally was scheduled for Tuesday, Oct. 17. Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

DARFUR _ 11 a.m. Progressive and Conservative evangelical leaders hold a telephone briefing on the situation in Darfur. Participants include Jim Wallis of Sojourners/Call to Renewal, Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, Ted Haggard of the National Association of Evangelicals, others. Contacts: Jack Pannell, 202-745-4614. Notes: Callin number: 800-903-0258; passcode: Darfur.

VETERANS DAY _ 11:30 a.m. The Veterans Affairs Department, veterans organization, hold a news conference to announce a new initiative to honor veterans, with VA Secretary Nicholson, veterans group leaders. Location: Room 230, 810 Vermont Ave. NW.

TRADE-DOHA ROUND _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The United Nations Development Programme hosts a Washington Roundtable on ``Trade on Human Terms: Revisiting the Development Agenda of the Doha Round." The luncheon will be co-sponsored by UNDPs Washington Office and the Trade, Equity and Development Project of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Panelists will be Hafiz Pasha, Assistant Secretary-General of the UN and Director of UNDPs Bureau for Asia and the Pacific; Sandra Polaski, Director of the Carnegie Endowments Trade, Equity and Development Project; and David Walters, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative for Economic Affairs. David Yang, Senior Advisor in UNDPs Washington Office, will moderate the panel. Location: Root Room of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MIDTERM ELECTIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a luncheon with Reps. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., National Republican Congressional Committee chairman; and Rahm Emmanuel, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, who will discuss the midterm elections. Location: National Press Club.

GUANTANAMO-TORTURE _ 1 p.m. The Institute for Policy Studies holds a discussion and press briefing on the implications of torture at Guantanamo Bay, with activist Vanessa Redgrave, torture survivor Maher Arar (via phone) and Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights. Location: Suite 600, 1112 16th St. NW.

ELECTION-EXPECTATIONS _ 1:30 p.m. A bipartisan group of former secretaries of state and elections experts hold a conference call briefing on what voters can expect at the polls this November. Participants include Miles Rapoport, former Secretary of State, D-Conn.; Rev. DeForest Soaries, former Secretary of State, R-N.J. and former Chair, U.S. Election Assistance Commission; Ray Martinez, Pew Center on the States; Tova Wang, The Century Foundation. Notes: Callin number: 888-858-4723; passcode: 7996462.

EGIL KROGH _ 2 p.m. Egil Krogh, former deputy counsel for President Richard Nixon and former White House ``plumber," will discuss ``The Importance of Ethics and Integritry" at a National Press Club newsmaker event. Location: National Press Club.

IMMIGRANT REMITTANCES-LATAM _ 2:45 p.m. The Inter-American Development Bank holds a news conference to release new state-by-state estimates of the volumes of money sent by immigrants in the United States to their countries of origin in Latin America. Location: IDB's Enrique V. Iglesias Conference Center, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

TRADE-FAST TRACK _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace hosts a discussion, ``Congress Takes on Fast Track: Congressional Leaders

DOJ_NMG_0082526

Discuss Fast Track Authority," on the renewal of fast track trade negotiating authority. Panelists include current and former Congressional members and staff who will give an insiders perspective on the circumstances that led to the renewal of ``fast track negotiations in 1991 and 1993, and whether those circumstances hold lessons for today. Highlights: Panel 2: Tim Reif, Minority Trade Counsel on the Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee; Mike Castellano, Counsel and Senior Policy Adviser in the Office of Minority Leader Harry Reid and former Trade Counsel on the Trade Subcommittee; Grant Aldonas, former Chief Trade Counsels of the Senate Finance Committee; and Marcia Miller, former Chief Trade Counsels of the Senate Finance Committee. Panel 1: Bill Frenzel, former Member of the House Ways and Means Committee; Tom Downey, former Member of the House Ways and Means Committee; Bob Packwood, former Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

LAW ENFORCEMENT-CLINTON _ 5 p.m. The National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund presents an award to former President Clinton for his contributions to the law enforcement profession and community. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, October 18, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, October 18, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061018.pdf; dojclips061018.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bill Signing Clears Way For Trials Of Terror Suspects (USAT) 4
Bush Signs Detainee Legislation (LAT) 5
Bush Signs New Rules To Prosecute Terror Suspects (NYT) .6
Bush Signs Bill On Terror Prosecution (AP) 7
Bush Signs Rules For Terror War (WT) 9
Bush Signs Terrorism Measure (WP) 10
Law's Reach Extends To Jails In U.S. (LAT) 11
Bush Signs Bill On Detainee Interrogation (MCT) 12
Bush Signs Law Creating Tribunals For Terror Suspects (Update3) (BLOOM) 14
Prosecutors Want To Question Reid (USAT/AP) 15

Homeland Response:

GAO Calls Radiation Monitors Unreliable (WP) 15
Suit Seeks Data On Immigration Profiling Of Arabs (NYT) 16
Arab-American Group Files Suit Against Homeland Security Over Alleged Profiling (FINDLAW/AP) 17
Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works (USAT) 18
We Don't Need Our Own MI5 (WP) 19
Many Ground Zero Workers Gain Chance At Lawsuits (NYT) 20

War News:

Commander: Mistakes Made In Afghanistan (AP-Y) 21
British General Faults U.S. For Taliban Resurgence (WT) 22
British Troops Withdraw From Afghan Area (NYT/AP) 22
US Presses Iraq On Amnesty Issue (FT) 23
Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police (NYT) 24
U.S. Must Win War, McCain Says On Visit (MJS) 26
Kerry: Bush Assurances On Iraq A Blunder (AP) 26
Troops Try To Curb Warfare North Of Baghdad (LAT) 27
U.S. Forces In Balad To Help Stem Carnage (USAT/AP) 28
U.S. Forces Move To Quell Sectarian Violence In Balad (MCT) 29
Tense Reprieve As Iraqi Forces Seal River Town (WP) 30
U.S. Forces Patrol Balad After Violence (AP) 31
Training Regimen Problems Afflict U.S. Army Program To Advise Iraqis (WSJ) 33
655,000 War Dead? (WSJ) 36
Barney And Baghdad (NYT) 37
Military Honors For A Changing Front (WP) 38
Farewell On A Dark Tarmac (WP) 39
Somalia Simmers (WP) 41

DOJ:

Harry Jaffe: D.C.'s New Top Lawman Is A Stranger To Our Streets (WASHEX) 41
7 Departments Miss Senator's Deadline To List High-cost IT Projects (FEDTIMES) 42
Justice Task Force Looks Into Privacy (FCW) 43

Corporate Scandals:

Trial Judge Vacates Conviction Of Late Enron Founder Lay (USAT) 44
Conviction Of Enron's Lay Is Vacated By Judge (WSJ) 44
Judge Throws Out Kenneth Lay's Conviction (NYT) 45
Judge Revokes Lay's Conviction (WP) 45
JUDGE VOIDS CONVICTIONS AGAINST LAY (HC) 47
Enron Founder's Conviction Vacated (AP) 48
Judge Vacates Ken Lay's Enron Conviction (UPI) 49
McGuire's Option Deals Could Lead To Criminal Charges (MINNST) 49
UnitedHealth To Pay Departing CEO $5.1M A Year For Life; Value Of Options Hoard Unknown (FINDLAW/AP) 50
How UnitedHealth Spotlights Gap In Reform (WSJ) 51
UnitedHealth's Options Scandal Shows Familiar Symptoms (WP) 52
Guidelines Set For How To Audit Stock Options (WSJ) 54
If The Price Is Right (NYT) 55

Criminal Law:

House Page Program Leaders Discuss Trip (AP-Y) 56

Religious Right Finds GOP's 'Big Tent' May Be Too Roomy (LAT) 57
Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case (NYT) 58
Biz Groups Want Their Money Back (HILL) 61
Foley Set To Name Abuser (NYT/AP) 62
Seeking Post-Foley Unity (HILL) 62
Foley Scandal Turns Parents Into Web Sleuths (WSJ) 64
Cunningham Said To Help Two Contractors (AP-Y) 65
Bribes Cost Millions In Earmarks (WT) 67
Report Spells Out Abuses By Former Congressman (NYT) ... 67
Report: Staff Caved To 'Duke' (HILL) 69
Many In Government Helped Cunningham Or Yielded, Panel Finds (WP) 70
Republican Weldon Blasts 'liberal Attack Machine' For Publicity (AP) 72
Investigation Is Just Politics, Lawmaker Says (NYT) 73
Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Part Of Probe (WP) 73
Weldon's Itera Ties Long Known (HILL) 75
The Odor From Capitol Hill (NYT) 76
Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million (NYT) 77
Labor Leader Arrested For Racketeering (AP) 78
McLaughlin Pleads Innocent To U.S. Charges (NYS) 79
Dem Leader Charged (NSDY) 80
The Secret Life Of Labor King (NYDN) 82
St. Peters Mayor Likely To Plead Guilty (SLPD) 83
Ex-GBI Agent Sentenced In Kickback Deal (AJC) 83
Feds Charge Alleged Pa. Mob Boss With Trying To Kill Witness (NSDY) 84
Man Arrested On Child-porn Charges After Internet Sting (AP) 84
Grand Jury Indicts Capitol Intruder (HILL) 85
Noe Called Coin Funds An ATM, Ex-aide Says (COLDISP) .. 85
Coin Dealer's Ex-Ass't Speaks At Trial (AP) 86
Noe Considered The State's Rare-coin Fund 'an ATM,' One Of His Former Assistants Says (TOLB) 87
FBI Director Wants ISPs To Track Users (CNET) 88
FBI Chief Addresses Police Chiefs (BOS) 89
Ex-F.D.A. Chief Pleads Guilty In Stock Case (NYT) 89
UPDATE: Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (DOW) ... 90
Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (MRKTWTCH) 90
Ex-FDA Chief Strikes Plea Agreement In Stock Disclosure Case (FINDLAW/AP) 90
Trial That Could Out Feds Alleged To Have Bogus Degrees Delayed (GOVEXEC) 91
Man Pleads Guilty In 3 Idaho Slayings (FINDLAW/AP) 92
Ex-Stafford Man Admits Role In $10M. Stock Scam (ACP) 93
Crime In Florida Continues To Drop, Except Murder (AP) 93
U.S. Judge Again Rules Lethal Injection Procedure For Executions Is Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP) 94
U.S. Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Case (WSJ) 95
Man Is Convicted Of Two Counts Of Murder In L.I. Drunken Driving Case (NYT) 95
Williams Seeks $11 Million To Extend Anti-crime Package (WT) 96

Civil Law:

Agency FOIA Administration Found To Be Improving (GOVEXEC) 97
No Death Benefits For Studds's Spouse (WP) 98

Civil Rights:

California Letter Investigated For Warning To Immigrants (NYT) 99
Election Board Votes To Send New Letter To 305,000 Misinformed Voters (AP) 100
FBI Forwards Rylee Investigation To Justice Department (ADG) 101
Study Finds Race Disparity In Breast Cancer Mortality Rates (CHIT) 102
Chris Rock's Mom Claims Discrimination (AP) 103

Antitrust:

Feds OK Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Bid (AP) 104
Kucinich Questions Giant Eagle Purchase Of Ohio Stores (PPG) 105
Feds' Power To Renege On Immunity May Be Tested In U.S. Supreme Court (LAW) 105
Futures Giants To Merge (CHIT) 107
Chicago Derivatives Exchanges In $8bn Deal (FT) 109
Futures Shock Chicago Merc To Buy Board Of Trade (WSJ) 109
Chicago Exchanges Combine Thunder (WSJ) 113
2 Exchanges In Chicago Will Merge (NYT) 114
Exchanges Bank On Passing Antitrust Muster (CRAIN) 116
Tata Steel Offers $8 Billion For Corus (WSJ) 117
Lilly Sets Deal To Acquire Icos For About $2.1 Billion (WSJ) 118
Vivendi's Universal Sues Two Web Sites Over Video Sharing (WSJ) 119
Record Labels Turn Piracy Into A Marketing Opportunity (WSJ) 119
Music Companies Sue 8,000 More In Anti-Sharing Fight (WP/AP) 121
Game Theories (WSJ) 122

DOJ_NMG_0082530

Environment:

Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules For Nuclear Plant Guards (WP)....123
Benefits Of Fish Exceed Risks, Studies Find (WP)....124

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Faults FBI Sentinel Staffing Process (FCW)....126
DISPENSARY DIRECTOR GRANTED RELEASE ON $1 MILLION BOND (BCNW)....127
Marijuana Club Director Released On Bail (SFC)....127
Drug Probe Nets Eighth Guilty Plea (SSJR)....128
Nevadans To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana (AP)....129
U.S. Official Says Rise In Afghan Opium Production Leading To Purer Heroin In Europe (AP)....130
Afghanistan's Opium Production Soaring 'out Of Control,' U.N. Agency Warns (AP)....131
Opium Production Down In Golden Triangle (UPI)....131
UN Drug Agency Reports Sharp Fall In Golden Triangle Opium Production (VOA)....132
Drugs Group In Afghan Exit Order (BBC)....132
Review: Prisoner Flights Are Expensive (AP-Y)....133
Audit Faults 'Con Air' On Safety (WT)....133
Activists' Passion Turns To Violence (SEAPI)....134

Immigration:

Border-fence Bill Awaits Signing (WT)....136
Smugglers Seen Getting 'Sophisticated, Organized' (WT)....138

Tax:

Feds Indict Actor Wesley Snipes For Tax Fraud (LAT)....139
Actor Snipes Faces Indictment On Tax Fraud Charges (USAT)....140
U.S. Indicts Actor Snipes In Tax-Avoidance Case (WSJ)....141
Wesley Snipes Is Indicted On 8 Counts Of Tax Fraud, Accused Of Seeking $12M In False Refunds (AP)....142

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs $532.8B Defense Spending Bill (AP-Y)....142
Law Caps Interest On 'payday Advances' To Servicemembers (USAT)....143
Bush Sets Defense As Space Priority (WP)....143
New U.S. Space Policy Emphasizes Security (LAT)....145
New Space Policy 'Sets Up' Intel Turf War (UPI)....145
Sealed Filings Increase At High Court (LAW)....146
Bush Triad Visit On Tap (WXII)....148
Bush To Visit N.C., Shotwell To Attend (REIDRVW NC)....148
Liking Math Subtracts From Scores, Study Finds (AP)....149
Enjoying Math Not Always A Plus (USAT)....149
For Math Students, Self-Esteem Might Not Equal High Scores (WP)....150
Reid Faces FEC Complaint (HILL)....151
Legal Fees Are Drain On Lewis' War Chest (LAT)....152
Textile Makers Tap Political Opportunity (WSJ)....153

Other News:

Wholesale Prices Fell Last Month (USAT)....154
Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist (NYT)....155
Data Revive Fears Of US Hard Landing (FT)....156
Output, Pricing Data Indicate A Cooling Economy (WSJ)....156
Dow Industrials Retreat In Their 12000 Quest (WSJ)....157
Elder Bush Calls Economy Strong But Consumers Unsure (DMN)....158
Talk Of Raising Gas Tax Is Just That (WP)....158
Curing The World's Oil Addiction (LAT)....160
An Oil Habit America Cannot Break (WP)....160
Some Seeing Red Over Red-light Tickets (USAT)....162
Yes On All Judges (LAT)....162
Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year (WT/AP)....163
Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits (LAT)....164
Pirro: He's A Novice. Cuomo: She's Involved In A 2nd Investigati (NYT)....165
Elections May Leave Bush An Early Lame Duck (WP)....167
No Spoils For The Victors (NYT)....169
Which Way To Win? (WP)....170
What Democrats Would Do (WP)....171
Rove Foresees GOP Victory (WT)....172
Cheney Unsure Of GOP Control Of Congress (AP-Y)....173
There Goes The GOP Base — And Probably Both Houses (HILL)....174
Congressional Republicans Find Spending May Not Decide Races (WSJ)....175
Having Money Isn't Everything, But It Can Be Deciding Factor (HILL)....176
GOP Bright Spots Few In Senate Races (WT)....177
Funding Constrains Democrats (WP)....178
Congressman Says Earmarks Could Cost GOP Power (USAT)....179
Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists (USAT)....180
Dems Using Hourly Wage Issue Against GOP Rivals (USAT)180
GOP Shifts Back To A Basic Issue: Taxes (CSM)....182
Tax Questions Abound On Ballots Across Nation (WSJ)....183
Alarm Bells For G.O.P. In A Battleground State (NYT)....184
Republicans Put $700G In TV Ads In Ohio (AP-Y)....186

DOJ_NMG_0082531

Pro-Republican Ads Stretch The Truth On Iraq To Influence Elections (MCT) 187
Colo. Opens Probe On Beauprez Attack Ad (AP-Y) 188
Political Ad Draws A Criminal Inquiry (NYT/AP) 188
Virginia's Senate Race (WP) 189
Don't Call Him Redneck (WP) 189
Familiar Themes Dominate Senate Radio Debate (CCT) ..192
Different Approaches From Kean, Menendez (HILL) 193
Hoyer Remark 'Racist,' GOP's Steele Charges (WP) 195
Tyson Ready To Enter The Ring For Steele (WP) 196
Lieberman Urges Dems To Alter Their Ways (AP-Y) 197
Obama Kicks Off Book Tour, Weighs Presidential Bid (CHIT) 198
The Reliable Source (WP) 199
In Vodka Non Veritas (NYT) 200
The Wal-Mart Posse (WSJ) 201
A Treat Worthy Of Cinderella (NYT) 203
N. Korea Apparently Preparing Nuke Test (AP) 203
Seoul Warns Of Another N Korea Test (FT) 205
Hints Of Another N. Korea Test Seen (LAT) 206
U.S., Allies Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang (WT) 206
N. Korea Condemns Sanctions, Threatens 2nd Nuke Test (CHIT) 207
Rice To Push U.S. Allies To Inspect N. Korean Cargo (USAT) 208
Rice To Urge Radiation Inspections To Thwart North Korea (NYT) 209
U.S. Urges Vigilance On North Korea (WSJ) 211
Sanctions Against North Korea Must Be Firmly Enforced, Rice Says (MCT) 211
Rice Tries To Head Off Nuclear Arms Race (AP) 213
Kerry Blasts Bush Policy On North Korea (DMR) 214
Defector: Kim's Ouster Would Stop Nukes (AP) 215
U.S. Defector Ends Silence About Life In N. Korea (WT) 215
Letters To The Editor (WT) 217
Bush Supports Croatia Membership In NATO (AP) 217
Abbas Threatens To Dismiss Hamas Government (NYT) ...218
Israeli Forces Conducting Raids Kill Four Palestinians In West Bank (WP) 218
Blair Criticizes Veils As 'Mark Of Separation' (NYT) 219
Council Seat Still Undecided After 22 Ballots (NYT) 220
Venezuela Stymied Again In U.N. Vote (WP) 221
Un Seats Continues To Elude Chávez (FT) 222
In UN Political Drama, It's All About The US (CSM) 223
Guatemala Leads But Can't Land U.N. Seat (AP-Y) 224
Venezuela Trails In Early Voting For Seat On Security Council (MCT) 225
A Model Of Modern Vitality, France Devises A Baby Boom (WP) 226
Monitoring A Little-Noticed War (NYT) 228
Great China Bank Sale (WSJ) 229

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bill Signing Clears Way For Trials Of Terror Suspects (USAT)

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Some of the most notorious names in the war on terror are headed toward prosecution after President Bush signed a law Tuesday authorizing military trials of terrorism suspects.

Imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and awaiting trial are Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks; Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be 9/11 hijacker; and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaeda cells.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said in a White House ceremony.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the trial system set up by the administration was unconstitutional and required approval from Congress. The Justice Department had argued that trying prisoners in wartime has always been a constitutional power of a president.

After the ruling Bush pushed Congress to approve a system for military tribunals. He also insisted Congress authorize CIA agents to use tough methods to interrogate suspected terrorists that are not cruel or inhumane.

Bush said Tuesday the interrogations have yielded valuable information that has helped prevent terror attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0082532

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," he said.

Democrats, most of whom voted against the measure in the House and Senate, decried the law.

"We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history," Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin said. "It allows the government to seize individuals on American soil and detain them indefinitely with no opportunity to challenge their detention in court."

The new law — called the Military Commissions Act of 2006 — prohibits detainees from using federal courts to challenge the constitutionality of their confinement.

The American Civil Liberties Union called it "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history."

The legislation, which sets the rules for court proceedings, applies to those selected by the military for prosecution.

During campaign appearances around the country, Bush has criticized Democrats who voted against the law, suggesting they would not protect the country from another terrorist attack.

"With the distance of history, the questions will be narrowed and few: Did this generation of Americans take the threat seriously? And did we do what it takes to defeat that threat?"

Republican House leaders assailed the Democrats for seeking more legal rights for terror suspects who are not U.S. citizens.

"The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

The White House has not disclosed what interrogation techniques might be used. It has said that doing so would help the enemy resist those techniques. White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush would probably eventually issue an executive order that describes his interpretation of the standards but those documents are not usually made public.

CIA Director Mike Hayden sent a note to employees after the Bush signing saying it gives them "the legal clarity and legislative support necessary to continue a program that has been one of our country's most effective tools in the fight against terrorism."

"We can be confident that our program remains — as it always has been — fully compliant with U.S. law, the Constitution and our international treaty obligations."

Bush Signs Detainee Legislation (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed new legislation Tuesday providing for the detention and prosecution of terrorism suspects, and the Justice Department moved immediately to request the dismissal of dozens of lawsuits filed by detainees challenging their incarceration.

Bush signed the legislation in an elaborate East Room ceremony, calling it a "vital tool" in the administration's war on terrorism, while Republican Party officials immediately unleashed campaign broadsides, charging that the measure's Democratic critics advocate freeing terrorists.

The new law thus became both part of the administration's final campaign push to preserve its congressional majority in the midterm election and the beginning of a new chapter in fashioning a judicial process for those captured around the world in U.S. military and counterterrorism operations.

The law is bound to generate new and contentious legal challenges that likely will leave U.S. policies on detainees in an uncertain state. Beside the request that federal courts throw out detainees' lawsuits, judges also will be asked to decide new legal questions that again may end up before the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, human rights groups said it is far from clear how the new law will be implemented, and the CIA has asked Justice Department lawyers to review interrogation guidelines.

The legislation sets new ground rules for the CIA to conduct interrogations and allows for the prosecution of terror suspects before military tribunals. Bush said the measure enables the U.S. to bring to justice the coordinators of the Sept. 11 attacks and allows the CIA to continue an aggressive interrogation program that he said had disrupted additional terror strikes.

DOJ_NMG_0082533

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said, sitting at a table with a sign posted on the front that said "Protecting America." The president said he signed the new law "in memory of the victims" of Sept. 11.

He was surrounded by military officers, members of his Cabinet and lawmakers who helped pass the bill. Several dozen protesters chanted slogans outside in the rain branding the measure an affront to civil liberties.

The enactment of the law -- four months after the U.S. Supreme Court said that an earlier scheme for handling terror cases violated U.S. law -- was good news for Bush as casualties have mounted in Iraq and his handling of the war on terror has come under intensifying criticism.

The signing ceremony was part political rally for a GOP that is struggling to retain control of Congress three weeks before a pivotal midterm election. Republican leaders said the legislation showed that they were a party of strength and assailed Democrats for not supporting the measure.

"The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said.

The Justice Department moved swiftly to enforce one of the law's most controversial provisions. Within two hours of the signing ceremony, department lawyers notified the U.S. appeals court in Washington that the new law had been enacted, "eliminating federal court jurisdiction." The court is overseeing dozens of lawsuits filed on behalf of prisoners held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Lawyers for the detainees responded with their own filing Tuesday, requesting time to present legal arguments that the new law violated the U.S. Constitution. The appeals court took no immediate action.

The detainee's lawyers, who had won victories on behalf of their clients in two previous cases against the administration that went to the Supreme Court -- involving detainees Shafiq Rasul and Salim Ahmed Hamdan -- said they were confident they would prevail once again.

"We beat them in Rasul. We beat them in Hamdan. Now, they have tried to beat us in Congress. I don't think it will work," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York advocacy group that has represented a number of the detainees. "They have been slapped down twice. I think they will be slapped down again."

The administration has identified about two dozen suspects it plans to put on trial, including accused Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who, along with 13 other high-profile suspects, was recently transferred from CIA custody to Guantanamo Bay.

The rules do not affect the vast majority of the estimated 435 prisoners being held at the Cuban military prison. Unless the military decides to bring charges, most of the detainees will remain in legal limbo, without the opportunity to challenge their status, under the new law.

Bush said the new interrogation rules would allow the CIA to restart a program of tough questioning of terrorist suspects that ground to a halt more than a year ago, in the wake of a congressional debate over legislation banning the use of torture and questions about whether rough treatment of detainees would subject operatives to prosecution for war crimes.

A senior administration official said that the CIA has not yet finalized a list of interrogation tactics or procedures, but when it does, it will submit its new program to the Justice Department for a legal review, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the CIA effort. Once it gets the blessing of Justice, the program will be brought to Congress, the official said.

"The CIA will have to brief its program to an oversight committee," said the senior official. "This is the beginning of the conversation, not the end."

Bush Signs New Rules To Prosecute Terror Suspects (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082534

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — President Bush signed legislation Tuesday that creates new rules for prosecuting and interrogating terrorism suspects, a move Mr. Bush said would enable the Central Intelligence Agency to resume a once-secret program to question the most dangerous enemy operatives in the war on terror.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Mr. Bush said at a ceremony in the East Room of the White House.

He called the bill "a way to deliver justice to the terrorists we have captured."

But the C.I.A. program is unlikely to resume immediately, because the law authorizes Mr. Bush to issue an executive order clarifying the rules for questioning high-level detainees and the order has not been written. Many experts believe that the harsh techniques the C.I.A. has used, including extended sleep deprivation and water-boarding, which induces a feeling of drowning, will not be allowed.

With the midterm elections three weeks away, Mr. Bush hoped to use the bill signing to turn the political debate back to the war on terrorism, a winning issue for Republicans, and away from scandals like the Mark Foley case, which have dominated the news in recent weeks. The president said he was signing the measure "in memory of the victims of September the 11th."

The law sets up a system of military commissions for trying terrorism suspects that would allow evidence to be withheld from defendants in certain instances. It also strips the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear petitions from noncitizens for writs of habeas corpus, effectively preventing detainees from going to court to challenge their confinement.

More than 500 habeas suits are pending in federal court, and Justice Department officials said Tuesday that they would move swiftly to dismiss them under the new law. That will inevitably spark a challenge by civil liberties lawyers, who regard the habeas-stripping provision as unconstitutional, a view shared by many Democrats on Capitol Hill.

"Congress had no justification for suspending the writ of habeas corpus, a core value in American law, in order to avoid judicial review that prevents government abuse," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The bill signing drew protests outside the White House from human rights advocates, some dressed in orange jumpsuits of the sort worn by detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. They gathered around a black coffin painted with the words "the corpse of habeas corpus"; some were arrested after refusing to move away from the White House gates.

Joining the president at the bill signing were senior members of his war cabinet, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the C.I.A.. In an e-mail message to C.I.A. employees, General Hayden called the measure a "very public vote of confidence by Congress and the president in the skill and discipline of C.I.A.'s officers."

Leading Republican lawmakers, among them Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who balked at the initial White House version of the bill and forced a much-publicized compromise, were also on hand. But the third leader of that Republican rebellion, Senator John McCain of Arizona, was noticeably absent.

Mr. McCain, a likely presidential contender in 2008, skipped the ceremony to go to Wisconsin to campaign for a Republican House candidate, John Gard, and was later headed to Sioux Falls, S.D., to address the Chamber of Commerce. A spokeswoman said the senator's absence was "purely an issue of scheduling."

The bill was prompted by a Supreme Court ruling, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, that invalidated the system of military commissions Mr. Bush had set up for trying terrorism suspects, saying they required Congressional authorization. The court also required suspects to be treated in accordance with a provision of the Geneva Conventions, Common Article 3, which prohibits cruel and inhumane treatment, including "outrages upon personal dignity."

The ruling prompted Mr. Bush to acknowledge the existence of the secret C.I.A. program. Last month, he announced he was moving 14 high-level terrorism detainees out of C.I.A. custody and to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay. He called on Congress to pass a bill setting up military commissions and establishing new standards for interrogation so the C.I.A. program could go forward.

Bush Signs Bill On Terror Prosecution (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

DOJ_NMG_0082535

AP, October 17, 2006

Some of the most notorious names in the war on terror are headed toward prosecution after President Bush signed a law Tuesday authorizing military trials of terrorism suspects.

The legislation also eliminates some of the rights defendants are usually guaranteed under U.S. law, and it authorizes continued harsh interrogations of terror suspects.

Imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and awaiting trial are Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be 9/11 hijacker, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said in a White House ceremony.

The Pentagon expects to begin pre-trial motions early next year and to begin the actual trials in the summer.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that trying detainees in military tribunals violated U.S. and international law, so Bush urged Congress to change the law during a speech on Sept. 6 in the White House East Room attended by families of the Sept. 11, 2001, victims. He also insisted that the law authorize CIA agents to use tough — yet unspecified — methods to interrogate suspected terrorists.

Six weeks later, after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the bill, Bush signed the new law "in memory of the victims of September the 11th."

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said. "I have that privilege this morning."

Civil libertarians and leading Democrats decried the law as a violation of American values. The American Civil Liberties Union said it was "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history." Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin said, "We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history."

"It allows the government to seize individuals on American soil and detain them indefinitely with no opportunity to challenge their detention in court," Feingold said. "And the new law would permit an individual to be convicted on the basis of coerced testimony and even allow someone convicted under these rules to be put to death."

The legislation, which sets the rules for court proceedings, applies to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq. It does apply to 14 suspects who were secretly questioned by the CIA overseas and recently moved to the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay.

The swift implementation of the law is a rare bit of good news for Bush as casualties mount in Iraq in daily violence. Lawmakers are increasingly calling for a change of strategy, and political anxieties are jeopardizing Republican chances of hanging onto control of Congress.

Bush has been criticizing Democrats who voted against the law, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, during campaign appearances around the country. He has suggested that votes against the law show that Democrats would not protect the country from another terrorist attack.

Republican House leaders, in a tough battle to maintain their majority, echoed those criticisms Tuesday in an attempt to get some political points out of the legislation they supported. "The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

Bush noted that the law came amid dispute.

"Over the past few months, the debate over this bill has been heated, and the questions raised can seem complex," he said. "Yet, with the distance of history, the questions will be narrowed and few: Did this generation of Americans take the threat seriously? And did we do what it takes to defeat that threat?"

A coalition of religious groups staged a protest against the bill outside the White House, shouting "Bush is the terrorist" and "Torture is a crime." About 15 of the protesters, standing in a light rain, refused orders to move. Police arrested them one by one.

The legislation says the president can "interpret the meaning and application" of international standards for prisoner treatment, a provision intended to allow him to authorize aggressive interrogation methods that might otherwise be seen as illegal by international courts. Bush said such measures have helped the CIA gain vital information from terror suspects and have saved American lives.

DOJ_NMG_0082536

After Bush signed the law, CIA Director Mike Hayden sent a note to employees saying it gives them "the legal clarity and legislative support necessary to continue a program that has been one of our country's most effective tools in the fight against terrorism."

"We can be confident that our program remains — as it always has been — fully compliant with U.S. law, the Constitution and our international treaty obligations," Hayden wrote.

The White House has said that disclosing the techniques that are used would give the enemy information to resist those techniques. White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush would probably eventually issue an executive order that would describe his interpretation of the standards, but those documents are not usually made public.

Snow rejected the idea that Americans should be able to see and judge the standards for themselves, particularly in the aftermath of illegal abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison.

"The only way accountability doesn't exist is if you believe that the military is not committed to it," Snow said.

Bush Signs Rules For Terror War (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed into law new rules for detaining and trying terrorism suspects, and authorizing the CIA to use strong interrogation techniques to try to break up terrorist plots.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Mr. Bush said in a ceremony in the White House's East Room, calling the bill a defining symbol of U.S. commitment to defeating terrorists.

The ceremony marked the end of a six-week push for the bill, during which Mr. Bush and top Republicans in Congress fought over specifics. Democrats attacked the entire framework of the CIA program.

The CIA had detained and interrogated about 100 terrorism suspects over the past five years in secret facilities. Mr. Bush last month declassified the broad outlines of the program so he could send Congress a bill to authorize and further legitimize the program.

The president identified six plots that were thwarted because of information gleaned from terrorism suspects who were detained under the program.

Amnesty International USA and other rights groups said they will fight the law, arguing that it will lead to interrogation techniques that most would consider torture. Democrats, meanwhile, said the CIA program is a disservice to American traditions of law and order. They also accused Mr. Bush of playing politics with the measure.

"Everything about this bill stinks of desperate election-year politics," said Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat. "After repeatedly saying, 'Time is running out,' President Bush decided to wait 19 days to sign this bill in an attempt to keep the Republican scandals from drowning his message on the evening news."

The bill passed the House by a 250-170 vote and the Senate by a vote of 65-34. In both chambers, most Republicans voted in favor and most Democrats against.

The CIA program went dormant over the summer and the remaining detainees were transferred, but White House press secretary Tony Snow would not say yesterday whether it had been restarted.

"I am not at liberty to divulge any further details about what may have happened in the last two hours since the law was signed," he said.

Although most of the focus has been on the CIA program, the bill also authorizes military commissions to try terrorism suspects. The provision was a response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that such commissions were appropriate, but needed specific approval from Congress.

Mr. Bush called the framework for trials lawful, fair and necessary. Democrats say rights are curbed excessively, and they expect court challenges and overturned convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0082537

Meanwhile, 16 protesters from a variety of religious groups opposed to the counterterrorism bill were arrested yesterday morning near the White House. The demonstrators shouted, "Bush is the terrorist" and "Torture is a crime."

Lt. Scott Fear of the U.S. Park Police said the demonstrators were charged with impeding access to a White House entrance.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, attended the signing ceremony. He said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks, should be the first person tried.

"Family members of the 9/11 victims, America's citizens and the people of the civilized world fully expect the prosecution of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed. Let's do it," he said in a letter to Mr. Bush.

Mr. Snow said it will be at least a month before trials begin.

Bush Signs Terrorism Measure (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

President Bush enacted controversial changes in the system of interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects yesterday, setting the rules for the trials of key al-Qaeda members in a step that he says will help protect the nation.

Surrounded by members of his Cabinet and legislators, Bush signed the changes into law during a White House ceremony as more than 100 protesters stood outside in the rain chanting slogans denouncing the measure as a violation of fundamental American traditions.

The new law imposes tight limits on defendants' traditional courtroom rights, including restrictions on their ability to examine the evidence against them, to challenge their incarceration and to exclude evidence gained through witness coercion.

The president said the extraordinary measure is justified by the extraordinary circumstances of the fight against terrorism. "It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," he said, before signing the measure. "I have that privilege this morning."

Bush said the new law will allow the United States to prosecute captured terrorism suspects for "war crimes," and bring to justice the al-Qaeda operatives who plotted the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the October 2000 suicide bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen, and the August 1998 truck bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The bill also spells out the specific interrogation techniques that are outlawed, while granting retroactive legal protection to military and intelligence personnel who previously participated in rough questioning of terrorism suspects. That provision allows the administration to continue a once-secret CIA program for detaining terrorism suspects and using tough interrogation techniques on those believed to have information about plots against the United States, Bush said.

"This program has been one of the most successful intelligence efforts in American history," Bush said. "It has helped prevent attacks on our country. And the bill I sign today will ensure that we can continue using this vital tool to protect the American people for years to come."

With the midterm elections coming on Nov. 7, congressional Republicans immediately seized on the new law, which was opposed by most Democratic lawmakers, as evidence of their commitment to protect the country against terrorist attacks.

"Capitol Hill Democrats have yet to offer any solutions or formulate any serious national security policy on how to keep America safe in a post-9/11 world," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a statement.

Some Democrats, meanwhile, criticized Bush for signing a measure that they say violates the nation's civil liberties protections. "It is a sad day when the rubber-stamp Congress undercuts our freedoms, assaults our Constitution and lets the terrorists achieve something they could never win on the battlefield," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.).

Human rights advocates have questioned the value of information obtained through aggressive methods, and the military last month abandoned tough interrogation techniques. "No good intelligence is going to come from abusive practices," Lt. Gen. John F. Kimmons, the Army deputy chief of staff for intelligence, said last month in announcing the Army's new interrogation policy.

Bush approved the prosecution of "unlawful enemy combatants" before special military commissions shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, but trials were suspended pending the outcome of appeals questioning their legality in federal court. In June, the Supreme Court struck down the commissions, saying they had not been authorized by Congress and violated the Geneva Conventions. Consequently, the Bush administration pressed Congress to pass a bill to legalize them and to endorse many of the methods used by U.S. intelligence officials to get information from terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0082538

Even with enactment of the legislation, White House press secretary Tony Snow said, trials of terrorism suspects are months away, at least.

The legislation was approved by Congress late last month and is already being challenged by several lawsuits. "This issue is clearly going to be in the courts for years," said Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "It is unconstitutional and un-American."

Law's Reach Extends To Jails In U.S. (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military tribunals bill signed by President Bush on Tuesday marks the first time the right of habeas corpus has been curtailed by law for millions of people in the United States.

Although debate focused on trials at Guantanamo Bay, the new law also takes away from noncitizens in the U.S. — including more than 12 million permanent residents — the right to go to court if they are declared "unlawful enemy combatants."

No one has suggested that the Bush administration plans to use its newly won power to round up large numbers of immigrants.

But before Tuesday, the principle of habeas corpus meant that anyone thrown into jail in the U.S. had a right to ask a judge for a hearing. They also had a right to go free if the government could not show a legal basis for holding them. The Latin term for "you have the body," habeas corpus is considered one of an accused person's most basic rights.

Many legal scholars predict the law's partial repeal of habeas corpus will be struck down as unconstitutional.

"This is an outright slap at the Supreme Court, and it is heading for invalidation," said Eric M. Freedman, a law professor at Hofstra University and an expert on habeas corpus. "This is a core principle of law that was established by the prisoners who were tossed into the Tower of London by the king, and it was preserved in the Constitution. Now, Congress is saying it doesn't apply to this disfavored group of prisoners."

The new law says: "No court, justice or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States who has been determined … to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant or is awaiting such determination."

In early drafts, the bill would have cut off habeas corpus only for unlawful combatants detained "outside the United States" and at Guantanamo Bay. However, the final version deleted that phrase.

Now, it not only bars the men held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention in court, it also closes the courthouse door to noncitizens who are arrested in Los Angeles or Chicago and held by the military as a possible "unlawful enemy combatant." The new law also defines this term broadly to include not just terrorists and fighters, but also people who have "materially supported hostilities against the United States."

Although an American citizen can be arrested as an "enemy combatant," he or she can challenge the government's action in court.

Some legal experts say the fate of this limited repeal of habeas corpus is uncertain because it is unprecedented.

"This is one of the great unresolved questions because this has never happened before," said Duke University law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, a critic of the Bush administration. "The question is whether this is an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus."

The Constitution makes clear habeas corpus can be suspended, but only during extreme emergencies. It says, "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

In the most famous example, President Lincoln suspended habeas corpus during the Civil War.

DOJ_NMG_0082539

Habeas corpus does not always work in favor of the detained. During World War II, the Supreme Court heard the case of the more than 100,000 Japanese Americans who were interned but ruled they were being held legally because of a wartime emergency.

Bush administration lawyers have said this, too, is wartime and the attacks of Sept. 11 were akin to an invasion. Moreover, Congress has now endorsed the president's power to hold "enemy combatants."

But others say the court will not find support in the Constitution for the new law. The law does not qualify under any of the tests for suspending habeas corpus spelled out there, said John D. Hutson, a former judge advocate general of the Navy and dean of the Franklin Pierce Law School in New Hampshire.

"This is not a time of rebellion. There has not been an invasion, and there's no evidence the 'public safety' requires it," Hutson said. "Let's not kid ourselves. This is not about an invasion. It is about the embarrassment of holding people who, if they got to court, could show they should not have been held."

Still, the outcome of any case that reached the Supreme Court would be hard to predict because the justices have been closely split when faced with a clash between civil liberties and wartime powers.

In June, the court divided 5-3 on whether Bush had the power, acting on his own, to set up a system of military trials at Guantanamo Bay. The justices had taken up a writ of habeas corpus filed on behalf of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a onetime driver for Osama bin Laden who was charged with conspiring to kill Americans.

The five-justice majority struck down Bush's rules and said they must be written into law. Three others dissented. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. recused himself, but had backed the plan when he was an appeals court judge.

Now, Congress has written the president's rules into law and seeks to prevent the courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing a challenge to them.

Pepperdine University law professor Douglas W. Kmiec said Congress and the White House were on solid ground in seeking to cut off legal appeals from foreign fighters held by the U.S. military abroad, including at Guantanamo Bay.

"I would say habeas has no application to wartime detention outside the United States," said Kmiec, who has generally defended the Bush administration.

After World War II, the Supreme Court ruled German military prisoners held by U.S. authorities had no right to challenge their detentions through a writ of habeas corpus, he noted.

But detentions within this country have been seen differently, he added. "This is one of the most difficult questions posed by this act. There is no question that a habeas right has existed within the territorial United States for citizens and legal residents," Kmiec said.

A test case could head to the Supreme Court in a few months. Armed with the new law, government lawyers Tuesday told judges in Washington they should throw out pending cases filed on behalf of the men held at Guantanamo Bay. Their lawyers are sure to appeal to the high court.

The government could also move to cut off further court hearings for Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, the only person now being held in this country as an enemy combatant.

A native of Qatar who was a graduate student at Bradley University in Peoria, Ill., Al-Marri was arrested in December 2001 and declared an enemy combatant by the president in 2003. Government officials alleged that he was a secret Al Qaeda operative.

"He has not been charged with anything. It's atrocious and un-American," said Lawrence Lustberg, Al-Marri's lawyer. "We believe this case is headed for the Supreme Court."

Bush Signs Bill On Detainee Interrogation (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush signed legislation Tuesday establishing new rules for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists, but the fight over how to deal with detainees is far from over.

DOJ_NMG_0082540

The new law is already under attack in court, and no one is likely to be brought to trial under the new rules anytime soon. Even some lawmakers who voted for the legislation questioned its constitutionality.

Although the law's future is uncertain, critics and supporters agreed that its enactment marks a major shift in the nation's approach to terrorism and some legal principles. Programs that Bush launched in secret now have the full support of Congress.

The Military Commissions Act of 2006 clears the way for the CIA to resume aggressive interrogations in secret prisons and denies suspected terrorists the right to challenge their detentions in civilian courts. It also permits the use of evidence obtained through coercion and lets the president draw the line between acceptable interrogation techniques and impermissible torture.

While Bush hailed the legislation as a potent weapon against terrorists, critics called it a stain on America's reputation as a champion of human rights and civil liberties.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said at a crowded White House signing ceremony. Shortly after Bush signed the legislation, CIA Director Michael Hayden told agency employees that the law "ensures that we can detain and interrogate key terrorist figures" without fear of prosecution for war crimes.

The American Civil Liberties Union called the new law unconstitutional, un-American and "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted." Most of the provisions in the law apply only to non-citizens who have been declared "unlawful enemy combatants."

"The president can now - with the approval of Congress - indefinitely hold people without charge, take away protections against horrific abuse, put people on trial based on hearsay evidence, authorize trials that can sentence people to death based on testimony literally beaten out of witnesses, and slam shut the courthouse door for habeas petitions (challenging the detentions)," said Anthony Romero, the organization's executive director.

Congress approved the bill last month after intense behind-the-scenes negotiations between the White House and three leading Republican senators - Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. Although the bill was presented to Congress as a compromise, Bush emerged the clear winner.

"The president has gotten everything he wants and more," said Jeffrey Addicott, a former Army lawyer and director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University law school in San Antonio. "There can really be no doubt that Congress believes we are in a state of war."

Addicott, who strongly supports the new law, said the shift means that Congress is willing to roll back traditional legal protections in the pursuit of terrorists.

"You have to have a lower standard of due process or you'll never be able to prosecute these war criminals," he said.

But critics said the nation should maintain high legal standards, even in a time of war, to send a message to the rest of the world.

"The fundamental fairness of the American people and legal system are among our greatest strengths in the fight against terrorism," Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said. "We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history."

The Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed two challenges to the law on behalf of detainees, said it would fight the changes "at every turn, using every tool at our disposal, until we reverse this affront to the rule of law."

Legal experts said the anticipated court battles make it unlikely that any of the roughly 435 detainees at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, would face trial before a military commission anytime soon.

Fourteen suspected terrorists, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, have been transferred from CIA custody to Guantanamo to await trial. Another 60 to 80 Guantanamo detainees are considered likely candidates for trial.

"No one is going to trial in the near future," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia. "I don't think anyone will be tried during his (Bush's) presidency."

Legal scholars on both sides of the issue agreed that the law is most vulnerable to challenge on the issue of denying detainees access to civilian courts unless they're U.S. citizens. The ability of suspects to challenge their imprisonment, known as the right of habeas corpus, dates back to the Magna Carta in 1215 and is considered a bedrock legal principle.

Bush expressed confidence that the newly approved system for dealing with detainees will survive court challenges. Others aren't so sure.

DOJ_NMG_0082541

"Congress could have done it right, and didn't, but the next line of defense is the court," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, told The Philadelphia Inquirer after he voted for the bill. "I think the court will clean it up."

Bush Signs Law Creating Tribunals For Terror Suspects (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, October 18, 2006

Oct. 17 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush signed legislation to allow the trial of suspected terrorists by military tribunals, and his administration immediately used the law to challenge suits by hundreds of Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The government took its first action under the new Military Commissions Act, which Bush said ``provides a way to deliver justice to the terrorists" captured after the Sept. 11 attacks. The American Civil Liberties Union said the law will make Guantanamo and other detention facilities a ``legal no-man's land."

Among those who will be brought to trial under the law is Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind. He and 13 other terrorism suspects, who were labeled ``high value" and had been held in secret overseas prisons operated by the Central Intelligence Agency, were transferred last month to the U.S. facility at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Shortly after Bush signed the measure, the Justice Department sent a letter to a U.S. appeals court in Washington saying the new law strips hundreds of other Guantanamo detainees of their right to a court hearing to challenge their confinement. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit is considering whether to dismiss the suits by detainees who haven't been charged with war crimes.

In addition to setting up military commissions to try suspected terrorists, the law gives the president wide latitude to interpret the Geneva Conventions in deciding what interrogation techniques would be permissible.

Water Boarding

Senator John McCain, a key architect of the bill, said the intent is to outlaw practices such as simulated drowning -- known as water boarding -- sleep deprivation and putting detainees in stress positions. The Arizona Republican's opposition to the president's original proposal for the tribunals forced the administration to compromise on its provisions.

The law continued to draw criticism from some Democrats and groups such as the ACLU and Amnesty International.

ACLU Executive Director Anthony Romero, in a statement, called the law ``unconstitutional and un-American." Amnesty International said it would let the U.S. hold suspects indefinitely without charge or trial.

Under the law, detainees who haven't been charged with a crime can no longer go to federal court to contest whether they are being properly held as ``enemy combatants." Instead, they must go through a military review, with a limited right of appeal to the D.C. Circuit.

Fewer Rights

Lawyers for more than 200 Guantanamo detainees say such military reviews would provide fewer rights than a federal court suit, and that the Constitution doesn't allow the U.S. to take away their right to challenge their detention by asking a federal judge to issue a writ of habeas corpus.

The Guantanamo detainees won a 2004 Supreme Court ruling allowing them to challenge their detention in federal court. After the cases returned to a federal trial court in Washington, two judges issued conflicting rulings on whether the inmates could continue to pursue their claims. The D.C. Circuit hadn't ruled on the cases by the time Congress approved the new law in September.

Republicans highlighted Democrats' opposition to the new law. House Majority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, said in a statement that ``Democrats' partisan opposition to this program, at the urging of the radical leftist element of their party, provides further proof that they continue to put politics ahead of addressing the security concerns of the American people."

U.S. Personnel

Democratic Representative Edward Markey of Massachusetts said the law would endanger U.S. personnel overseas who are captured by the nation's enemies.

DOJ_NMG_0082542

While Bush was signing the law, a group of protesters demonstrated outside the White House fence chanting ``stop torture'' and ``shame on Congress, shame on Bush.'' At least 16 people were arrested when they blocked an entrance to the White House grounds, said Scott Fear, a spokesman for the U.S. Park Police.

Bush sought the legislation after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Congress had not authorized tribunals for bringing terrorism suspects to trial. The Senate gave final approval to the bill 65-34 on Sept. 28 and the House endorsed it the following day, 250-170.

``Over the past few months the debate over this bill has been heated, and the questions raised can seem complex,'' Bush said today. ``Every member of Congress who voted for this bill has helped our nation rise to the task that history has given us.''

Legal Procedures Needed

Administration spokesman Tony Snow said suspects won't be brought to trial immediately. ``I think it's a month or two, at least,'' because of the need to set up legal procedures and for suspects to obtain attorneys, he said. He also declined to predict how soon CIA interrogations would resume or what ``precise questioning techniques'' would be used.

``Some of these people are so bad their host governments don't want them back,'' Snow said.

About 150 people were invited to the signing ceremony in the East Room of the White House, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Peter Pace, CIA Director General Michael Hayden and current and retired military officers, lawmakers, advocacy groups, congressional and agency staff.

Prosecutors Want To Question Reid (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 18, 2006

BOSTON — Federal investigators told a judge Tuesday that they want to question would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid because it is likely he has important information about terrorist activities.

Prosecutors said in U.S. District Court they don't believe Reid is entitled to a public defender now that his criminal case is over.

Reid, a British citizen and self-described follower of Osama bin Laden, pleaded guilty in 2002 to trying to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight with explosives hidden in his shoes. He is serving a life sentence at a maximum-security federal prison in Florence, Colo.

In April, a judge extended a 2003 order allowing Reid to continue to be represented by federal public defenders. At the time, Reid could have been called as a witness in the trial of al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. Reid was never called as a witness.

U.S. District Judge William Young said he would keep in place the orders continuing Reid's representation by public defenders, noting that under those orders, the government can contact Reid only after giving notice to his lawyers and having them present for any interviews with him.

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Farmer said investigators want to talk to Reid without an attorney present to develop a "personal rapport," which would be difficult to do with an attorney or any third party in the room. Farmer said federal agents believe Reid could have information on terrorism plots that could be carried out. He said al-Qaeda plots are known to "have long gestation periods."

Judith Mizner, one of Reid's public defenders, said Reid has repeatedly made it clear he will not talk to investigators without an attorney present. She expressed skepticism about prosecutors' claim that they only want to talk to Reid and do not plan to interrogate him for the purpose of charging him with additional crimes.

Young urged prosecutors and Reid's lawyers to consider bringing the case to a federal judge in Colorado.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Calls Radiation Monitors Unreliable (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082543

The Department of Homeland Security's plan to spend $1.2 billion deploying next-generation nuclear-detection equipment at U.S. ports and border crossings cannot be justified, given test results that showed the devices are unreliable, congressional investigators warned yesterday.

The department ignored its own tests showing the new monitors could not meet a standard of detecting enriched uranium 95 percent of the time, according to the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm. When the nuclear material was shielded, detection rates ranged from 17 percent to 53 percent.

DHS also understated the project's costs by up to $181 million, GAO officials wrote to the leaders of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees.

The department's cost-benefit "analysis does not justify its recent decision to spend $1.2 billion to purchase and deploy" the new radiation portal monitors, the GAO reported. Homeland Security "relied on potential future performance to justify the purchase," the agency said.

The report came four days after President Bush signed a $3.4 billion port-security bill that, among other things, requires new monitors to be deployed at the nation's 22 busiest ports by the end of 2007. Congress raced to pass the legislation last month before recessing for the midterm elections.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland. And we're going to win the war on terror," Bush said at a signing ceremony Friday.

In separate legislation last month, however, Congress barred full-scale production of the devices until the department certifies "a significant increase in operational effectiveness."

The GAO report warns that the Bush administration risks repeating earlier failures. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the government spent $300 million on radiation monitors that could not tell uranium from cat litter or ceramic tile. They also had high false-alarm rates.

Existing monitors cost about $55,000. The new screening machines now cost at least $377,000 each, the GAO reported.

DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen said the GAO missed the fact that the department is continuing to test and review devices produced by Thermo Electron Corp., Raytheon Co. and Canberra Industries Inc., which were awarded the business in July.

The DHS is testing 80 devices under a one-year contract before deciding whether to move ahead with a five-year program to deploy 1,400 screening machines at ports and border crossings.

"That 95 percent rate of effectiveness is a standard that we maintain. We are not going to put devices in the field unless they meet those high standards," Agen said.

Suit Seeks Data On Immigration Profiling Of Arabs (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

In an effort to establish whether the government is using prohibited profiling methods against Arab-Americans and Muslims, a civil rights group filed a suit yesterday against the Homeland Security Department and one of its branches, Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The suit, by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, asked the Federal District Court in the District of Columbia to compel the immigration agency under the Freedom of Information Act to release the nationalities of 237 people arrested for immigration violations in October 2004.

The agency announced the arrests at the time in an effort to disrupt possible terrorist threats in the presidential elections.

Over the past two years, two previous requests by the committee to obtain the information through standard channels failed. Refusing to release the nationalities leaves open a possibility that immigration laws are being disproportionately enforced against Arab-Americans and Muslims, said Kareem Shora, the new executive director of the committee, which is based in Washington. The organization is not seeking individuals' names or their dispositions in the courts.

In one letter denying the previous requests, the immigration agency said releasing the information would harm its law enforcement efforts by divulging where it was concentrating its resources.

DOJ_NMG_0082544

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Dean Boyd, would not elaborate on that statement. Mr. Boyd did restate that the agency did not enforce immigration laws on the basis of race, religion or ethnic origin.

More than 160,000 individuals were deported last year "from virtually every country around the globe," he added.

Arab-Americans and American Muslims have widespread suspicions that the spotlight is focused on them regarding accusations of terrorism, particularly around any election season, to spread concern among other voters and to intimidate them from speaking out. Mr. Boyd strongly objected to the idea that political considerations were involved in any aspect of enforcing immigration law.

"We conduct enforcement actions every day and certainly don't time them for any political reason," he said, adding that the months leading up to an important event like elections were an obvious time to step up law enforcement.

The antidiscrimination committee's request was in part prompted by a news release from the immigration agency that gave the nationalities of eight men who were arrested, and six were Arabs, Mr. Shora said.

Three databases that track immigrants were used, he said, and one has mostly Arabs or Muslims. Mr. Shora was referring to the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System, a hastily created database that tracks visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

All those 25 countries except North Korea have Muslim or Arab majorities, and the 80,000 men who registered were overwhelmingly Arabs and Muslims. Using that database, the committee says, would mean unfairly enforcing immigration laws amid just one community and violate the laws against profiling.

Arab-American Group Files Suit Against Homeland Security Over Alleged Profiling (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lubna Takruri, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-An Arab-American civil rights group filed a lawsuit Tuesday against the federal government in a bid to obtain information about the nationalities of more than 230 people arrested for immigration violations.

The suit, filed by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, names the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and its Immigration and Customs Enforcement unit as defendants.

It was filed under the Freedom of Information Act in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia after two years of unsuccessful attempts to learn the nationalities of individuals arrested in 2004 under a law enforcement operation intended to disrupt potential terrorist threats before the presidential election.

The Washington-based group believes the operation improperly used the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System - a government database created after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorists attacks to track visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries - to profile Arab and Muslim visitors to the United States. The domestic registration system required males from 24 Arab and predominantly Muslim countries and North Korea to register with immigration authorities. The registration requirement has since been phased out, but the database of information still exists.

The 2004 operation became known as the "October plan" after the FBI sent an e-mail advising its field offices and Homeland Security agencies of "extraordinary measures" from the first week of October 2004 through the presidential inauguration.

The FBI's internal e-mail, obtained by CBS News, called for "aggressive - even obvious - surveillance" intended to give the impression that the government was targeting immigration violators who might be a threat, even if they had not committed a crime.

Authorities arrested 237 people during the operation. And, "every single one had violated immigration laws, regardless of nationality," said Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Boyd said race, ethnicity and religion played "absolutely no role" in the operation.

"It was simply an effort to target immigration violators who may have posed an elevated public safety threat in the weeks leading to the presidential election," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082545

The Arab-American organization wants to find out if the 237 people were disproportionately Arab and Muslim, because the registration database was made up of mostly Arab and Muslim men.

But the federal agency points out that in addition to the registration database, two other databases were used, including one of student visa holders.

With the national elections approaching, the group fears the registration database is being used to target Arab and Muslim men for general law enforcement purposes.

"The biggest factor is that we know that they carried out the October plan during the presidential elections - the most recent national elections we had," said Kareem Shora, the Arab-American group's national executive director. "Our fear is that since it happened during the last national elections, is something like that going to happen again soon?"

In the complaint filed Tuesday, the group does not seek names of the people detained or how they were sought out; It only requests their nationalities. The civil rights group asked for the nationality information in two FOIA requests last year but was denied.

But the Arab-American group is concerned that the registration requirements and the October arrests were presented as counterterrorism operations but instead turned into a way to enforce immigration violations.

In a letter responding to the FOIA requests, the agency said the information is exempt from the Freedom of Information Act because it was collected for law enforcement purposes and is an ongoing investigation. The civil rights group argues that getting information on just the nationalities of those detained would not jeopardize any law enforcement operation.

Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works (USAT)

By Thomas Frank, Usa Today

USA Today, October 18, 2006

X-ray devices show carry-ons in 3-D

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration, in a potential strategy shift, may screen carry-on bags with new three-dimensional X-ray machines that are better at spotting liquid explosives, guns and other weapons.

The 3-D machines have “an extraordinary ability to find” liquids, TSA chief Kip Hawley told USA TODAY. “They're a step beyond where we are today.”

The TSA has limited the volume of liquids passengers can carry on planes since authorities foiled an alleged plot in London in August to bomb U.S.-bound planes with liquid explosives. Installing new X-ray machines would improve security and could ease the liquid restrictions, aviation consultant Richard Roth said.

The question for the TSA is whether to buy upgraded X-ray machines for $75,000 to $200,000 each or to wait possibly two years for better machines costing about $400,000. The TSA had planned to wait for the more expensive machines, which have the highest level of explosives detection. But, Hawley said, “if it's going to be two years, maybe it makes sense economically and security-wise to put an intermediate step in between.”

The TSA will evaluate the machines in coming months. They provide more detailed images than the X-rays airports have used for 30 years. Those X-rays have been criticized by the Homeland Security Department's inspector general for inadequately spotting explosives, guns and knives. Upgraded X-rays “might significantly increase screeners' ability to detect” weapons, a 2004 report by the inspector general said.

“They're your best answer now,” Roth said. “The technology is getting so good on those machines.”

The upgraded machines, called multiview X-ray, scan from several angles to create three-dimensional images of items in a bag. Current X-ray machines use one image that can make a knife look like a pen.

“We may actually be able to speed security lines” by giving airport screeners more detailed images that reduce the number of bags they must hand-search for weapons, said Peter Kant of Rapiscan Systems, a leading manufacturer of airport X-ray machines.

Kant said the TSA's request for upgraded X-rays “is the first time in a few years they've opened up their evaluation” of technology that screens carry-on bags.

DOJ_NMG_0082546

Multiview X-rays are used in European airports to scan checked luggage and at courthouses, embassies and other buildings.

"The technology is ready now," said Thomas Ripp, president of L-3 Security and Detection Systems, which has developed a machine being considered by the TSA.

The upgraded X-rays are roughly the same size and weight as the machines used at U.S. airport checkpoints. A $400,000, high-grade bomb detector made by Analogic is nearly twice as wide and long and four times as heavy as L-3's upgraded X-ray, according to specifications from both companies.

Analogic CEO John Wood said his Cobra machine is so much faster it could replace two X-ray machines and save money by reducing the number of screeners. The automated Cobra sounds an alarm when explosives are found instead of requiring a screener to spot them on an X-ray screen.

We Don't Need Our Own MI5 (WP)

By William J. Bratton

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

On July 5, 2005, police in Torrance, Calif., a small city bordering Los Angeles, arrested two men leaving a gas station after a robbery. That kind of crime predates Bonnie and Clyde. The next day, Torrance detectives executed a search warrant on the apartment of one of the suspects in my city, Los Angeles. There they found documents that seemed to give clues to the planning of attacks on locations in Los Angeles.

Immediately, Torrance called in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force. FBI agents, detectives from the Los Angeles Police Department and the county sheriff's department, and a team of analysts began to go through the documents. According to the indictment, they uncovered plans to attack U.S. military facilities in Los Angeles County and places where Jews gather, from synagogues to the Israeli consulate.

It appeared there might be other suspects involved. We needed to move quickly and quietly. That night, my phone rang at 3 a.m. It was the LAPD command center notifying me that bombs were going off on London trains at the height of the city's rush hour. I knew we had to address security concerns for our own rush hour.

This is the world of a big-city police chief today. A terrorist plot in your own back yard, another unfolding half a world away. You need the agility to react to both, sometimes simultaneously.

In both cases, my efforts were linked seamlessly with the Los Angeles office of the FBI and its Joint Terrorism Task Force and Field Intelligence Group. This is the new normal.

I have security clearances and identification that give me unfettered access to the FBI's offices here. I am briefed on classified operations and worldwide threats whether there is a connection to Los Angeles or not. The FBI understands the need for information-sharing.

Lately people have been calling on Washington to create a new domestic intelligence agency, without police powers -- like Britain's MI5 -- to take over from the FBI and be the lead in gathering and analyzing intelligence as it relates to terrorism. The argument goes that the "FBI culture" is that of a criminal investigative agency driven to make arrests and bring prosecutions and that the bureau does not have the instinct to draw back and look at the wider picture as a purely intelligence-driven agency might. I disagree.

Today, FBI intelligence analysts sit side by side with LAPD and sheriff's analysts in a Joint Regional Intelligence Center here. Our investigations are intelligence-driven. When we don't have enough information, we can gather intelligence for weeks, months or even years. When the intelligence tells us there is a threat to public safety, we can move in and make arrests.

A new agency that would gather intelligence and then go to law enforcement to take action would add an unnecessary step. If the problem before Sept. 11, 2001, was that the right hand didn't know what the left hand was doing, how would a third hand help?

DOJ_NMG_0082547

America's police departments have achieved a higher level of synergy with the FBI on intelligence and investigations than at any other time in history. If it's not broken, let's not try to fix it. The writer has been police commissioner of Boston and New York City. He is currently the police chief of Los Angeles.

Many Ground Zero Workers Gain Chance At Lawsuits (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

A federal judge has rejected the city's claim that it is protected by law from being sued over the way it handled rescue and recovery operations at ground zero. The ruling opens the way for lawsuits by thousands of workers who say they were made sick by exposure to toxic substances during the 10-month cleanup.

Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of United States District Court in Manhattan rejected the city's motion to dismiss the lawsuits. In a 99-page decision released yesterday afternoon, he stated that state and federal statutes do provide some immunity for the city, its private contractors and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey for actions undertaken in response to an enemy attack. However, the judge said that protection is not universal and varies by time and place, making it necessary to hear the details of individual cases.

"The fact-intensive nature of the issue makes its resolution unsuitable for resolution by motion," Judge Hellerstein concluded. "Discovery, additional proceedings and a more extensive factual record, and perhaps a trial, will be required."

Michael A. Cardozo, the corporation counsel for the city, said in a statement that although the judge ruled that the legal case can proceed, he made it clear that the issue of immunity would be determined on a case-by-case basis.

"We believe that as the facts fully emerge, the complex decisions that were carefully and thoughtfully made during the months after 9/11 will demonstrate the enormous good work done by the city and its contractors, and the absence of any legal liabilities," Mr. Cardozo said.

David Worby, the lawyer who is leading the legal action on behalf of the workers, called the decision a clear victory for the firefighters, police officers and construction workers who say they became sick after responding to the Sept. 11 crisis.

"The bottom line of what the court is trying to say is that these are not the kind of decisions for these heroes that should be settled by summary judgments," Mr. Worby said. "They should have their day in court."

Mr. Worby said that when he spoke to some of his clients after the decision was released, they cried. "It all started with people telling them what they had was just a cough, and it's taken three years to prove that that was not true," he said.

In his decision, Judge Hellerstein outlined proceedings in which up to 3,000 ailing workers would have a chance to describe what happened to them; whom they were working for at the time they got sick; when they were at ground zero; and what protective gear was available to them while on the site.

In all, more than 8,000 workers have filed suit against the city and dozens of its contractors who worked on the cleanup of ground zero.

The other cases would be heard in subsequent proceedings.

While some of the cases could end up going to trial, the judge offered to appoint a special master, with the approval of the parties, who could engage in mediation and speed resolution of the claims.

"If even a minority of plaintiffs suffered serious injuries to their respiratory tracts arising from the acrid air of Sept. 11, their claims deserve to be heard when a recovery could make a difference to their lives," Judge Hellerstein wrote.

James E. Tyrrell Jr., a lawyer with the Washington firm Patton Boggs who is leading the city's defense in this case, said the city was clearly disappointed that "the court is not in a position to conclude that either all or some substantial portion of actions taken can be treated as being covered by immunity at this time." While partly rejecting the immunity claims by the city and the Port Authority, Judge Hellerstein dismissed the charges against Con Edison and Silverstein Properties, which had been named as defendants because they held leases on ground zero property.

The judge ordered a conference to be held on Nov. 3 to consider the appointment of a special master and other issues.

The city's substantial legal costs are being covered by a special captive insurance company that was created when Congress established a $1 billion insurance fund in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0082548

WAR NEWS:

Commander: Mistakes Made In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, October 18, 2006

The U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan failed to follow through as it should have after ousting the Taliban government in 2001, setting the stage for this year's deadly resurgence, the NATO commander in the country said Tuesday.

The mistake consisted of adopting "a peacetime approach" too early, British Gen. David Richards told Pentagon reporters. He said the international community has six months to correct the problem before losing Afghan support, reiterating a warning he issued last week.

"The Taliban were defeated. ... And it looked all pretty hunky-dory," Richard said of the environment at the end of 2001. "We thought it was all done ... and didn't treat it as aggressively as ... with the benefit of hindsight, we should have done."

Progress on security, rebuilding and good government didn't meet Afghan expectations, and this year the "Taliban exploited ... this sense of frustration amongst the people," Richards said in a televised conference from Afghanistan.

While it is unusual for a commander to criticize an ongoing military operation, Richards' comments came days after another British officer offered a much harsher assessment of the other U.S.-led war, in Iraq.

Asked for comment on Richards' remarks, Defense Department spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said Afghanistan was and is one of the world's poorest nations.

"It will take years of hard work by the Afghan people and the international community to reverse the effects of decades of occupation and civil war," he said. "Nonetheless, there has been significant economic growth and donor efforts to improve living conditions across the country," including improved health care, school enrollment, roads and other projects.

Vician said U.S. resources put into Afghanistan have increased — 21,000 American troops are there now compared with 9,500 in March 2003. He said 81 percent of Afghans have access to health care compared with 8 percent in 2001; 2.5 million have benefited from irrigation and road projects linking farms to market; and 5 million students are in schools, 34 percent of them girls.

Insurgent bombings, ambushes and rocket attacks have surged this year. Since the Taliban was overthrown, many of Afghanistan's former rulers are thought to have found sanctuary across the border in Pakistan.

Five years later, NATO forces, along with Afghan army and police forces, plan a series of operations throughout the country this winter to do road building and other reconstruction projects in more secure areas and bolster security to prepare for reconstruction in less secure regions, Richards said.

Richards said that if there is not measurable improvement in six months, Afghans may choose "the rotten future offered by the Taliban" rather than the hopeful future that the coalition offered but didn't deliver.

"This is not just my view but that of many others," he said.

Bush administration critics have charged the Afghan campaign is lagging because the administration focused troops and other assets away from that country too quickly in order to plan and execute the invasion of Iraq, which they view as a diversion from the war on terror.

Just last week, Gen. Richard Dannatt, Britain's army chief, set off a political storm by calling for troops to be withdrawn "soon" from Iraq in part because their presence made the situation worse.

He later said he meant a phased withdrawal over two or three years.

Richards commands about 31,000 forces in Afghanistan. NATO early this month took command of 12,000 U.S. troops there, extending its security mission to all of Afghanistan.

The transfer of command gave NATO the biggest ground combat operation in its history, putting Richards in charge of the largest number of U.S. troops fighting under a foreign commander since World War II.

In "a tough summer" of fighting, NATO forces beat back the Taliban in southwestern Kandahar province, a former Taliban stronghold. "I think we have now established the psychological ascendancy over the Taliban" militarily, Richards said.

DOJ_NMG_0082549

"We have now — with the government and with the international community — to exploit the window of opportunity ... that we now have as a result of military success," he said.

Asked why he was sure a new effort can achieve what wasn't done before, Richards said:

"I'm optimistic that we have understood the issue ... learned our lessons, and now can take this forward aggressively to deliver on the promises."

British General Faults U.S. For Taliban Resurgence (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

The British commander of the allied forces in Afghanistan said yesterday that his U.S. predecessors moved too quickly from the 2001 invasion to a "peacetime approach," allowing the ousted Taliban to regroup and stage a counteroffensive this year in the southern provinces.

Gen. David Richards, whose NATO command this month took control of the 31,000 allied troops in Afghanistan, said that in 2001, "the Taliban were defeated, weren't they? You know, wonderful work by a lot of people, mainly American and Afghan, and it looked pretty hunky-dory."

But the general told reporters at the Pentagon that the Taliban was able to regroup because American forces remained somewhat isolated. The Afghan army was not established to the point that it could fill security roles in Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace, and other southern towns.

"The benefit of hindsight, you know, we thought it was all done, success was there and we could adopt a sort of peacetime approach to it and didn't treat it as aggressively as a problem," he said. "Your forces were doing a great work, but they were almost in isolation because the Afghan army and police weren't there to help at that stage."

He said there also was a "disconnect" in what the U.S.-led humanitarian and reconstruction effort could provide and what the Afghan people expected.

"The Taliban exploited it," Gen. Richards said. "They exploited this sense of frustration amongst the people who just didn't see all the good things that have been talked about."

Asked about Gen. Richard's remarks, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, told the Associated Press, "It will take years of hard work by the Afghan people and the international community to reverse the effects of decades of occupation and civil war. Nonetheless, there has been significant economic growth and donor efforts to improve living conditions across the country."

Gen. Richards said the new tactic has been to retake control of Taliban areas, move in reconstruction programs and maintain a security presence. He is giving the allies six months to start showing the Afghans that they can expect better services and security. If not, the alliance risks losing the populace to the insurgents.

"I think that's why I'm optimistic that we have understood the issue broader, the way I've just analyzed, learned our lessons and now can take this forward aggressively to deliver on the promise," said Gen. Richards, who led British troops in strife-torn Northern Ireland. "I will now construct a security operation that allows that work to start and then will ensure a continuing level of security, so that it can go on."

The allies seemed caught off guard this spring, when the Taliban began surprise attacks on southern Afghan towns.

The coalition eventually poured more troops into the south and mounted major air and ground operations, routing the Taliban, whose spokesman conceded they had to retreat.

"We had to fight and fight we have," Gen. Richards said. "There is no doubt anymore that NATO can fight if and when it's required to do so, and it inflicted the biggest single defeat on the Taliban that had occurred since 2001."

NATO's new tactics played out this week in the Musa Qala district of Helmand province. Allied forces left the area after weeks of bloody fighting. Security will be handled by tribal chiefs and Afghan forces, with NATO on an emergency recall status.

Gen. Richards commands a force that includes troops from Britain, the United States, Canada, the Netherlands and Denmark.

British Troops Withdraw From Afghan Area (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0082550

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 17 (AP) — British troops pulled out of a once restive district in southern Afghanistan on Tuesday after reaching an agreement with tribal elders for Afghan forces to take over security.

NATO also announced a new countrywide military operation with Afghan troops intended to maintain pressure on Taliban fighters during the fall and winter and pave the way for long-promised development after the most bitter fighting in five years.

Officials said on Tuesday that fighting across Afghanistan had killed 44 suspected Taliban militants.

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman in Kabul, said the decision to withdraw British soldiers from the Musa Qala district in Helmand Province followed an agreement with tribal elders and the provincial governor and was supported by President Hamid Karzai. "There has not been any contact with the Taliban, and they are not involved in this," Mr. Laity said.

He said the soldiers were leaving because there had not been a major clash in the district in 35 days. Musa Qala was an area where resurgent Taliban militants put up stiffer resistance than expected when about 4,000 British soldiers deployed to Helmand Province last spring.

US Presses Iraq On Amnesty Issue (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

The Bush administration is pressing the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki to issue a "broad" and "painful" amnesty for insurgents in spite of intense opposition to the proposal from politicians both in Iraq and the US, according to a senior administration official.

Amid growing anxiety in Washington over Iraq's escalating sectarian violence, the US is advocating more determined moves towards a national reconciliation with the Sunni community that dominates Iraq's insurgency. It also wants a tougher line on the Shia militias.

"You need the government to move forward with a programme – it should include an amnesty in a broad fashion, a comprehensive amnesty proposal," the senior US official, who asked not to be named, told the Financial Times. The official was not explicit about the terms of the proposed amnesty, but he said: "No successful amnesty is not painful or sweeping."

As the US grapples with reversing policy decisions made under the initial occupation authority of Paul Bremer, officials told the FT the Iraqi government should implement major changes in the strategy of weeding out former Ba'ath party members from Iraq's public administration.

The senior US official said this policy should go from a "broadly wielded to a very narrow focus on a very limited cadre of individuals."

US pressure on Baghdad to act swiftly has engendered a growing lack of confidence between Mr Maliki and the White House. This appears to have triggered a 15-minute telephone call to the Iraqi prime minister from President George W. Bush on Monday, a call designed to reassure the Iraqi leader that the US was not setting a deadline for his government to stand on its own feet.

The amnesty issue is divisive in both Iraq and the US, where the emotional question of how to honour American war dead – now at 2,750 – has become entangled in the debate over the merits of an early US withdrawal.

The White House has avoided giving explicit endorsement of a sweeping amnesty.

When Mr Maliki initially announced his reconciliation programme in June, members of the US Congress expressed outrage at his proposal to pardon insurgents who had killed US soldiers. Under a barrage of criticism, Mr Maliki backtracked.

However, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US envoy in Baghdad, has supported the concept of a broad amnesty. He said in July he would try to work with Iraqi leaders to "find the right balance between reconciliation and accountability" so that the US dead remained honoured.

Suggestions of an amnesty have also been opposed by Shia parties advocating tougher security measures against the insurgents. A conference to discuss the plan was recently postponed.

One senior Iraqi official said the amnesty would be discussed "at the right time" and that it would not, in any case, include anyone who had been incriminated in violence.

DOJ_NMG_0082551

Another senior official insisted that an amnesty would have little impact. "It would be seen as a sign of weakness by the insurgents – that's the mentality here," he said.

Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 17 — The Iraqi government removed the country's two most senior police commanders from their posts on Tuesday, in the first broad move against the top leadership of Iraq's unruly special police forces.

The two generals had led Iraq's special police commandos and its public order brigade, both widely criticized as being heavily infiltrated by Shiite militias. Their removal comes at a crucial time for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has come under intense American pressure to purge Iraq's security forces of the militias and death squads that operate within their ranks.

Iraqi politicians, both Shiite and Sunni, have grown increasingly anxious in recent weeks that eroding public and Congressional support for the war in the United States might prompt a major shift in American policy, particularly if the November midterm elections bring gains for the Democrats.

Senior American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, have issued stark warnings to the Maliki government of growing American impatience, especially at the government's failure to stop the scourge of death squads operating with the knowledge or support of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police.

For Mr. Maliki, these concerns have taken on a keen personal edge, exposed Monday when the White House revealed that Mr. Maliki asked President Bush in a telephone call whether there was any truth to rumors that the Americans had plans to replace him "if certain things don't happen within two months," in the words of Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Bush reassured Mr. Maliki of American support.

The American military also applied pressure to militia networks on Tuesday. Iraqi and American troops arrested a senior aide to Moktada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric. The aide, whom the military did not name but who was identified by a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, was arrested on suspicion of having directed kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunnis and Shiites, and of attacking Americans.

Mr. Maliki will also have to consider the criticisms of senior American military commanders who, in background briefings with American reporters in recent weeks, have spoken with exasperation about the government's failure to tackle issues that have exhausted public confidence among Iraqis — above all the virtual impunity with which Shiite and Sunni death squads allowed to operate.

The reordering of the police forces, beginning with the suspension of an entire Iraqi police brigade this month on suspicions that some members may have permitted or even participated in death squad killings, appeared to be one of the first serious attempts to address some of those American concerns.

The two generals, Rasheed Fleyah and Mahdi Sabeh, both Shiites, had been in their posts since the previous government, under which abuses by largely Shiite police forces began. Iraq's Sunnis deeply fear the police commandos that grew out of control soon after a coalition of Shiite parties came to power last year.

Mr. Maliki faces a nearly impossible task in weeding out the militias. Their influence runs deep in Iraqi society; they are present in the guard forces of Iraqi politicians, at the doors of mosques and even on college campuses. Iraqis of different sects and ethnicities do not trust one another after years of oppression under Saddam Hussein and militant violence since the American invasion.

The central question in the special police is who will replace the two men. An Interior Ministry spokesman, Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf, said a replacement has been chosen, but that his name could not be released until adequate security arrangements had been made for his family. His job — to command both branches of the special police that are set to be combined into one — will be one of the most dangerous in Iraq.

Iraq's interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, said Friday that he had already fired more than 3,000 employees, and that, with Mr. Maliki's approval, no one was too senior to be immune. It was not clear, however, how much more of a purge would be needed.

DOJ_NMG_0082552

Another serious problem for American officials is Mr. Maliki's refusal to allow a major crackdown on Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army. This has been a long-smoldering issue for the Americans, who faced two uprisings by the Shiite militia in April and August 2004, only to have Mr. Sadr escape outright defeat when Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most powerful Shiite cleric in Iraq, intervened, allowing Mr. Sadr to keep large parts of his militia intact.

Since then, the militias have mushroomed, with some portions splintering off into criminal fiefdoms. American commanders have contended that the Mahdi Army will eventually have to be crushed if Iraq is to achieve lasting stability. But Mr. Sadr controls one of the largest blocs of seats in Parliament, so the Shiite-led governments of Mr. Maliki and his predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, have both depended on Mr. Sadr's political support and repeatedly resisted any showdown.

The arrest of Mr. Sadr's aide, which took place in the early hours of Tuesday, enraged Mr. Sadr's followers, who called for citywide demonstrations on Wednesday.

A spokesman for Mr. Sadr identified the man as Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, the head of Mr. Sadr's office in the poor Shiite neighborhood of Shuala. He denied the charges against the sheik, who was taken, according to the spokesman, while performing a Shiite ritual. The military said one other person was also arrested.

In the face of resistance by the Iraqi government, the American military has shifted to a campaign of attrition against the Sadr forces. There have been a series of raids in recent months similar to the one carried out in Shuala on Tuesday morning, each of them aimed at major figures in Mr. Sadr's network. American commanders have said that some of the targets have been rogue groups that have broken with the Mahdi Army, becoming little more than independent criminal gangs. But others, including the cleric arrested in Tuesday's raid, appear to have been important figures in Mr. Sadr's power structure.

Reflecting the political sensitivities involved, the American forces, in announcing the raids, have studiously avoided any reference to Mr. Sadr or the Mahdi Army.

Mr. Maliki strongly criticized American forces on national television in August after a raid in Mr. Sadr's stronghold, a sprawling district of cinderblock houses and fluttering Shiite flags called Sadr City.

Mr. Sadr has denied that his militia is involved in criminal enterprise or sectarian killings, but it is impossible to tell just how implicated the senior leadership is. Some senior aides have gone into hiding.

Fresh evidence that Mr. Sadr's militia is at the forefront of the sectarian killings carried out by Shiites came this weekend, when armed men said by residents and local officials to be wearing black clothing, typical for Mahdi fighters, went on a rampage in Sunni areas north of Baghdad, killing 38 men, in reprisals for the beheading of 14 Shiite workers from the town of Balad.

While officials in Balad reported that local Shiites had carried out the killing, one Mahdi Army fighter in Baghdad said by telephone on Tuesday that reinforcements from the capital had gone to the area after Friday Prayer to help in the killing.

The fighter, who said his brother and uncle had participated, provided the following account of the violence. Fighters from Sadr City filled three transport trucks, and drove to the Shiite village of Dujail, not far from the location of the killings. They spent the night in a Shiite mosque, and after praying on Saturday morning, set off to a rural area called Door al-Senaa, where the Albu Heshmeh tribe, a hard-line Sunni Arab tribe, had settled.

The Mahdi Army member said fighters came from other areas as well, including Shuala, the district where the aide to Mr. Sadr was arrested, in an apparently unrelated incident. Some of the men dressed in Iraqi Army uniforms. Soldiers were also among them, he said.

The fighter's account could not be independently verified, but it was consistent with other chronologies of the violence provided by residents and local police and government officials. The fighter said one Shiite fighter had been killed and two wounded. He said Shiites attacked Sunni checkpoints in Door al-Senaa and on the outskirts of Balad.

On Tuesday, American and Iraqi forces continued to patrol the area, a military spokesman said. Amir Abdul Hadi, the mayor of Balad, said 17 mortars were fired into Balad's primarily Shiite center on Monday night. The American military put the total death toll for four days at more than 60. As of Tuesday morning, another 6 had been killed and 10 wounded in mortar attacks in Balad, the military said.

American forces have detained two Iraqi police officers believed to have been involved in the beheading of the Shiite workers from Balad, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0082553

Sunni residents of Balad said Shiites had come into their homes and forced them to leave. Ali Aziz, 35, said he had moved Friday to stay with relatives in Dhuluiya, a Sunni area across the river, and came back after the weekend to find his house burned.

The police restructuring will move Generals Fleyah and Sabeh to advisory roles in the ministry, General Khalaf said. The Associated Press reported that they were wearing suits instead of the military fatigues typical of the commando forces here at the time of the announcement.

Authorities found 30 bodies across Baghdad on Tuesday, an Interior Ministry official said.

U.S. Must Win War, McCain Says On Visit (MJS)

By Steve Schultze

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 18, 2006

Appleton - U.S. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Tuesday the United States should "accelerate as much as possible" the Iraqi government's assuming a lead role in the Iraq war and taking over many of the responsibilities handled by American soldiers.

But McCain strongly endorsed the continued U.S. role in the war and said he opposed setting any date for withdrawal of American forces.

"The consequences of failure in Iraq are catastrophic," McCain said during a campaign appearance for state Assembly Speaker John Gard of Peshtigo, the Republican candidate for the 8th Congressional District seat.

"We cannot lose it, and I believe we still have the capacity to win," said McCain, a leading Republican presidential prospect for 2008. McCain spoke at a rally and also at a private luncheon fund-raiser for Gard at the Copper Leaf Hotel.

Gard will continue to attract the attention of top-name Republicans. First lady Laura Bush is scheduled to appear at a fund-raiser for Gard next Tuesdayin De Pere.

McCain said the U.S. should not announce a withdrawal date in Iraq.

McCain said he was impressed with Gard's record in the Legislature, where Gard has served for 19 years, the last three as Assembly speaker. McCain said he was unfamiliar with the views of Gard's Democratic opponent, Appleton physician Steve Kagen.

McCain repeated his support for immigration reform legislation that includes some means for illegal immigrants already in the U.S. to achieve citizenship - a stance at odds with Gard's strict "no amnesty" position on immigration. McCain cautioned, however, that the amnesty law approved 20 years ago didn't work.

He endorsed the idea of a guest worker program in which non-citizen immigrants could be in the U.S. legally for jobs.

Kagen held a news conference across the street from the Gard-McCain event in which he accused Gard of hypocrisy for using McCain to campaign for him, saying McCain's view on immigration is at odds with Gard's.

Kerry: Bush Assurances On Iraq A Blunder (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, October 18, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry said Tuesday that President Bush committed "a gigantic blunder" by giving top Iraqi officials assurances that U.S. forces would remain indefinitely in the war-torn country.

Kerry argued that his 2004 rival should have pressured Iraqi leaders to set aside their differences and focus on making progress in assuming responsibility for security, a move that could lead to a reduction in U.S. troop levels.

"The absence of pressure I find is an enormous blunder that gives the Iraqi politicians a free pass to continue the status quo that most Americans understand is a failure, that's not working," Kerry said. "I'm amazed by it."

Kerry is a possible 2008 presidential candidate. He spoke to reporters after appearing at a campaign event with Iowa gubernatorial candidate Chet Culver.

The Massachusetts senator was responding to Bush's 15-minute telephone conversation Monday with the Iraqi prime minister. Bush called Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to quell rumors that the United States planned to set a deadline for Iraqis to assume security responsibilities. In his conversation, Bush said there was no deadline and that American troops would remain as long as they were needed.

DOJ_NMG_0082554

Bush's comments can be compared to his "bring it on" challenge to terrorists, Kerry said.

"I think the president committed a gigantic blunder of the proportion of 'Bring it on,' " said Kerry. "When he has a conversation with the prime minister of Iraq and he climbs out and he says that he told him he doesn't have to worry, we're going to be there as long as it take, you've given a message that they can take as long as they want."

Kerry said even Republicans such as Sens. John Warner and Chuck Hagel are calling for a new strategy in Iraq, and Bush needs to get that message.

Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said Kerry's comments "proves he will say and do anything to try to recapture his 15 minutes of fame."

"While President Bush and prime minister al-Maliki are committed to beating the terrorists in Iraq, John Kerry is devoted to convincing Iowans that he is somehow more capable of defending America this time around," Diaz said.

Troops Try To Curb Warfare North Of Baghdad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

Openly sectarian attacks, targeting scores of people in killings and kidnappings, draw attention to the divided area around Balad.

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops sought to restore order Tuesday to a lush farming district north of the capital where more than 100 Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims have disappeared or been brutally killed in sectarian fighting in recent days.

Thirteen carloads of Shiites from the town of Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, were reported Tuesday to have been kidnapped the previous night. Their fate was unknown.

U.S. military officials tallied at least 63 killed in fighting between Shiite and Sunni villagers around Balad since Saturday. Witnesses and police gave higher estimates of fatalities. The violence has been notable for its character of open warfare and its overtly sectarian targeting.

In addition to the Iraqi dead, four U.S. soldiers were killed Tuesday morning when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, disclosing no further details. At least 63 U.S. soldiers have been killed in Iraq this month.

In Balad, the sectarian fighting first broke out Friday, when at least 19 Shiites were kidnapped and beheaded. The next day, Shiite militiamen abducted and executed dozens of Sunni residents, occasionally pulling people from their cars and setting fire to their bodies. Sunnis then began firing rockets into the mostly Shiite town, killing at least half a dozen people.

Men in police uniforms seized unused Iraqi police checkpoints near Balad on Monday and Tuesday night, according to witnesses and security officials.

Witnesses also reported that large groups of men — identified by locals as Sunni Arab insurgents — carrying AK-47s were flooding Sunni Arab areas east of Balad, positioning rocket launchers and mortars in the villages outside the town. The men demanded identification from passing drivers.

"They stopped us," one Shiite resident of the area said by telephone. "They asked me, 'Are you Sunni or Shiite?' I told them I'm a member of the [Sunni] Mashadani tribe, and showed them a fake identification card."

Four mortar rounds landed in Balad on Monday night and early Tuesday, killing one person and injuring four, a hospital official said.

The provincial governor called Tuesday for an immediate tribal summit. Security forces also sealed off the nearby Shiite town of Dujayl in an effort to prevent a similar outbreak.

U.S. forces began providing assistance to Iraqi military units at the request of Iraqi civic and military leaders.

"We continue to conduct our normal patrols in the city and provide support for Iraqi security forces as they lead operations in stopping the sectarian violence in Balad," said Army Lt. Col. Jeff Martindale, commander of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division. "We are also providing counter-fire support against terrorists conducting indirect fire attacks against innocent civilians in Balad.

"By coordinating all of our efforts, we have seen a marked decrease in violence in the past 24 hours," Martindale said.

DOJ_NMG_0082555

Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and once-dominant Sunni Arabs have been locked in civil conflict across Iraq for months. Hundreds of corpses are found scattered throughout religiously mixed central provinces each week.

At least 50 Iraqis were killed and 44 injured in violence around the country Tuesday.

Balad and Dujayl are particularly vulnerable to sectarian strife. The Shiite towns, with strong ties to clerics in southern Iraq and in Iran, lie in the middle of a heavily Sunni Arab area sympathetic to the insurgency.

The Shiites' vulnerability gives the militias popular support, and the government's weakness gives the latter free rein.

The Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has been unable to tame the violence or the Shiite militia groups that answer to powerful parties in his coalition.

Under pressure from U.S. officials and Iraqi politicians to show changes in a police force widely believed to be infiltrated by the militiamen, Iraq's interior minister has reshuffled a pair of key positions under his control, a spokesman said Tuesday.

Mehdi Ghrawi and Rasheed Fleih, both generals commanding specialized police units in the field, have been reassigned as "part of a routine restructuring process," Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem Khalaf told reporters. Under the restructuring plan, the two generals' posts will be combined and given to one as-yet-unnamed commander.

Khalaf insisted that neither man was implicated in death squad activity. He said Fleih will take over a post in the branch's intelligence division while Ghrawi will become deputy police chief for the capital.

Amid rumors here that the U.S. might back a change in the government of Iraq, former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, a favorite of U.S. Embassy officials, returned this week to Iraq, where he rarely appears though he heads a 25-seat parliamentary bloc.

"His presence is important during this period because the country is passing a crucial stage, during which all leaders of political movements and the politicians must be present in the country," said Wael Abdul Latif, a member of Allawi's coalition.

Modest efforts to diminish the power of radical militias and their political allies often spark civil disturbances or violence. Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's followers called for a massive demonstration in northern Baghdad today to protest the arrest of a leader of their movement.

*

daragahi@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Raheem Salman in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baghdad, Dujayl and the Iraqi cities of Mosul, Basra, Samarra and Tikrit contributed to this report.

U.S. Forces In Balad To Help Stem Carnage (USAT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

USA Today, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. forces were patrolling the streets of the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday after five days of sectarian violence killed 95 people.

Iraq's 4th Army, which took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, had been unable to stem recent bloodshed in Balad. The slayings of 17 Shiite Muslim workers there Friday set off revenge killings of Sunnis by Shiites.

Minority Sunni Arabs in the city of 80,000 have been fleeing across the Tigris River in small boats, Balad police commander Brig. Nebil al-Beldawi said.

He said gunmen wearing black uniforms — trademark clothing of Shiite militiamen — had clashed with residents of Duluiyah, a predominantly Sunni city on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite Balad. Al-Beldawi said the fighters were keeping food and fuel trucks from entering Duluiyah.

Forty mortar rounds hit Balad overnight and into the morning Tuesday, killing at least four people. The death toll in the area reached at least 95 in five days of fighting, police said.

The conflict between Shiites and Sunnis in the Balad area illustrates the threat to the region if Iraq moves toward dividing into three federal states — Shiites in the south, Sunnis in the center and Kurds in the north. Iraq's oil wealth is concentrated in the north and south.

DOJ_NMG_0082556

Regions such as Baghdad and areas immediately to the north, including Balad, are now home to Shiites and Sunnis. Both groups would be expected to fight hard to maintain control of their territory, especially in the capital.

Last week the Shiite-dominated parliament voted to allow moves toward establishing federal states after an 18-month waiting period, despite the objection of nearly all of the Sunni and some Shiite lawmakers.

Iraqi officials, particularly Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, are under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and for violence elsewhere.

The Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week. There is concern that the Shiite-dominated police and security forces have been infiltrated by fighters, who are allied to Shiite political groups.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal had anything to do with militia activity. “Because of their sacrifices and their experience, both of these leaders were named to high-ranking posts,” Khalaf said, flanked by Filah and Sabbih.

The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence. It said 600 of the 3,000 dismissed personnel will face prosecution.

U.S. Forces Move To Quell Sectarian Violence In Balad (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. military has sent troops to the Iraqi city of Balad and the surrounding area to help re-establish order after Iraqi troops and police were unable to quell a surge of violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims over the weekend that left at least 57 people dead.

Confirmation that American troops have been sent back to Balad came as Iraq's bloodletting continued. At least 700 Iraqis have been killed so far this month nationwide, according to numbers provided by police in Iraq's largest provinces. In addition, 58 U.S. soldiers have died so far this month, a trend that if it continues will make October one of the deadliest months for Americans since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

The decision to send American troops into Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, was another setback for U.S. hopes that Iraqi forces will be able to take control of security for the country. Violence has increased steadily throughout Iraq despite an increase of tens of thousands of American-trained Iraqi soldiers and police, and U.S. officials concede that their strategy of training Iraqi troops to replace Americans hasn't worked.

U.S. authorities had turned over responsibility for Balad's security to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 4th Iraqi Army Division, in April.

American forces began returning to the city Saturday and are patrolling there, though it was unclear Tuesday whether Balad and the surrounding area have been pacified.

U.S. Lt. Col. Jeffrey Martindale, the commander of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division, said in a statement released Tuesday that his troops were patrolling alongside Iraqis in Balad. "By coordinating all of our efforts, we have seen a marked decrease in violence in the past 24 hours," the statement quoted Martindale as saying.

Residents, however, said that Balad and the nearby town of al Dulyiyah remained under the control of armed groups that had targeted the residents and may have killed as many as 100 in four days of violence.

The violence in Balad and al Dulyiyah underscores how explosive the rivalry between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities has become and how ineffective Iraqi security forces often are. Residents said some Iraqi police officers had contributed to the slaughter.

Balad is populated primarily by Shiites. Sunnis, however, are the dominant sect in the province, Salah al Din, whose capital, Tikrit, is the birthplace of Saddam Hussein. Samarra, where an explosion Feb. 22 devastated the sacred Shiite Askariya shrine, is in Salah al Din. The shrine bombing touched off Iraq's current sectarian bloodletting.

DOJ_NMG_0082557

Accounts of what took place over the weekend vary, with residents, Iraqi police and American officials giving differing numbers of dead.

U.S. officials say the violence began last Friday when gunmen kidnapped at least 19 Shiites in Balad and murdered them. On Saturday, according to the American account, gunmen seized 38 people in the Sunni town of al Dulyiyah, exactly double the number of Shiites killed the day earlier. Their bodies later were dumped in Balad.

Two U.S. military officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak on the subject, tied Friday's kidnappings and murders to the trial of Saddam Hussein on charges that he ordered the killings of 148 Shiite residents of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982. Dujail and Balad have Salah al Din's only significant concentrations of Shiites.

What happened after Saturday's kidnappings and murders is unclear. Residents say that as many as 100 Sunnis were killed around Balad as Shiite militias took control of the region. American officials said they couldn't confirm that figure.

Residents said Shiite police commanders were involved in some of the killings and that U.S. forces, several thousand of whom are based at nearby Camp Anaconda, made no effort to stop the bloodshed.

So far, American and Iraqi forces have detained two Iraqi police officers allegedly involved in the killings of the Sunnis from al Dulyiyah, Martindale said.

Tense Reprieve As Iraqi Forces Seal River Town (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 17 -- Police and black-clad Shiite militiamen toting machine guns sealed off the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday, guarding against attacks by Sunni insurgents flooding into towns just north of Baghdad, vowing revenge for four days of violence in which dozens of Sunnis were killed.

Calm largely returned to Balad by Tuesday, with Iraqi army troops forcing Shiite militia fighters out of police cars that the militiamen had commandeered for the attacks, said residents reached by telephone in the cut-off town. American troops patrolled the city and guarded one end of a Tigris River bridge that links Balad with Duluiyah, a Sunni farm town also at the epicenter of the outburst of sectarian conflict.

On the Duluiyah end of the bridge, angry Sunni insurgents gathered in force, clutching their PKC machine guns and rocket launchers, standing their tense watch. Abu Achmed, a fighter in the Islamic Army, a Sunni insurgent movement, held a machine gun but wished for more.

"If I had a nuclear bomb, I would wipe it out," the insurgent fighter, who refused to give his full name, said as he stared at Balad across the bridge. "I would level it."

Since Friday, a Shiite militia campaign of killing and expulsion targeting Sunni families served both to deepen sectarian tensions in Iraq and expose the inability or unwillingness of the Shiite-dominated government to control the attacks. The government is headed by two Shiite religious parties whose militias led the campaign, according to local residents, Shiite community leaders, police and hospital officials. Forces of the country's heavily Shiite police forces watched the cleansing campaign, or took part in it, the witnesses said. The Interior Ministry denied the allegation.

Militia attacks on Sunnis in and around Balad ended only when large numbers of Iraqi army troops, seen as more neutral than Iraq's police, were deployed. By Tuesday, all but four or five Sunni families had fled. Until recently, members of the town's Sunni minority had lived and intermarried peacefully with Shiite neighbors for generations.

"What shall I say to Bush, to the armed men, to Maliki?" cried Um Mustafa, sheltering in a stranger's home on the outskirts of Duluiyah, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. She was with her 11-year-old son, Mustafa, and 7-year-old daughter, Reaam. Fleeing Balad this past weekend, the family had watched Shiite militiamen dressed in black beat her pleading husband in the face with rifle butts and take him away. The next day, her phone calls traced her husband's body to the Balad hospital morgue.

"What have I done that my husband gets killed in this way?" she said. "I have Mustafa. And I will teach him how to avenge his father's death by the Mahdi Army, and take his revenge, from them."

DOJ_NMG_0082558

In Balad, mosque loudspeakers that days earlier had cried out for all Sunnis to leave called for their return, promising that the Mahdi Army militia of powerful Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr would protect them.

Drawing on centuries-old codes of revenge, the Sunni fighters in Duluiyah responded by demanding that Balad, encircled by Sunni towns, surrender the militia fighters responsible for the killings -- or face retaliation.

Armed men stopped 13 vehicles near a police checkpoint south of Balad on Monday night and took them and their occupants away to an area known to be a Sunni insurgent dumping ground for murder victims, provincial police said.

The sectarian bloodletting was triggered Friday in Duluiyah when Sunni insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite farmworkers. Balad hospital officials said at least 80 Sunnis were shot to death, many after torture with electric drills. The U.S. military said it had recorded 57 killings. In a statement Tuesday, it said six civilians in Balad had been killed by mortar rounds that were launched, residents said, from Duluiyah. U.S. forces had arrested two Duluiyah policemen suspected of working with insurgents in the killing of the 17 farmworkers, the military said.

The military statement, issued Tuesday morning, cited a "marked decrease in violence" in Balad over the past 24 hours and credited joint operations by Iraqi and U.S. forces for the reprieve.

In attacks elsewhere in Iraq, the Interior Ministry said at least 65 bodies had been found around Baghdad since Sunday night. Bombs and other shootings killed at least 20 other people, including four college students and a female doctor shot to death in the southern city of Basra.

A report released Tuesday by the Brookings Institution-University of Bern Project on Internal Displacement cited Iraqi government data that 234,600 Iraqis were displaced since February, when the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra triggered a wave of violence, especially by Shiite forces. The total was probably low, since many of the displaced had likely sheltered with families, the study said.

"It is likely that sectarian violence is causing lasting change to Iraq's social and demographic make-up," the report stated.

On trial for his life on genocide charges, deposed president Saddam Hussein spoke to the rising violence outside his heavily guarded courtroom in Baghdad's Green Zone. "We are one people, as Iraqis, we have Arabs and Kurds," Hussein said, holding a Koran he has kept at his side throughout his trial. "The only party that benefits from division is Zionism."

Shiite militia leaders say Hussein's decades of ruthless Sunni minority rule paved the way for the sectarian slaughter exploding now. Asked about Iraq's bloodshed, a top Shiite political leader, Abdul Aziz Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, made the same argument.

"The reason is obvious, a great change in Iraq has taken place," he said. "The people who were governing Iraq were unjust. Such people are gone, and I hope for good."

Aldin reported from Duluiyah and from outside Balad.

U.S. Forces Patrol Balad After Violence (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 18, 2006

U.S. forces were back patrolling the streets of the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday after five days of sectarian slaughter killed 95 people, violence that surged out of control despite the efforts of Iraq's best-trained soldiers.

Iraq's 4th Army took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, but had been unable to stem recent attacks in Balad, where the slayings of 17 Shiite Muslim workers on Friday set off revenge killings by Shiites.

Minority Sunnis, who absorbed most of the brutality in the city of 80,000 people, have been fleeing across the Tigris River in small boats, Balad police commander Brig. Nebil al-Beldawi said. On the outskirts of the city, two fuel trucks were attacked and burned.

The police commander said gunmen wearing black uniforms, trademark clothing of Shiite militiamen, had clashed with residents of Duluiyah, a predominantly Sunni city on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite Balad. Al-Beldawi said the militants were keeping food and fuel trucks from entering Duluiyah.

The conflict between Shiites and Sunnis in the Balad area illustrates the threat to the region should Iraq move toward dividing into three federal states — controlled by Shiites in the south, Sunnis in the center and Kurds in the north.

DOJ_NMG_0082559

Regions such as Baghdad and areas immediately to the north, including Balad, are now home to Shiites and Sunnis. Both groups would be expected to fight hard to maintain control of their territory, especially in the capital.

Last week, over the objection of nearly all Sunnis and some Shiites, the Shiite-dominated parliament voted to allow moves toward establishing federal states after an 18-month waiting period.

Dividing the country would close Sunnis off from oil wealth, which would end up with the Kurds in the north and the Shiites in the south. Sunni lands are largely desert or agricultural belts along the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

Forty mortar rounds poured into Balad overnight and into the morning, killing at least four people, bringing the death toll in the area to at least 95 in five days of fighting.

Gunmen in police uniforms hijacked 13 civilian cars and abducted their occupants at a checkpoint outside Balad on Monday night, Salahuddin provincial police reported. They remained missing Tuesday.

Elsewhere in Iraq, 36 people were killed Tuesday in violent attacks and 16 more corpses were found in the capital, their hands and legs bound and showing signs of torture, police reported.

According to an Associated Press count, October is on track to be the deadliest month for Iraqis since the AP began tracking deaths in April 2005. In October, 767 Iraqis have been killed in war-related violence, an average of 45 every day.

That compares to an average daily death toll of about 27 since April 2005. The AP count includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

Iraqi officials, particularly Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, are under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and heavy involvement in violence elsewhere.

The fighters, allied to Shiite political groups, are widely believed to have infiltrated the Shiite-dominated police and security forces and to be allowed freedom to attack Sunni Muslims without fear of arrest or interference.

In apparent response to that pressure, the Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal was a demotion or had anything to do with militia activity.

"Because of their sacrifices and their experience, both of these leaders were named to high-ranking posts," Khalaf said, flanked by Filah and Sabbih.

The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence. It said 600 of the 3,000 dismissed personnel will face prosecution.

The U.S. military symbolically handed control of parts of Salahuddin province to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 4th Iraqi Army Division on April 15. That region included Balad and Duluiyah, as well as surrounding villages. Full control of the province was officially turned over to the 4th Army on Sept. 18.

Under such shifts of control, U.S. forces do not necessarily withdraw, but are deployed to local bases to stand by as backup. Since the latest security crackdown in Baghdad, however, U.S. forces from many regions have shifted to the capital, causing a drawdown of American troop strength in some regions of the country.

On Sept. 7, the U.S. military handed over control of Iraq's armed forces command to al-Maliki's government. Previously, the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, commanded by Gen. George Casey, gave orders to the Iraqi armed forces through a joint American-Iraqi headquarters and chain of command. Senior U.S. and coalition officers controlled larger units, which were in turn commanded by Iraqi officers.

Now, the chain of command flows directly from al-Maliki in his role as Iraqi commander in chief, through the Defense Ministry to an Iraqi military headquarters. From there, the orders flow to Iraqi units on the ground.

As the violence in the Balad region was reaching full pitch on Saturday, the AP asked the U.S. military in Baghdad if American forces were involved in trying to quell the killing.

"As of this time, the (U.S.-led force in Iraq) has not been asked to provide any assistance," the military said in a return e-mail. A request for information on Sunday went unanswered.

DOJ_NMG_0082560

In response to the same question on Monday, the military responded that U.S.-led forces were "partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad."

On Tuesday morning, the military said the U.S.-led force was again "partnering with and assisting the Iraqi police and army by providing quick reaction assets. The Iraqi police and army are currently manning numerous checkpoints around Balad."

By late Tuesday, the military had not responded to questions about when the U.S. military first was asked to intervene and how many American forces were involved.

Training Regimen Problems Afflict U.S. Army Program To Advise Iraqis (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

One of the biggest shocks for Lt. Col. Nick Demas and his troops came before they even deployed to Iraq.

The colonel's soldiers, most of them inexperienced reservists from Maryland, had been tapped to serve as advisers to the Iraqi army. Their job was to live with, train and mentor an Iraqi force buffeted by poor morale, desertions and corruption.

President Bush has touted such advisory teams as key to the U.S. strategy for stabilizing Iraq and bringing American troops home. So Col. Demas and his troops expected some of the best instruction the Army had to offer. What they got was a "phenomenal waste of time," the colonel wrote from Iraq last fall, in a report to his superiors.

"In my 28 years of military service I have never seen such an appalling approach to training," he wrote. "Nowhere else in the Army system would this have been acceptable." His soldiers received only a few hours of instruction in Arabic language, Iraqi culture and advising foreign forces, says Col. Demas, who had previously served in Special Forces units. (Read Col. Demas's after-action report.1)

Other advisers have been just as scathing. "By the time the training was finished, soldiers were demoralized, motivation was nonexistent and the team motto came from the Jo Dee Messina lyric, 'my give-a-damn's busted,' " wrote Lt. Col. James Goodwillie, who led advisers in Iraq, in a review that was passed to senior Army officials last fall. (Read Lt. Goodwillie's after-action report.2)

Senior U.S. military officers in Iraq and the Pentagon say their primary focus is getting Iraqi forces to take over more of the fighting as quickly as possible so U.S. forces can pull back. The 10- to 12-man advisory teams are central to that effort.

In recent weeks, Army officials overseeing the advisory program have begun to acknowledge the gap between the Army's words and deeds. This summer, after two years of biting reviews, the Army rushed to revamp the training advisers receive. It also has begun to assign more experienced troops to advisory teams. "I think we are going to be doing it much, much better than what you have seen in the past," says Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff.

Internal Army reviews and interviews with dozens of advisers show that, thus far, the Army hasn't treated the advisory program as a priority. The job has often fallen to the military's less seasoned second team: reservists, guardsmen and retirees called back to active duty. A 48-page Army study, finished in May and marked "For Official Use Only," concluded that 10- to 12-man advisory teams are too small and "do not have the experience to advise in the various areas they are assigned."

The teams have had to scrounge for equipment that is routinely allocated to big combat units. Advisers going through training today are warned in a PowerPoint briefing: "You will not have all the radios, weapons, night vision devices and field gear issued to a U.S. battalion."

To date, the U.S. has trained and equipped about 307,800 Iraqi army and police forces, up from 196,600 a year ago. But three years into the war, these Iraqi forces don't seem to be improving fast enough to curb surging violence. Daily attacks in Iraq have risen to record levels, and attrition among Iraqi forces remains high. In areas like the restive al Anbar Province, Iraqi units have, on average, only 55% of the soldiers they are supposed to, senior U.S. military officials say.

Other factors, of course, are also contributing to the violence. Centuries-old sectarian grudges and political turmoil are feeding unrest. Both must be addressed through some form of reconciliation, military officials say.

For many advisers, the growing turmoil has been frustrating. "I know we've made a difference. But the insurgency has also become better, more lethal and more capable in my time here," wrote Capt. Phillip Carter, who advised Iraqi police, in an email last month as he prepared to return home. "In theory things should get better with the development of capable Iraqi Army and police units. That's not happening."

DOJ_NMG_0082561

To oversee the new training for advisers, the Army recently tapped one of its 10 combat divisions, the 1st Infantry Division, which had been scheduled to return to Iraq. Instead, its top officers and senior enlisted soldiers will remain at Fort Riley, Kan., to train advisers. When rebuilding the training program, the service started with a "blank piece of paper," says Brig. Gen. James Yarbrough, the division's assistant commander.

Top Army officials also are trying to change a culture that discourages good officers from taking advisory posts. Over the past decade, the path to success has been through conventional combat jobs in big brigades. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's top officer, uses a track analogy to describe the problem. The Army, he says, is full of specialists, or "single-event people." To prevail in today's wars, he says, he needs "pentathletes" with a broader range of experiences.

Last month Gen. Schoomaker's vice chief of staff stressed in a memo to Army officers that serving on an advisory team was "the Army's No. 1 personnel priority" and was exactly the kind of broadening experience the Army chief had been touting.

To fix the advisory program, some military officials say sweeping institutional change is needed. "When there is a limited pool of people for both kinds of jobs -- combat and advisory -- it's clear where the best people will go," says Dale Andrade, a counterinsurgency specialist at the Army's Center of Military History. "The military will always keep its best and brightest in traditionally important combat jobs. Only when forced will this change."

One option under consideration is to double the number of advisers to about 7,000, from about 3,500, by tearing apart some traditional combat brigades and assigning officers and senior soldiers to advisory teams. That would ensure that some of the Army's best officers would take advisory jobs. It would also allow Army officials to double the size of the teams -- which the officials say are too small -- to about 20 troops each.

But doing so would require a change in mind-set for the Army, where training centers and personnel systems are built almost entirely around the 4,000-soldier brigades. It would also be risky. As the number of big U.S. combat brigades decreased, Iraqi units and their advisers would have to pick up the security slack.

The military has recently built a model advisory program -- on a much smaller scale -- for use in other parts of the world. In 2005, the Marine Corps formed a new "Foreign Military Training Unit" to train and mentor troops in places like Chad, Tunisia and the Republic of Georgia. Marines must compete for a spot in the unit. Those who are selected go through six months of intensive training in language, culture and advising foreign forces. Many follow up with two-month cultural immersion tours in places like Morocco.

"We are taking a long-term approach. We want the same people going back to the same places, building relationships and rapport," says Col. Michael Peznola, who heads the unit.

Starting From Scratch

In Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps have had to build a much larger program from scratch -- and in a hurry. When the war kicked off in 2003, U.S. officials had no inkling that an advisory program would be necessary. The last time the Army oversaw such a big effort was in Vietnam, and Iraq wasn't supposed to be anything like that war.

After Iraqi police and army forces cratered under insurgent attacks in the spring of 2004, the U.S. military began rushing advisory teams to Iraq. Their mission was to train Iraqi commanders, to track the development of Iraqi units and to try to prevent them from settling sectarian scores. If Iraqi forces were overwhelmed, the advisers were authorized to call in U.S. firepower to bail the Iraqis out.

To fill some advisory teams, senior commanders asked big combat brigades to give up some soldiers. Often the units gave up troops of a lower rank and experience level than desired, senior Army officials say. The brigades "had a requirement, but they often treated it like guidance and staffed it the best way they could," says Col. Sean Ryan, who served in Iraq with the command that oversaw development of the Iraqi army.

The Army also mobilized reservists for the mission, many of them part-time drill sergeants who had little experience in combat units. "They knew how to teach guys to march, dig fighting positions and fire weapons," says Col. Demas, who in 2006 led an advisory team of the reserve soldiers from Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0082562

The training was minimal. A class on how to oversee a large battalion and brigade staff, for example, consisted of a 90-minute lecture after dinner. Midway through, one sergeant, who hadn't ever served in a combat unit, broke in and complained: "I have absolutely no idea of anything you're talking about," wrote Col. Goodwillie, a senior adviser, in his review of the session.

Officers received only four hours of training on language and culture, and enlisted soldiers got two, according to soldiers who attended. To complete their training, advisers were instructed to guard mock ammunition dumps and to set up checkpoints to screen traffic for 12 days. Once they got to Iraq, advisers say, they never did anything like that.

Col. Demas says his team's primary duty in Iraq was to mentor the staff of a 600-man Iraqi battalion, teaching them to plan missions and analyze intelligence. But once the Iraqi battalion moved into heavy fighting north of Baghdad, the seven enlisted advisers on Col. Demas's 10-man team didn't have the experience to advise the Iraqi officers, the colonel says. Those seven Americans had never served on a U.S. battalion staff and lacked combat experience.

"They were superb soldiers -- dedicated and hard working. They could teach basic soldier skills, but not leader tasks," Col. Demas says. That job fell to Col. Demas and the two officers on his team.

Advisory teams elsewhere in Iraq spent much of their time worrying about even more basic problems, such as trying to get critical supplies for themselves and their Iraqi troops. The small teams are reliant on the big U.S. units for help fixing their Humvees and electrical generators. At Camp Taji, near Baghdad, Staff Sgt. Clyde Daly persuaded a friend to give him 15,000 bottles of Gatorade, which he kept in a locked supply room on the Iraqi side of the base. He traded cases of the drink to other U.S. units for supplies, favors, and help fixing equipment.

Master Sgt. Darren Williams, who served on a team in Diyala Province, says: "We had to beg for support. It was like pulling teeth."

Getting the Iraqis what they needed was even harder. "We'd spend more time working to keep the Iraqis fed and fueled than we would war-fighting," says Col. Jeff Lamb, who returned in July from advisory duty in Diyala Province. It took two weeks to persuade the Ministry of Defense to fire a corrupt food contractor that was serving spoiled food to the Iraqis, says Lt. Jason Karluk, who worked for Col. Lamb. He says it took him 60 days to get the Iraqis decent tents.

The harsh conditions and lack of supplies led to desertions. By the time Lt. Karluk left Iraq, the unit he was advising had shrunk to about 400 soldiers from 700, and the brigade had gone to about 1,600 from 2,400. His team's biggest accomplishment, says the 24-year-old officer, was simply "holding the [Iraqi] unit together."

Amid a barrage of criticism, the Army has begun to beef up training of advisory teams, adding about 50 hours of language and cultural instruction. Commanders say the cultural instruction, although much improved, still has a ways to go. "I'd grade ourselves at a C," says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, who recently began overseeing the advisory training effort at Fort Riley. "What we are doing is OK. It is Iraqi culture 101." He says he plans to tailor more of the instruction to the areas of Iraq where advisers will be working.

Shortage of Role Players

Training exercises have been hindered by a shortage of Iraqi role players. At its major training centers, the Army brings in 250 Arabic speakers to play townspeople, mayors and police chiefs in mock Iraqi villages. At Fort Riley, there were only about a dozen Arab-speaking role players last month, so American troops had to play Iraqi commanders and rank-and-file soldiers.

In early September, Lt. Col. Matthew Stanton led his 10-man advisory team through an exercise intended to teach them to advise Iraqi commanders as their troops search a small, hostile village for weapons and insurgents. When Col. Stanton and an "Iraqi commander" played by a reservist from Utah strode into the mock village, they were accosted by an Iraqi acting as the mayor. "We are sick of the Americans bringing Iraqis to search our villages," he screamed in Arabic. An Iraqi translated for the colonel.

Two dozen villagers began to chant angrily. The mayor demanded that Col. Stanton call off the search. "You'll have to discuss this with the Iraqi commander," Col. Stanton replied. Then he began to walk away.

The Iraqi mayor exploded in anger. "Where are you going?" he screamed in Arabic. "I am talking to you!"

Afterward, the senior sergeant overseeing the exercise praised the team. But Col. Stanton and his men were less than satisfied. "I don't feel like we accomplished anything," said Maj. Eric Lindsay, the No. 3 officer on the team. Everyone nodded.

DOJ_NMG_0082563

Over the next two days, Col. Stanton kept thinking back to his run-in with the Iraqi mayor. Finally, he tracked the man down in the barracks where he was living with other role players. The 47-year-old Iraqi, a Shiite Muslim who had left Baghdad in 2004, was dressed in a white mesh tank top, black shorts and sandals. A tattoo of a dagger, surrounded by Arabic script, adorned his arm.

"Why did you refuse to talk to me when the soldiers were searching my village?" the Iraqi asked. Col. Stanton explained that he was just an adviser, not the commander of the Iraqi forces. The Iraqi told him that it didn't matter. He said the colonel should have taken him by the hand and led him to the Iraqi officer he was advising. "I could have calmed down the entire village," the mayor told him. Col. Stanton scribbled notes in a green field notebook.

"We have been really thirsty for more instruction on how to be an adviser," Col. Stanton said afterward.

There is debate within the Pentagon over whether the advisory teams are too small to be effective. In May, the Center for Army Lessons Learned, based at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., recommended doubling the size of advisory teams to about 25 troops. The Army is built like a pyramid, with large numbers of inexperienced soldiers at the bottom. It has few experienced soldiers to spare. The suggestion alarmed personnel officials, says Col. Steven Mains, who led the study team, which traveled throughout Iraq.

As the situation on the ground in Iraq grows more dire, some officers argue the U.S. must improve the advisory effort quickly. In an article in a Marine Corps journal this summer, Lt. Col. Julian D. Alford, who recently commanded a 900-Marine battalion in western Iraq, outlined a plan to cut sharply overall U.S. troop levels by bolstering the advisory effort.

Col. Alford's Marines had fought alongside an Iraqi army brigade and their U.S. advisers to drive insurgents from Qaim, which had been a main entry point for foreign fighters coming into Iraq from Syria. He says he left Qaim in June convinced that advisory teams were too small to help Iraqi forces stand on their own.

"The Iraqis can't make it with the [advisory] teams we have now," he says. "They will fall flat on their face." But if the U.S. military doubles the size of the advisory effort, embedding more advisers in smaller Iraqi units where most of the fighting is done, he says, the Iraqis in his former region could hold off the insurgency. To field the larger teams, he would send only some of the senior enlisted troops and officers from big U.S. units, leaving junior troops at home. He would also give them far more language and cultural training.

"The real question is: How should we be organized, trained and equipped to fight these 21st-century wars?" he asks. "This is a different way of looking at warfare."

Write to Greg Jaffe at greg.jaffe@wsj.com6

655,000 War Dead? (WSJ)

By Steven E. Moore

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

After doing survey research in Iraq for nearly two years, I was surprised to read that a study by a group from Johns Hopkins University claims that 655,000 Iraqis have died as a result of the war. Don't get me wrong, there have been far too many deaths in Iraq by anyone's measure; some of them have been friends of mine. But the Johns Hopkins tally is wildly at odds with any numbers I have seen in that country. Survey results frequently have a margin of error of plus or minus 3% or 5% -- not 1200%.

The group -- associated with the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health -- employed cluster sampling for in-person interviews, which is the methodology that I and most researchers use in developing countries. Here, in the U.S., opinion surveys often use telephone polls, selecting individuals at random. But for a country lacking in telephone penetration, door-to-door interviews are required: Neighborhoods are selected at random, and then individuals are selected at random in "clusters" within each neighborhood for door-to-door interviews. Without cluster sampling, the expense and time associated with travel would make in-person interviewing virtually impossible.

However, the key to the validity of cluster sampling is to use enough cluster points. In their 2006 report, "Mortality after the 2003 invasion of Iraq: a cross-sectional sample survey," the Johns Hopkins team says it used 47 cluster points for their sample of 1,849 interviews. This is astonishing: I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points.

DOJ_NMG_0082564

Neither would anyone else. For its 2004 survey of Iraq, the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) used 2,200 cluster points of 10 interviews each for a total sample of 21,688. True, interviews are expensive and not everyone has the U.N.'s bank account. However, even for a similarly sized sample, that is an extraordinarily small number of cluster points. A 2005 survey conducted by ABC News, Time magazine, the BBC, NHK and Der Spiegel used 135 cluster points with a sample size of 1,711 -- almost three times that of the Johns Hopkins team for 93% of the sample size.

What happens when you don't use enough cluster points in a survey? You get crazy results when compared to a known quantity, or a survey with more cluster points. There was a perfect example of this two years ago. The UNDP's survey, in April and May 2004, estimated between 18,000 and 29,000 Iraqi civilian deaths due to the war. This survey was conducted four months prior to another, earlier study by the Johns Hopkins team, which used 33 cluster points and estimated between 69,000 and 155,000 civilian deaths -- four to five times as high as the UNDP survey, which used 66 times the cluster points.

The 2004 survey by the Johns Hopkins group was itself methodologically suspect -- and the one they just published even more so.

Curious about the kind of people who would have the chutzpah to claim to a national audience that this kind of research was methodologically sound, I contacted Johns Hopkins University and was referred to Les Roberts, one of the primary authors of the study. Dr. Roberts defended his 47 cluster points, saying that this was standard. I'm not sure whose standards these are.

Appendix A of the Johns Hopkins survey, for example, cites several other studies of mortality in war zones, and uses the citations to validate the group's use of cluster sampling. One study is by the International Rescue Committee in the Democratic Republic of Congo, which used 750 cluster points. Harvard's School of Public Health, in a 1992 survey of Iraq, used 271 cluster points. Another study in Kosovo cites the use of 50 cluster points, but this was for a population of just 1.6 million, compared to Iraq's 27 million.

When I pointed out these numbers to Dr. Roberts, he said that the appendices were written by a student and should be ignored. Which led me to wonder what other sections of the survey should be ignored.

With so few cluster points, it is highly unlikely the Johns Hopkins survey is representative of the population in Iraq. However, there is a definitive method of establishing if it is. Recording the gender, age, education and other demographic characteristics of the respondents allows a researcher to compare his survey results to a known demographic instrument, such as a census.

Dr. Roberts said that his team's surveyors did not ask demographic questions. I was so surprised to hear this that I emailed him later in the day to ask a second time if his team asked demographic questions and compared the results to the 1997 Iraqi census. Dr. Roberts replied that he had not even looked at the Iraqi census.

And so, while the gender and the age of the deceased were recorded in the 2006 Johns Hopkins study, nobody, according to Dr. Roberts, recorded demographic information for the living survey respondents. This would be the first survey I have looked at in my 15 years of looking that did not ask demographic questions of its respondents. But don't take my word for it -- try using Google to find a survey that does not ask demographic questions.

Without demographic information to assure a representative sample, there is no way anyone can prove -- or disprove -- that the Johns Hopkins estimate of Iraqi civilian deaths is accurate.

Public-policy decisions based on this survey will impact millions of Iraqis and hundreds of thousands of Americans. It's important that voters and policy makers have accurate information. When the question matters this much, it is worth taking the time to get the answer right.

Mr. Moore, a political consultant with Gorton Moore International, trained Iraqi researchers for the International Republican Institute from 2003 to 2004 and conducted survey research for the Coalition Forces from 2005 to 2006.

Barney And Baghdad (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

In the competition for the biggest “October surprise” of the 2006 election cycle, it might seem hard to top North Korea’s nuclear test. But I’d suggest that in time we’ll come to see the events unfolding — or rather, unraveling — in Iraq today as the real October surprise, because what we’re seeing there seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive.

DOJ_NMG_0082565

For those of you too young to remember, the Tet offensive was the series of attacks undertaken by the Vietcong and North Vietnamese armies between Jan. 30, 1968 — the start of the Lunar New Year — and June 1969. Although the Vietcong and Hanoi were badly mauled during Tet, they delivered, through the media, such a psychological blow to U.S. hopes of "winning" in Vietnam that Tet is widely credited with eroding support for President Johnson and driving him to withdraw as a candidate for re-election.

Total U.S. troop deaths in Iraq this month have reached at least 53, putting October on a path to be the third deadliest month of the entire war for the U.S. military. Iraqis are being killed at a rate of 100 per day now. The country has descended into such a Hobbesian state that even Saddam called on Iraqis from his prison cell to stop killing each other. He told insurgents, "Remember you are God's soldiers and, therefore, you must show genuine forgiveness and put aside revenge over the spilled blood of your sons and brothers." When Saddam is urging calm, you know things have hit a new low.

The violence in Iraq is not as coordinated as in Vietnam. You have small gangs of Sunnis and Shiites killing each other in sectarian clashes, Baathists and jihadists attacking U.S. and Iraqi forces in more organized efforts, Sunnis fighting with Kurds over turf in northern Iraq, and, on top of it all, rampant crime. Therefore, it's hard to identify a specific military order to step up the violence in Iraq, as in Tet.

But while there may be no single hand coordinating the upsurge in violence in Iraq, enough people seem to be deliberately stoking the fires there before our election that the parallel with Tet is not inappropriate. The jihadists want to sow so much havoc that Bush supporters will be defeated in the midterms and the president will face a revolt from his own party, as well as from Democrats, if he does not begin a pullout from Iraq.

The jihadists follow our politics much more closely than people realize. A friend at the Pentagon just sent me a post by the "Global Islamic Media Front" carried by the jihadist Web site Ana al-Muslim on Aug. 11. It begins: "The people of jihad need to carry out a media war that is parallel to the military war and exert all possible efforts to wage it successfully. This is because we can observe the effect that the media have on nations to make them either support or reject an issue."

It then explains that for jihadist videos of attacks on Americans to have the biggest impact, "Some persons will be needed who are proficient in the use of computer graphics including Photoshop, 3D Studio Max, or other programs that the people of jihad will need to design ... video clips about the operations."

Finally, the Web site suggests that jihadists flood e-mail and video of their operations to "chat rooms," "television channels," and to "famous U.S. authors who have public e-mail addresses ... such as Friedman, Chomsky, Fukuyama, Huntington and others." This is the first time I've ever been on the same mailing list with Noam Chomsky.

It would be depressing to see the jihadists influence our politics with a Tet-like media/war frenzy. But there are only two reasons now for the U.S. to remain in Iraq: because it thinks that staying will make things better or that leaving will make things drastically worse. Alas, it is increasingly hard to see how our presence is making things better. Iraq, under our nose, is breaking apart into so many little pieces that no political solution seems to be in the offing, because no Iraqi leader can deliver his faction anymore — and there does not seem to be an Iraqi center capable of coming together. While leaving would no doubt exacerbate the civil war, staying in Iraq indefinitely to prevent even more Shiites and Sunnis from killing one another is not going to fly with the U.S. public much longer.

Bob Woodward quoted President Bush as saying that he will not leave Iraq, even if the only ones still supporting him are his wife, Laura, and his dog Barney. If the jihadist Tet offensive continues gaining momentum, Mr. Bush may be left with just Barney.

Military Honors For A Changing Front (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan not only have changed the methods U.S. troops use to fight an urban insurgency, they also have caused the U.S. military services to change the way they look at honoring troops who are fighting on the difficult battlefields.

The Marine Corps this year changed the rules that determine which Marines are eligible for the Combat Action Ribbon, an honor that previously required troops to both receive and return fire against an enemy. Recognizing that the deadliest and most effective enemy weapon in Iraq has been the roadside bomb, officials changed the criteria to include anyone who has been exposed to the detonation of such bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices.

DOJ_NMG_0082566

"Prior to this, a service member had to be involved in a combat firefight to qualify," said Lt. Col. Jim Taylor, acting head of the Marine Corps' military awards branch. "There was a lot of heartburn over that, especially with the nature of the conflict in Iraq," he said.

Taylor said the Marines reviewed all cases in which the Combat Action Ribbon was denied during the operations in Afghanistan and Iraq in order to apply the new criteria, and out of about 3,400 such cases, 85 were found to meet the award's qualifications. About 75,000 Combat Action Ribbons have been issued for the two conflicts so far, Taylor said.

The Combat Action Ribbon has a series of colored bands, beginning with one wide blue and one wide yellow band; a set of narrow red, white and blue bands; another wide yellow band; and a wide red band.

The Marines are now in a second phase of review, during which all active-duty Marines can submit recommendations for the same award based on the new rules. The change means that thousands of Marines could qualify if they were directly exposed to a roadside bomb detonation. The next phase, set to begin in January, will allow all Marines who are no longer on active duty to apply for similar recognition, Taylor said. The change is retroactive to Oct. 7, 2001, the beginning of the war in Afghanistan.

The Army last year introduced its Combat Action Badge, which recognizes soldiers who are exposed to enemy action but are not officially in combat roles. That badge was designed to honor soldiers such as military police, truck drivers and fuel specialists who daily face the dangers of war -- such as roadside bombs -- in Iraq's urban battlefield.

The Army's award was also the first nonmedical combat distinction to honor women who are caught in battle, whereas previous similar honors were reserved for infantrymen. The change in the badge was made in recognition that any soldier fighting in Iraq or Afghanistan can come in contact with combat situations at almost any time.

Defense Department officials are also conducting the first thorough review of military-wide honors since 1996, hoping to standardize and clarify the criteria for several awards in light of the ongoing overseas wars. That review, which could take six to eight months, is expected to provide common language in all services for awards such as the Purple Heart, given for injuries during combat, and valor devices.

Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, said the department review will look at whether there is a way to honor troops who serve multiple tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, because currently they can receive only one recognition in either campaign. The review group also will examine whether some troops who are involved in the campaigns but are not actually in the field could be eligible for campaign awards.

One example Upton cited is the Air Force rule that an airman must serve in a theater of operations to earn a campaign medal, but that would exclude airmen who load weapons on bombers in the United States that then fly overseas on operations.

"The evolving nature of warfare demands that we review policies," David S.C. Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness, said in a statement. "For example, in the case of expeditionary medals, we must review how we define the operating 'box,' whether it is the theatre of direct action, or whether it might extend far beyond."

Farewell On A Dark Tarmac (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

SATHER AIR BASE, Iraq -- His commanders gave Airman 1st Class LeeBernard E. Chavis the proud emblem of their squadron-- a blue-and-yellow flag known as a guidon -- because they knew he would rather die than lose it.

The 21-year-old District native carried it from the unit's home base in the hills of Georgia to the sands of Kuwait and onto the streets of Baghdad, where, on Saturday, he was killed by a sniper as he tried to keep civilians away from a suspected roadside bomb.

"The colors have dropped," said Maj. Thomas Miner, commander of the 824th Security Forces Squadron, as he waited to escort Chavis's body onto a C-130 Hercules late Sunday. His bottom lip quivered and his eyes turned glassy. "But we've got to pick them back up."

DOJ_NMG_0082567

More than 200 personnel from the squadron and other units stood in near-total blackness on a tarmac and saluted the man who became the unit's first combat fatality in Iraq. The guidon was solemnly carried forward, for the first time by someone else. Then a white unmarked truck pulled up and the door swung open.

"Reach for remains!" a voice barked.

The sight of the coffin, draped in a large American flag and carried toward the plane by six pallbearers, slowly distorted the faces of 18 members of Chavis's sub-unit, known as a flight, who stood in two neat rows facing the makeshift charnel.

The bottom lip of one young woman in baggy fatigues quivered, and then she began to cry hysterically, her head bobbing up and down.

A chaplain intoned: "There is no greater love that can be displayed than for a person to lay down their life for others."

Another woman started to cry, and soon two men standing nearby joined her.

The chaplain continued: "His love is proven by this ultimate sacrifice."

The legs of several airmen buckled slightly. Within a few minutes, nearly the entire flight was sobbing uncontrollably. The face of Staff Sgt. Kyle Luker turned bright red as tears streamed down his cheeks.

This type of ceremony, known as a patriot detail, is rarely observed by anyone outside the military -- not by the president, not by members of Congress, not by the children or spouse of the fallen service member. The squadron commander allowed a Washington Post reporter embedded with an affiliated unit to witness, but not photograph, the ceremony for Chavis.

He was one of 2,767 members of the U.S. armed forces or employees of the Defense Department to have died so far in the Iraq war, according to the Pentagon.

With distant gunfire punctuating the night as the ceremony approached, Chavis's friends voiced questions about the war and this latest death. One asked: Was it worth the life of a 21-year-old about to propose to his girlfriend? Another wondered aloud: Who among us will die next? And a third asked: Why would God take the life of a devoted Christian who loved to sing gospel and write R&B songs?

"It makes you question almost everything" observed Luker, 27. Still, he said, "we're not here to ask the questions and get them answered. We're here to complete the mission. We'll worry about that stuff when we get home."

Squadron members sat on the dusty tarmac and remembered their friend: How he used to trash-talk while he sprinted on the basketball court. How he planned to join the FBI or the CIA or the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives once he left the Air Force.

And how he used to write songs expressing dreams of what he'd do after leaving the bloodshed of Baghdad behind. A few minutes before the coffin arrived, one of his best friends, Airman 1st Class Ro-Derick Taylor, chanted one of the songs that the two men wrote together:

Sometimes I wish that we could go
Sometimes to a place where no one knows
Sometimes when you and me could be alone
Sometimes, sometimes.

Waiting members of Chavis's squadron noted that his aggressive work in the turret of his Humvee had possibly saved their own lives. Luker, a hulking airman with a square jaw, appeared shaken. "We have to be strong," he said. "That's what Chavis would have wanted."

Chavis was born in the District and lived there until he was 6. Then his family moved to Hampton, Va., where he attended high school. His parents recently moved to Reston.

Last year, he did a tour in the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk, then rotated back to Georgia. There he got into a bit of disciplinary trouble, which his comrades declined to describe. But he begged to redeploy to the war zone, to Baghdad, and his commanders decided to give him a second chance. They gave him the guidon as a sign of their confidence in him.

His unit was attached to the 372nd Military Police Battalion, which trains Iraqi police in western Baghdad. His group frequently moved through the city streets in convoys, bound for training duty. On those trips, Chavis served as lead gunner, manning a .50-caliber machine gun in the turret atop the front Humvee. He was responsible for clearing a path for the rest of his team, laying down fire to provide cover if needed.

DOJ_NMG_0082568

As his convoy rumbled through central Baghdad on Saturday just after 2 p.m., squadron members recounted, it came upon an Iraqi police unit that asked for help in dealing with a suspected roadside bomb. The unit began to set up a cordon; Chavis's job was to protect his fellow airmen and prevent civilians from rushing into the potential blast area.

Confused women and children tried to walk into the area, so Chavis rose out of the protection of his turret to try to shoo them away. "Keep away! Danger!" he shouted. Just then, a sniper from a nearby building shot him in the back of the head. He collapsed into the Humvee and died instantly.

On Sunday night, the pallbearers carried the coffin aboard the plane. Then almost the entire flight marched into the aircraft to pay final respects.

But one lanky airman couldn't move. His friends tried to push him forward, but he wouldn't budge. He continued to stare straight ahead as he cried and cried.

Eventually, the mourners left the plane. Then the crew closed the plane's door. It was nearly pitch-black on the tarmac again. But by the winking, distant lights of the capital, it was possible to make out the unit's guidon, fluttering gently in the night sky.

Somalia Simmers (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

FOUR MONTHS ago an Islamic fundamentalist movement gained control of Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, after defeating an alliance of local warlords backed by the United States. Since then the Islamic Courts Union, as the alliance is called, has expanded its control over much of southern Somalia, including the port city of Kismaayo. It has alternatively negotiated and skirmished with a rival, internationally backed government that clings to a base in the western town of Baidoa. It has come to the brink of war with neighboring Ethiopia, which reportedly has sent troops into Somalia, and has won the support of Ethiopia's hostile neighbor, Eritrea.

The Islamic courts' central council has meanwhile come under the control of an extremist who is on the U.S. government's list of terrorists. One of its principal militia commanders is linked to murders of Western aid workers and journalists and is believed to be sheltering three members of the al-Qaeda movement who were involved in the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. There are reports that more foreign fighters are arriving in Mogadishu to join the movement, drawn by its call for jihad against Christians in Ethiopia.

What is the United States doing about this dangerous combination of an emerging terrorist base and possible regional war in East Africa? The sad and alarming answer is next to nothing. Since its allies were driven out of the Somali capital in June, the Bush administration has had few contacts and obtained scant intelligence about the Islamic courts. Officials maintain they don't even know for sure whether Ethiopian troops are in the country; the Somalis say they have seen and even fought them, but the Ethiopian government denies it.

In short, Somalia is looking more and more like Afghanistan in the late 1990s -- dominated by an Islamic fundamentalist movement that shelters al-Qaeda; prone to the meddling of neighbors; virtually ignored by the United States. Sadly, the chief difference is that, because of poor intelligence, even a military strike such as that attempted by the Clinton administration against Osama bin Laden in 1998 looks unfeasible.

The administration may have several international crises to worry about, but it cannot afford to neglect this gathering threat. It ought to appoint a special envoy to the region who could begin to work with the Ethiopian, Eritrean and regional Somali governments, and try to restrain them from touching off a regional war. The administration should seek contact with moderate elements in the Islamic courts (there are some) and encourage the ongoing mediation efforts of the Arab League. It should exercise greater control over the Somali coastline. It should consider giving diplomatic recognition to the breakaway northern region of Somaliland, which has a benign government. If the terrorist threat in Somalia cannot be eliminated by direct action, it must at least be contained.

DOJ:

Harry Jaffe: D.C.'s New Top Lawman Is A Stranger To Our Streets (WASHEX)

DOJ_NMG_0082569

By Harry Jaffe

Washington Examiner, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Meet Jeffrey Taylor, who is suddenly and without much fanfare the most powerful law enforcement official in D.C. Taylor is a 41-year-old lawyer. He was born and raised in small towns in Northern California. He played high school football and got A's. He went to Stanford University and got a law degree from Harvard. He served as a prosecutor in San Diego, worked for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah — where he helped write the U.S. Patriot Act — and did a stint with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. Most recently, he was counsel to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez.

Now he's our top lawman.

What, among his stellar credentials, qualifies Taylor to become the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia? He has experience in fighting terrorists, but can he battle the terrorists who shoot up corners in Anacostia and shake down D.C. residents in Georgetown?

These are some of the questions Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton will have on her mind today when Taylor is scheduled to have his first meeting with our representative in Congress.

"He will be essentially a district attorney," says Norton, who was not consulted on Taylor's appointment. "The great majority of his cases will be criminal cases from the District of Columbia."

I have not met Taylor, who lives with his wife on Capital Hill. I am not passing judgment on him. But it worries me when the top prosecutor in town has never worked our streets.

I wonder how a lawyer who has succeeded among the hard-core Republican elite and specialized in national security matters can direct homicide cases in the lawless lanes of D.C. Our U.S. Attorney's Office is unique. With 350 lawyers, it is the largest among federal prosecutorial operations. More importantly, it is the only one in the nation that handles both federal and local criminal cases. In every other major city, a local district attorney — elected or appointed — prosecutes local thugs. It is a sad and humbling aspect of Home Rule that we in D.C. have a federal appointee as our D.A.

Taylor succeeds Ken Wainstein, who moves up to run the Justice Department's new National Security Division. Wainstein was terrific for D.C. Like Taylor, he was a favorite at Main Justice, and he also held a top job at FBI headquarters; but Wainstein also worked as a line prosecutor here in D.C. for years. He locked up murderers. He knew our turf, he put his prosecutors in the community, he sent them after gang-bangers and local hoodlums. Jeff Taylor made his mark as an elite terrorist hunter. He helped create the Patriot Act. A few weeks ago he was Alberto Gonzales' top counselor on terrorism and national security.

My fear is that he will favor national security prosecutions over keeping D.C. residents secure. When Bill Clinton was president, Eleanor Holmes Norton helped select federal judges and the U.S. Attorney. George W. Bush appoints with little regard for D.C.'s needs.

No wonder Norton believes D.C. should have its own district attorney.Harry Jaffe has been covering the Washington area since 1985. E-mail him at hjaffe@washingtonian.com.

7 Departments Miss Senator's Deadline To List High-cost IT Projects (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, October 18, 2006

Seven departments have missed a deadline to detail their most expensive information technology projects for a Senate subcommittee.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., last month directed all agencies to submit lists by Oct. 13 of IT projects worth more than $250,000 to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on financial management, which he chairs.

"A non-response raises the level of concern . . . that there may be inefficiencies," said John Hart, a spokesman for Coburn. "The only way those questions can be answered is a complete response."

For each project, Coburn requested that agencies note the project's vendor, when work began, the project's original estimated cost and how much money has been spent so far. The letter also asked whether cost overruns have occurred, if a new cost estimate has been made and what that estimate is.

DOJ_NMG_0082570

As of Oct. 16, the Agriculture, Energy, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Justice, State and Veterans Affairs departments had not responded, according to Hart. All other departments had either submitted the information or requested an extension, he said. Coburn has not yet reviewed the lists that were received, Hart added.

HUD spokesman Jerry Brown said the department had not responded because officials there mistakenly assumed they had 30 days to reply after receiving the letter on Sept. 25.

"We are still working to get [Coburn] the information," Brown said.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department contacted the senator's office on Oct. 16 and is creating a list.

None of the other departments responded immediately to requests for comment.

Coburn, a consistent critic of what he says is wasteful spending in areas such as federal travel, recently turned his attention to information technology expenditures, which have grown rapidly over the last five years. Coburn chaired a subcommittee hearing on the topic in September and said he will hold additional hearings on specific projects.

Following pressure from Coburn and from the Government Accountability Office, the Office of Management and Budget last month released lists of federal IT projects that are considered to be at high risk or that are on a management watch list. OMB puts projects on the high-risk list due to factors including importance to an agency and cost. The management watch list includes IT projects for which the business cases demonstrate one or more planning weaknesses.

Justice Task Force Looks Into Privacy (FCW)

By John Moore

Federal Computer Week, October 18, 2006

A task force has issued a series of recommendations regarding privacy in justice information systems.

The Privacy Technology Focus Group was chartered to examine the exchange of personally identifiable information, focusing on justice and public safety data. Last November, the Justice Department brought together a group of public- and private-sector specialists to look into privacy technology. The group's working teams covered areas such as access and authentication, data aggregation and dissemination, and identity theft.

A report issued earlier this month that stemmed from the focus group's activities offers suggestions. Some relate to the Global Justice Extensible Markup Language Data Model (JXDM). For example, the report recommends reviewing and creating privacy metadata in Global JXDM. That metadata would describe sensitivity, use limitations and other characteristics of data.

In addition, the report suggests funding and training to encourage state and local agencies to move toward Global JXDM, the National Information Exchange Model and a baseline definition of identity data elements. Global JXDM is an XML standard designed for criminal justice information exchange. The National Information Exchange Model extends Global JXDM to other information domains.

Other recommendations include:

Appointing a team of policy and technology specialists from the public and private sectors to assess and revise "Fair Information Principles as they relate to specific justice circumstances and technologies," the report states. Those principles come from government information-handling guidelines that have accumulated in the past two decades.

Developing a strategic plan to use anonymization in justice, public safety and homeland security initiatives to protect privacy while improving information sharing. "Anonymizing data permits multiple parties to correlate data from multiple sources without revealing personally identifiable information until or unless appropriate," according to the report.

Establishing a grant condition that requires applicants to address identity management within programs and systems development backed by national funding. The focus group's report was prepared under the auspices of the Office of Justice Programs' Bureau of Justice Assistance in conjunction with DOJ's Global Justice Information Sharing Initiative. The group's steering committee included representatives from DOJ, IJIS Institute, Global XML Structure Task Force and the National Network to End Domestic Violence Fund.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0082571

Trial Judge Vacates Conviction Of Late Enron Founder Lay (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 18, 2006

The late Ken Lay, the Enron founder who was convicted in May of deceiving investors about Enron's finances, is once again innocent in the eyes of the law.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the trial of Lay and his colleague Jeff Skilling in Houston earlier this year, issued an order Tuesday vacating Lay's conviction and dismissing the indictment against him.

"The court concludes that Lay's conviction must be vacated," wrote Lake in a 13-page opinion. "The indictment against Kenneth L. Lay is dismissed."

Ever since Lay died of a heart attack in Aspen, Colo., July 5, following his conviction at trial but before he had the chance to appeal the verdict, Lake's ruling has been widely expected. As a matter of law, a conviction against a criminal defendant is not final until the defendant has had the chance to appeal the verdict. Therefore, Lay's death short-circuited the full legal process to which he was entitled.

"Mr. Lay never had the chance to appeal," said Sam Buffone of Ropes and Gray, who represented the estate of Ken Lay. "We were eager to appeal."

Prosecutors fought an uphill battle against Lake's decision, arguing last month that he should postpone his ruling until Congress had the chance to pass a new law changing the ground rules for defendants who died before getting a hearing before an appellate court. But Congress never seriously considered the new law.

The ruling is a boost for members of Lay's family, who no longer face criminal forfeiture proceedings by the Department of Justice. After Lay was found guilty in May, Justice took steps to track down and seize $40 million from Lay, even though he testified in his trial that he was virtually bankrupt.

Justice, which plans to pursue forfeiture in civil proceedings, issued the following statement Tuesday: "Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial. We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

As for Skilling, Lay's co-defendant, the ruling has no impact. In May, jurors convicted Skilling, who served as CEO of Enron in 2001, of 18 separate criminal charges. He is slated to be sentenced on Monday.

When Lay died in July, some Houston residents and former Enron shareholders vented their rage that he had escaped a prison term. Many, on the Web and on talk radio, demanded an autopsy. But an autopsy conducted in Aspen showed that Lay did indeed have heart problems, and that he died of natural causes.

Despite the dismissal of the indictment against Lay, some observers believe the former Enron CEO will never escape the shadow of his role in Enron's collapse. "He's innocent with an asterisk," says Christopher Bebel, a Houston attorney who followed the case closely. "History will accurately record this episode, and the slate will not be wiped clean. When future generations look back, they will look at it as a situation where guilty verdicts were reached. A massive indictment was brought after $60 billion in market valuation evaporated, and a jury held him accountable."

Conviction Of Enron's Lay Is Vacated By Judge (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake Tuesday vacated the conviction of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, who was convicted on May 25 on fraud and conspiracy charges and suffered a fatal heart attack on July 5. (Read the text of the ruling.1)

Established law in the judicial Fifth Circuit, which includes Texas, and elsewhere holds that when a defendant dies before he or she has the chance to complete an appeal, the conviction essentially gets wiped away.

According to Judge Lake's opinion, the government had argued that Mr. Lay's estate shouldn't get to keep the proceeds of fraud that would otherwise be subject to forfeiture and distribution to victims of the crimes. Judge Lake rejected this argument, citing precedent stating that an individual who suffered a loss may pursue reimbursement in civil court. Although the government had asked Judge Lake to defer his ruling so it could seek retroactive legislation in Congress to let the conviction stand, he said "the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent."

DOJ_NMG_0082572

"We are pleased with the ruling and are glad that this brings to a close the criminal proceedings against Mr. Lay," said Ropes & Gray LLP's Samuel Buffone, the lawyer for Mr. Lay's estate.

"Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial," said Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman. "We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

Judge Throws Out Kenneth Lay's Conviction (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 17 — A federal judge on Tuesday threw out the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Kenneth L. Lay, the former Enron executive, who died of heart failure in July while on vacation in Colorado.

Judge Simeon T. Lake III ruled that the conviction must be voided because Mr. Lay cannot pursue an appeal his guilty verdict.

The decision, which had been expected, prevents the government from trying to seize more than $43.5 million from Mr. Lay's estate that prosecutors claimed he stole from Enron before it collapsed in 2001.

Mr. Lay, who was 64, died about six weeks after he and another former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, were convicted of spearheading the fraud that led to Enron's collapse in December 2001.

"We're very pleased that the criminal case against Mr. Lay is now over," said Sam Buffone, the lawyer who successfully filed the motions to have both Mr. Lay's indictment and conviction dismissed. A jury found Mr. Lay guilty in May of six counts of conspiracy and fraud, and Judge Lake, in a separate trial, found him guilty of four counts of bank fraud.

Mr. Skilling, who was convicted of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, is scheduled to be sentenced on Monday.

Prosecutors has initially sought $139.3 million from Mr. Skilling and $43.5 billion from Mr. Lay. But after Mr. Lay's death, the government moved to force Mr. Skilling to pay the entire $182.8 million.

Mr. Lay, who before his trial presented the image of an avuncular philanthropist who played golf with presidents, was often prickly and argumentative on the witness stand. He appeared sullen, shook his head dismissively and slouched in his chair throughout the four-month trial. Even after his conviction, he maintained that he had not committed any crimes and that, moreover, Enron was a healthy company brought down by unfavorable news coverage and the deceit of his chief financial officer, Andrew S. Fastow.

In his 13-page decision, Judge Lake cited established case law that required revocation of convictions if defendants die without opportunity to appeal. The Justice Department had asked the judge to delay ruling until Congress had time to pass legislation that would have retroactively allowed Mr. Lay's conviction to stand. But lawmakers recessed before considering the matter.

Tuesday's decision will make it harder for former Enron employees and shareholders to lay claim to the millions in Mr. Lay's estate because they cannot point to his criminal conviction as proof of wrongdoing.

But, David Berg, a defense lawyer in Houston, said, "The civil suits are going after deeper pockets like the investment banks" that have been accused of participating in the fraud.

While many former Enron employees expressed outrage and Internet blogs seethed that Mr. Lay's conviction had been "erased from the books," others were resigned.

"I'm numb to the whole thing," said Tina Tennant, who was an executive assistant at Enron and is part of the class-action lawsuit. "It's over and it's really over now."

Judge Revokes Lay's Conviction (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082573

A federal judge in Houston yesterday wiped away the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Kenneth L. Lay, the Enron Corp. founder who died of heart disease in July, bowing to decades of legal precedent but frustrating government attempts to seize nearly $44 million from his family.

The ruling worried employees and investors who lost billions of dollars when the Houston energy-trading company filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001. It also came more than a week after Congress recessed for the November elections without acting on a last-ditch Justice Department proposal that would have changed the law to allow prosecutors to seize millions of dollars in investments and other assets that Lay controlled.

With the judge's order, Lay's conviction on 10 criminal charges will be erased from the record. "The indictment against Kenneth L. Lay is dismissed," U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III wrote in a spare, 13-page order.

Legal analysts said Lake's ruling closely hewed to a long-held doctrine called abatement, which allows a conviction to be vacated if defendants die before they are able to exercise their right to appeal. Courts typically rule that defendants' constitutional rights to challenge their convictions outweigh other considerations, and the law hesitates to punish the dead, the analysts said.

Samuel J. Buffone, a Washington-based lawyer for Lay, said the family was pleased with the ruling. "As far as we're concerned, this is the last step," Buffone said. "It's as if the indictment never occurred."

But governance experts said Lay's name forever will be linked with the era's most complex and far-reaching corporate fraud.

"A lot of lives were ruined, both the perpetrators' and the victims,' " University of Tennessee corporate governance expert Joseph V. Carcello said. "This happened on his watch. Even if he's not legally culpable, he's culpable as a manager."

Regulators at the Securities and Exchange Commission still may pursue their civil case against Lay's estate, but their task will be more difficult because they can no longer introduce the fact of his conviction and instead must prove again, in a resource-intensive trial, that he broke the law. The SEC case has been stayed pending resolution of the status of Lay's criminal conviction. The agency's five commissioners must decide in the weeks to come whether to proceed against Lay's estate.

The court ruling shifts the spotlight onto former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, 52, who is to be sentenced Monday on 19 fraud, conspiracy and false-filings charges. Skilling, Lay's protÃ©gÃ© and fellow defendant, handled day-to-day operations at Enron until his resignation in the summer of 2001 and faces more than two decades in prison.

Skilling is the sole survivor from Enron's top management ranks and the one most likely to pay a heavy price for his decision to vigorously fight the charges against him. Earlier this month, Skilling laid out several avenues for appeal, including jury bias, faulty instructions by the judge and what he called overreaching by prosecutors that infringed on his constitutional rights.

Former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, whom Skilling has painted as the man most responsible for the company's downfall, pleaded guilty to two conspiracy charges and gave damaging testimony against his onetime patrons. A separate federal judge in Houston last month sentenced him to six years in prison, a 40 percent reduction from the seemingly iron-clad deal his defense team had struck with the government. The leader of an Enron employees group later called the benefit to Fastow "a slap in the face."

The lead plaintiffs in a separate shareholder lawsuit against former Enron executives and other advisers accused of helping the company conceal its financial problems already have said they intend to focus their attentions not on Lay's family, but on investment banks with deeper pockets.

Days before Lay's death, prosecutors had filed court papers seeking to extract $43.5 million from his financial holdings, including $6 million in a recently matured investment and at least $1.5 million more that Lay used to cover part of the mortgage on a luxury apartment in Houston. The government said it intended to set aside the money in a special fund for Enron investors and employees. Now, federal prosecutors are seeking to hold Skilling responsible for Lay's share, over Skilling's objections.

Separately yesterday, lawyers for the Lay family asked the court to release a $5 million bond that had been secured by the homes of several of Lay's five children. Federal prosecutors at the Enron Task Force declined to comment.

"Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. "We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

Lay, 64, collapsed in a rental home near Aspen, Colo., about a month after a Houston jury found him guilty of conspiring to mislead employees and investors about Enron's mounting financial problems. His death unleashed vicious criticism on the Internet and prompted conspiracy theories that were dispelled by a coroner's report and sheriff's deputies.

A man accustomed to flying in private jets and mingling with the Bush family, foreign diplomats and owners of professional sports teams, Lay was brought low by a widening scandal after disclosures that Enron had disguised billions of dollars in debt and manufactured revenue. He told the jury at his trial earlier this year that he was in the hole $250,000 after years of spending lavishly on homes, vacations and his five children.

Federal prosecutors baited Lay into displaying a short temper and a flair for micromanagement on the witness stand, and pounced when Lay could not explain why he sold more than $77 million in Enron shares back to the company in the months before its demise.

In recent weeks, Lay's family paid an undisclosed sum to settle a smaller civil case filed by former Enron employees over their pension and retirement funds.

Ken Horton, a former Enron manager who was laid off alongside thousands of others in December 2001, said he had steeled himself for the conviction to be extinguished after word of Lay's death three months ago. But Horton, who pegged his retirement and savings plan losses in the six-figure range, expressed "great" concern that he and former colleagues would never be made whole financially. Horton said he has received only $4,000 to date.

"If I got 10 cents on the dollar, I would be elated," Horton said.

JUDGE VOIDS CONVICTIONS AGAINST LAY (HC)

By Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, October 18, 2006

Ruling prevents U.S. from taking late Enron chief's assets, but civil suit still an option

The criminal case against Ken Lay came to an end Tuesday when a judge vacated his convictions and dismissed the indictment that brought him to trial.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake granted the request by Lay's estate to wipe out the convictions against the late Enron chairman, an outcome that was widely anticipated, given legal precedent. Lake also dismissed the indictment that was filed against him in 2004.

In his ruling, Lake cited a decision in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that makes a defendant's death before his or her appeals have been exhausted grounds for throwing out a conviction and dismissing an indictment.

The Department of Justice had argued against vacating the conviction, saying it would unjustly enrich Lay's estate by preventing criminal forfeiture proceedings to recover restitution for victims of Enron's downfall.

The government even proposed a law that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in such circumstances. That effort didn't succeed.

Lay died July 5 from heart disease, just weeks after a jury found him guilty on six charges of conspiracy and fraud and Lake found him guilty on four charges of bank fraud.

The same jury convicted former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling of 19 criminal counts. Skilling's sentencing is Monday.

Lake said in his 13-page ruling that current law is clear.

"Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow 5th Circuit precedent," Lake wrote.

Sam Buffone, an attorney representing the Lay family, said, "We're very pleased with the ruling and glad this finally brings to a close the criminal prosecution against Mr. Lay."

Lay's camp was expected to file a motion to release the $5 million bond posted after the jury found him guilty. The bond was secured by the mortgages of homes owned by three of his children.

SEC proceeding activeThough Lake's ruling thwarts the government's attempt through a criminal proceeding to seize what it claims would be millions of dollars in assets from Lay's estate, it doesn't preclude the government from doing the same through a civil action.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has a civil proceeding against Lay that it brought in 2004, but prosecutors could also file their own case.

The Justice Department hasn't said if it will go after Lay's assets via a civil proceeding. A statement from Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra on Tuesday, however, seems to indicate that's a possibility.

"We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron," Sierra said. "Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial."

Prosecutors could appeal Lake's ruling directly to the 5th Circuit, but Kirby Behre, a former prosecutor who has followed the case, wonders what grounds they would use for their arguments.

Ex-employees dismayedOne argument prosecutors could make is found in a September filing in which they asked Lake to delay his decision until Monday — when Lay was also slated to be sentenced — so Congress could consider their proposed law. Prosecutors noted it would be in the best interests of victims if such convictions stood, allowing the recovery of assets from the estates involved.

"But when you have various methods of reaching the same ends, such as making victims whole, just because one method is closed off doesn't mean an injustice is being carried out," Behre said.

It does not appear that attorneys for Enron shareholders will continue to pursue assets of the estate in the massive class action now pending, according to a source familiar with the case.

The judge's decision disappointed former Enron employees.

"It's not right for the victims of this crime and for the recovery of the money from his estate," said Rod Jordan, head of the Severed Enron Employees Coalition.

Will Perry, a former Enron Energy Services employee, said: "I don't think that should have happened. He was just as, if not more, guilty than Skilling."

However, Tracey Michel, a six-year veteran of Enron's information technology department, said she always saw Lay as undeserving of the charges, but she's also concerned about the ruling's impact on recovery for former employees.

"I think the people who worked for him took advantage of him," Michel said. "But I do think he should have given some money back."

Jurors in the Lay-Skilling case also weighed in.

Doug Baggett never thought the conviction would be vacated.

"I was surprised and disappointed, but I still have to respect and uphold the judge's opinion," he said. "I'm not a lawyer, but as someone who spent four months of their life in the courtroom, it's upsetting."

'That's how it is'Juror Carolyn Kuchera said the move was inevitable given what she understood the law to be.

"It's a disappointment, of course, but that's how it is," she said.

Lake also denied a motion from Russell Butler, who called himself a victim and had asked for an order of restitution.

Butler, a shareholder who said he lost about $8,000 in stock when Enron imploded, said he has asked his attorney to look into challenging the ruling.

"The jury has spoken, and the jury has found Lay guilty. His estate should bear the economic burden," said Butler, who works as the executive director of the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center. "They've benefited from this like it never happened, and as for all the victims of Mr. Lay, we're ignored. The court never really addressed our arguments."

Chronicle reporter Purva Patel contributed to this report.

Enron Founder's Conviction Vacated (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press

AP, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON — A federal judge Tuesday vacated the conviction of Enron's late founder Ken Lay, wiping out a jury's verdict that he committed fraud and conspiracy in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

Lay was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two cases May 25. Enron's collapse in 2001 wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

DOJ_NMG_0082576

Lay died of heart disease July 5 while vacationing with his wife, Linda, in Aspen, Colo.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, in a ruling Tuesday, agreed with Lay's lawyers that his death required that his conviction be erased and his indictment dismissed. They cited a 2004 ruling from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found that a defendant's death pending appeal extinguished his entire case, because he hadn't had a full opportunity to challenge the conviction and the government shouldn't be able to punish a dead defendant or his estate.

"On behalf of his estate, I'm really quite pleased with the ruling and glad this brings to a close the criminal proceeding against Mr. Lay. The judge engaged in a fair and reasoned application of 5th Circuit law," said Samuel Buffone, the attorney for Lay's estate.

Tuesday's ruling thwarts the government's bid to seek $43.5 million in gains that prosecutors allege he pocketed by participating in Enron's fraud. The government still could pursue that money in civil court, but they would have to compete with any other litigants pursuing Lay's estate.

Lake also denied a request from Russell Butler, who said he was a victim of Enron's collapse and had asked for an order of restitution based on Lay's conviction.

"With this ruling, the criminal case is over. It doesn't end the civil case or the ability of anyone to file or pursue a civil case against the estate," Buffone said.

Kelly Kimberly, spokeswoman for Lay's family, declined to comment, referring reporters to Buffone.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Justice did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Prosecutors offered no counter legal argument in the case, but asked Lake to hold off on a ruling until next week so Congress could consider legislation from the Justice Department that changes federal law regarding the abatement of criminal convictions. Congress recessed for the elections without considering the legislation.

In their motion to Lake last month, prosecutors Sean Berkowitz and John Hueston wrote that certain provisions of the proposed legislation would apply to Lay's case, including "that the death of a defendant charged with a criminal offense shall not be the basis for abating or otherwise invalidating either a verdict returned or the underlying indictment."

"Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent," Lake wrote.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001, when years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable.

Lay's co-defendant, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, is scheduled to be sentenced Monday.

Judge Vacates Ken Lay's Enron Conviction (UPI)

United Press International, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 17 (UPI) -- A Houston judge Tuesday vacated the indictment and criminal conviction of former Enron Corp. Chairman Ken Lay, who died July 5 of a heart attack.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's action followed a request by Lay's estate, the Houston Chronicle reported Tuesday.

The action, largely expected, lifts a cloud from Lay's name. He died just weeks after a Houston jury convicted him on six charges of conspiracy and fraud and, separately, Lake found him guilty on four charges of bank fraud.

That fraud is widely seen as the cause of the energy giant's collapse, which destroyed the pensions and investments of thousands.

In vacating Lay's indictment and conviction, Lake cited a 5th Circuit Court of Appeals decision that makes death, before the appeals process has been exhausted, grounds for tossing convictions and indictment. Justice Department lawyers had opposed the action.

Lake is scheduled to sentence Jeff Skilling, Enron's former chief executive and Lay's co-defendant, Monday.

McGuire's Option Deals Could Lead To Criminal Charges (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 18, 2006

Authorities are likely to take a deep look at the backdating activities at UnitedHealth, former prosecutors say.

The sheer size and persistence of stock-option backdating at UnitedHealth Group Inc. could be the basis of a criminal investigation, former federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Particularly vulnerable is Chief Executive William McGuire, the prime beneficiary of the backdating that allowed top executives to reap additional millions of dollars in profits by granting their options at times when UnitedHealth's stock was at low points.

"Because of the scale of the options granting, this has to be put in the egregious category, and that makes criminal prosecution more likely," said Christopher Bebel, a Houston securities attorney who once prosecuted white-collar cases for the U.S. attorney's office in Minnesota.

McGuire's unexercised options totaled more than $1.6 billion at the end of last year.

He resigned as chairman Sunday and will depart as CEO by Dec. 1 as the result of an independent investigation into the company's backdating practices.

UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay said the company has seen no indication from authorities of any criminal investigation.

The company previously has acknowledged that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department through the office of the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, best known for prosecuting Wall Street and securities matters.

Minneapolis attorney Doug Kelley, a former assistant U.S. attorney, said the involvement of the Southern District is a signal that criminal issues are being pursued. The SEC also can make recommendations to the Justice Department if it thinks criminal prosecution is appropriate, Kelley said.

Bebel said the report by an independent review group, the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr, will give federal regulators and prosecutors a starting point for considering whether to pursue civil and/or criminal cases.

"That will be an excellent road map for government attorneys. It will allow them to hit the road running and shave a few miles off of the marathon," Bebel said.

The report released Sunday said senior executives "failed to ensure that the option granting practices were appropriate."

The report also said SEC filings regarding the options and related accounting steps "were not accurate in certain respects."

Bebel said that failure to adequately report the backdating could be seen as a "material omission" in SEC filings.

The prominence of McGuire and UnitedHealth could make them more of a target than a smaller, less well-known company, Kelley said.

"Deterrence is one of the noted outcomes of criminal prosecutions in the white-collar area," he said.

Kelley also said the company's decision to reprice the options in question for McGuire, President Stephen Hemsley and other executives may be too little, too late for authorities.

"Their decision to reprice options, while admirable, will not forestall a criminal investigation," Kelley said.

McGuire reaped $427 million from stock-option exercises from May 1997 to February 2006, according to Thomson Financial. He exercised those shares for $68.6 million and sold them for $496.3 million. Of those, some were from options granted during the period under the backdating review.

The continued uncertainty over UnitedHealth's change in command was reflected on Wall Street on Tuesday when Moody's Investors Service downgraded both short- and long-term debt to a "negative" outlook.

"These are not issues that have quick fixes and will require a cultural change at the board of directors and senior management level, which will take some time to accomplish," said Stephen Zaharuk, a Moody's vice president.

Staff writer Patrick Kennedy contributed to this report. David Phelps • 612-673-7269 • dphelps@startribune.com

UnitedHealth To Pay Departing CEO $5.1M A Year For Life; Value Of Options Hoard Unknown (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082578

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-After being forced to step down over the company's compensation practices, UnitedHealth chief executive William McGuire will retire on $5.1 million (â,¬4.08 million) a year, according to the calculations of a watchdog group.

McGuire has agreed to retire by Dec. 1, and he stepped down from his post as chairman on Sunday. The move came after a company-sponsored investigation determined that many of the company's stock options were backdated to make them more favorable for the recipients, including McGuire, other executives, and thousands of UnitedHealth employees.

McGuire's retirement benefits include a $6.5 million (â,¬5.19 million) lump sum, according to Portland, Maine-based group The Corporate Library, which has criticized McGuire's pay before.

McGuire has stock options that were worth $1.78 billion (â,¬1.42 billion) as of the end of 2005. Their current value is not known. Investors have sold off UnitedHealth shares since questions about options backdating arose in March. Then, on Sunday, UnitedHealth said McGuire would re-price his options to the highest point in the year they were granted to remove any possibility that he got a favorable price.

McGuire's 1999 employment contract, which has been amended since then, has been criticized as too generous, but the severance provisions came into sharper focus on Monday now that he is leaving.

In mid-April, McGuire asked the company's board to stop issuing new stock options to him and some other senior managers, to cap an executive retirement plan, and to get rid of noncash perks. The company said in May that those changes had been adopted, although no amendments to McGuire's employment agreement were filed. UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay did not return phone messages seeking comment.

McGuire's base salary was $2.3 million (â,¬1.84 million) a year but he cleared more than $100 million (â,¬79.9 million) in years that he cashed in stock options.

Paul Hodgson, who researches compensation at The Corporate Library, said there are far too many elements of guaranteed pay in McGuire's contract.

His rising base salary triggers a rising bonus and a rising pension, Hodgson said.

"A board that agreed to this type of compensation was already compromised before stock option backdating became an issue," he said.

Executives such as McGuire usually take their retirement benefits as a lump sum, said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president and special counsel to Institutional Shareholder Services, a proxy advisory firm. That added up to $98 million (â,¬78.31 million) for former Exxon Mobil Corp. Chairman and CEO Lee R. Raymond when he retired at the end of last year.

At UnitedHealth, "This board didn't seem to do a very good job on negotiating on a lot of issues with McGuire, so I think it was probably par for the course," McGurn said. "Other boards have done just as poorly, so they're not alone."

McGuire could be forced to give up some or all of those gains, said James Cox, a professor of corporate securities law at Duke University. He said he thinks it's "very likely" that McGuire will have to give back his stock options.

"These are ill-gotten gains and they should be returned," Cox said.

But by re-pricing his stock options to eliminate any wrongful gain, McGuire has already gotten rid of his gain and shouldn't have to pay anything back, said Joseph Grundfest, a former member of the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a law professor at Stanford University.

"Let's assume that you gained a dollar because of misdating, and you shouldn't have gained that dollar. By giving that dollar back you've in effect disgorged the gains to which you're not entitled," he said.

How UnitedHealth Spotlights Gap In Reform (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A shocker in Sunday's report on the options heist at UnitedHealth Group Inc. is that Chief Executive William McGuire had an inside man on the company's board: William G. Spears, graduate of Choate and Princeton, a Harvard M.B.A., and the founder of a New York investment-management firm that bears his name.

Mr. Spears was head of the UnitedHealth board's compensation committee and also chairman of the "ad hoc" committee that negotiated Dr. McGuire's rich 1999 re-employment contract. That contract was signed in December of that year, according to the report released Sunday, but it included a grant of one million options dated back to Oct. 13 -- the day the company's stock price reached its low for the year.

DOJ_NMG_0082579

The backdating meant Dr. McGuire's options, intended to give him an incentive to grow the company, were already "in the money" to the tune of about $12 million by the time he received them. A nice little bonus, even for a future billionaire.

In theory, Mr. Spears was an "independent" director. But the investigation, led by former SEC enforcement chief William McLucas, discovered he had close financial ties to Dr. McGuire. He served as trustee for two trusts benefiting the CEO's children and managed between $15 million and $55 million of the McGuire family fortune. In June 1999, just months before the employment agreement was renegotiated, Dr. McGuire also invested $500,000 to help Mr. Spears repurchase his money-management firm from a financial conglomerate that had acquired it.

TALKING BUSINESS

Email business@wsj.com1 and read reader comments Saturday at WSJ.com/TalkingBusiness2.

Lawyers for Mr. Spears argue all this was duly disclosed. They cite an email sent by the company's general counsel, David Lubben, Oct. 12, 1999, to its outside counsel. According to the McLucas report, that email indicated "disclosure of some 'conflict' had been made to the 'full' board."

Trouble is, no one on the board remembers being told of the relationship. Two directors told investigators they were "adamant that they believe they would have remembered had they been told." Board members insist they first learned of the Spears-McGuire financial entanglement in April of this year, when investigators uncovered the matter. The board put off dealing with it until this weekend, after completion of the McLucas report.

Mr. Spears told investigators he never focused on the grant dates of Dr. McGuire's options. He also told investigators it simply didn't occur to him that his financial dealings with the CEO might be a conflict of interest.

That is hard to swallow. It is also a perfect illustration of why directors need to be free of such financial ties. Mr. Spears is just the latest example of the quiet seduction that occurs on cozy corporate boards. He was supposed to be the shareholders' representative in negotiating with the clever Dr. McGuire. Surely, it was hard for him to play that part when his bread was being so generously buttered by the man with whom he was negotiating.

Much has changed since 1999. For one thing, the Sarbanes-Oxley law passed in the wake of the corporate scandals of 2002 now requires option grants to be reported in 48 hours -- making backdating extremely difficult, if not impossible. For another, corporate boards are under fire, and as a result spend a lot more time doing their jobs. They are likely to pay more attention to pesky details, such as options-grant dates.

Still, the UnitedHealth mess suggests there is more to be done. Sarbanes-Oxley put strict requirements on audit committees, but not on compensation committees. They should consist of truly independent directors and should work with truly independent compensation consultants. (Mr. Spears' ad hoc committee was advised by the now-defunct Arthur Andersen LLP, which was also the company's outside auditor, thus raising questions about a possible conflict.)

Beyond that, the UnitedHealth fiasco provides fuel for those who want to tighten the ties that bind directors to shareholders -- by, for instance, requiring directors to be elected by majority vote, or enabling large shareholders to place director candidates on the corporate proxy ballot, or giving shareholders an advisory vote on executive pay. All these proposals are gradually gaining ground in the U.S., and outrage over CEO pay is likely to ensure they keep moving ahead.

Shareholders, of course, have reason to be ambivalent about all of this. Dr. McGuire may have lined his own pockets, but he also lined theirs. His successor -- for now, Stephen Hemsley -- will find directors looking much more carefully over his shoulder. That may prevent the kind of compensation games that Dr. McGuire played. But it is unlikely to ensure the kind of extraordinary returns that Dr. McGuire delivered.

UnitedHealth's Options Scandal Shows Familiar Symptoms (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082580

Anyone with health insurance from UnitedHealth Group knows what happens if you fail to fill in every box on the form, or attach the requisite back-up material, to get reimbursed for a $40 prescription. You're not going to see a dime until you've been put on hold for 30 minutes, faxed the paperwork twice to somebody in Minnetonka, Minn., and demanded to talk to a supervisor.

So imagine my surprise when I read this week about the loosey-goosey process UnitedHealth used to issue billions of dollars' worth of stock options to top executives over the past few years. According to a report prepared by lawyers at WilmerHale, the board of directors and its compensation committee didn't bother keeping good notes about their decisions regarding pay negotiations and stock options. And the documents authorizing those options conveniently left the date blank, so that someone -- even today, it's not exactly clear who -- could later pick the date that just happened to make the options as valuable as possible.

Isn't it odd that a company could be so persnickety when it comes to pinching pennies from doctors and patients, and so cavalier when it comes to lavishing executives with hundreds of millions of dollars of shareholders' money?

Or maybe it's not. Maybe what we have here is the most outrageous corporate scandal since Enron and WorldCom.

The crux of the UnitedHealth story concerns employee stock options. Just to review, an option lets the employee buy a share of the company stock at a predetermined "strike" price -- usually the market price at the time of issue -- and then sell it in the future, when and if the stock is worth more. The benefit to the employee is the difference between the strike price and the subsequent sales price. The cost to shareholders is that all their stock is now worth a bit less because the newly issued shares dilute their stake.

Thanks to clever reporting by the Wall Street Journal earlier this year, we now know that corporate executives have been routinely setting strike prices on dates when the shares hit temporary lows -- rather than the dates on which the options were issued, which is what most people assumed. It's yet another game played by corporate executives at dozens of companies to pick the shareholders' pockets. And it's the latest evidence of how executive compensation has become a cancer, eating away at the souls of even the most successful American corporations.

Consider the case of William McGuire, who over the past 15 years has transformed UnitedHealth from a struggling regional insurer in Minnesota into the second-largest health insurer in the country, largely through acquisitions of companies like Mid Atlantic Medical Services of Rockville. One in six Americans is a UnitedHealth customer. Under McGuire's leadership, the company's market value has risen to $60 billion. During that same period, he amassed stock options more valuable than those of any chief executive in history: $1.5 billion.

Even by today's standards, McGuire's compensation has been obscene. The big change came in 1999, when, in negotiations over a new contract, he demanded a pay package that would give him 2 percent of UnitedHealth shares. Significantly, McGuire insisted that he alone get to decide the timing of those options. And he wrote in a provision that he could be fired only upon a felony conviction, or failure to rectify a serious problem after repeated notices from the board.

The board of directors that agreed to such a lavish, one-sided contract included several luminaries: Tom Kean, the former governor of New Jersey and later chairman of the 9/11 commission; James Johnson, the former chief executive of Fannie Mae who created the culture that led to that company's costly accounting scandal; Gail Wilensky, a respected health-policy expert who once ran the Medicare and Medicaid programs; and former vice president Walter Mondale.

What were these directors possibly thinking? We have some insight on that from William G. Spears, a Wall Street money-manager who was a member of the compensation committee in 1999. He explained to the Journal that if the board had refused to go along with McGuire's piggy requests, "Bill would take it as a signal that directors weren't enthusiastic about his leadership. That would be a distraction, at the very least. Bill takes these things as a benchmark of how directors feel about him."

Well, we wouldn't want Bill to feel unappreciated, would we? Particularly if you're Spears, and you're also managing millions of dollars in McGuire's personal assets, and serving as trustee for two trusts set up for the benefit of McGuire's children, and you just accepted an investment of $500,000 from McGuire to help finance the repurchase of your firm from a financial conglomerate. Such potential conflicts of interest are supposed to be reported to other directors, of course, as well as the shareholders in the company's annual proxy report. But that was just another tiny detail that somehow slipped through the cracks.

McGuire was not the only one to benefit from the directors' ineptitude. There was also his trusty chief operating officer, Stephen Hemsley, who upon being hired in June 1997 was presented with 400,000 stock options with an issue date of five months earlier. Hemsley told the WilmerHale lawyers that he "didn't recall focusing at the time" on the $2.9 million gimme he'd just been handed as a result of the backdating.

DOJ_NMG_0082581

You might say that Hemsley comes honestly to his lack of focus and ethical sensitivity. Before coming to United Health -- I'm not making this up -- he'd spent the previous 23 years at Arthur Andersen, rising to chief financial officer. That's the same accounting firm that helped bring you Enron, WorldCom and Freddie Mac. And, you'll be shocked to learn, it's the same Arthur Andersen that served as a consultant to Spears and other members of UnitedHealth's compensation committee.

Around the same time that UnitedHealth directors were rubber-stamping McGuire's employment contract, they also approved another of McGuire's stock option initiatives. The company stock was in a slump, making worthless many of the options held by company executives, including 750,000 by McGuire. As McGuire explained it, morale was suffering and it was getting harder to retain key employees. Some companies had addressed this problem by "repricing" options -- lowering the strike price so the options were magically valuable again. But, as the WilmerHale lawyers put it so delicately, there were "disadvantageous accounting and disclosure ramifications" to repricing. Translation: bad publicity and a hit to earnings. So McGuire came up with the cute idea of having the board simply "suspend" the old options and issue new ones with a lower strike price.

The directors agreed. But the following August, after the stock price had risen substantially, the board also agreed to McGuire's request to "reactivate" the suspended options, essentially doubling the number of stock options issued. The motivation was unclear, but according to WilmerHale, these actions were never properly accounted for or reported to shareholders. Translation: accounting and securities fraud. And this little bit of double dipping added another $250 million to McGuire's net worth, the Journal reported.

One of the more interesting revelations from the WilmerHale report is that these and other outrages at UnitedHealth pretty much stopped following the 2002 passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, requiring directors and outside auditors to ensure that companies had adequate internal controls. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups have been running around the country, complaining the law has overreached, stifling American risk-taking and innovation. I wonder if backdating stock options is the sort of risk-taking and innovation the chamber has in mind.

In response to these revelations, you'd think UnitedHealth directors would at least have had the manners to apologize to shareholders, if not to resign. Instead, they've followed the well-worn path of insisting they did nothing wrong while taking steps to ensure it won't happen again.

After praising him for his "leadership, energy and vision," the board allowed McGuire to retire with his full pension and all his options. The good doctor graciously agreed to reprice his options from the most favorable to least favorable dates -- a concession that could cost him $200 million.

Hemsley was rewarded for his lack of focus by being named to succeed McGuire as chief executive. He was also directed to root out the senior executives in the legal, accounting and personnel departments who provided the bad advice on which the board and chief executive now say they have relied. Hemsley, too, has volunteered to reprice his options.

Spears announced his resignation from the board, which expressed "gratitude for his many contributions during his 15 years of service."

And, in a stunning example of the barn door and the departed horse, UnitedHealth's directors declared they would no longer award stock or stock options to top executives.

Guidelines Set For How To Audit Stock Options (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

The U.S. accounting-firm overseer issued long-awaited guidance for auditing the value of employee stock options.

The 28-page document comes at least a year after the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board began to develop advice on how to verify that companies are properly determining the cost of stock options. Companies have been required to treat stock options as an expense since as early as mid-2005 because of an accounting shift that still angers some businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0082582

"The staff's questions and answers were developed to help auditors apply the existing auditing standards to this area appropriately and consistently, and I encourage auditors to review this guidance as they plan for calendar year-end audits," Tom Ray, the PCAOB's chief auditor, said in a statement.

In its guidance, the PCAOB reminds auditors that because companies typically must estimate the value of employee stock options because the prices generally aren't set in a market, there is a risk of producing misleading figures. As a result, the board said that auditors should be aware of possible pitfalls, such as how changes in assumptions can affect the fair value of the options.

For example, the PCAOB suggested that auditors should pay attention if a company chooses an expected volatility that is the lowest in the range of possible expected volatilities. The more volatile the stock price, the more valuable the employee stock option, and the higher the cost to the company.

The audit oversight board also offered guidance on when to use the Black-Scholes model, and when to use what is known as a lattice model. The Black-Scholes model for valuing employee stock options is more standardized, but a lattice model "might more fully reflect the substantive characteristics" of the employee stock option, the board said. In a lattice model, there are more variables, which means companies could more specifically tailor the value of stock options to factors that are specific to their companies.

Stock options give employees the right to buy stock at a preset price at a future date -- typically the same as the company's closing price on the date the option is granted. In July, the PCAOB issued separate guidance on stock options, saying that auditors might need to review earlier audits if they receive information that the stock options might have been backdated, or awarded retroactively when the stock price was lower.

If The Price Is Right (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

Buyout firms are engaged in an unprecedented feeding frenzy, gobbling up publicly traded companies like never before. While buyouts can set lagging businesses back on the right track, regulators and shareholders must be watchful to ensure that managers demand fair value for the companies.

In a typical buyout, a firm or consortium of firms purchases all the public stock in a company and takes the company private. The expression “leveraged buyout” refers to the large debt that usually finances this process — the way a homebuyer makes a down payment on a much larger mortgage.

The $33 billion acquisition of the hospital chain HCA earlier this year ranks as the largest leveraged buyout ever. Two firms recently bid $15 billion for Harrah’s Entertainment, the world’s largest casino operator. These deals are happening across the economy, as everyone from wealthy individuals to investment banks hunt for high-return investment opportunities. Even pension funds have gotten into the business, helping to fuel the trend.

According to Thomson Financial, buyout firms have spent $275 billion so far this year taking companies private, or over a quarter of the $1 trillion total for mergers and acquisitions. In the previous 20 years the highest share was 14.1 percent.

Leveraged buyouts have something of a bad reputation for what, in its worst form, is something like corporate looting. In those cases, a company’s balance sheet would be quickly loaded with high levels of debt to pay the buyers exorbitant dividends and management fees. They would then flip the debt-ridden company as quickly as possible, either to another buyer or through a public offering.

Done correctly, a buyout can be a very productive way to unlock a business’s real potential. Once a company is privately held, management can ignore the short-term dictates of the stock market and focus on the investments needed for long-term growth. A recent Harvard Business School study found that when bought-out companies were put back on the equity market they outperformed other initial public offerings and the market as a whole.

The main concern for shareholders, however, is the initial sale price. Corporate management can face conflicts of interest when the terms of a bid are better for top executives than shareholders. And management often leads a buyout itself, which discourages other prospective buyers from submitting competing bids and keeps the price artificially low.

DOJ_NMG_0082583

The Justice Department reportedly is looking into whether the old-boy network of private-equity firms has gotten a little too chummy, examining whether firms are colluding to keep prices low. It is a move we support. Too often public stockholders end up getting the raw end of these deals.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Page Program Leaders Discuss Trip (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

House page program overseers this week discussed a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took with two former pages and others in 1996, a congressional official said Tuesday. The trip is under review by the Justice Department.

The five-member House Page Board, three lawmakers and two House officials, took no action and did not have any information beyond recent news accounts of the trip, the official said.

The discussion indicates that the board is moving beyond the overly friendly e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages that ex-Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., sent to former male pages. The House ethics committee and the FBI are investigating Foley's approaches to the teenagers.

The congressional official is familiar with the Page Board discussion but was not authorized to be quoted by name about the meeting.

While the Page Board does not have investigators, they could ask Kolbe to meet with them.

When the Foley scandal became public in late September, House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the chairman of the Page Board, GOP Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, to investigate the page system.

"We want to make sure that all our pages are safe and the page system is safe," Hastert said.

Pages are high school students who perform errands for lawmakers, learn about Congress and attend classes at a congressional school.

Meanwhile, the ethics committee continued to call witnesses for closed-door testimony. On Tuesday, House Sergeant-at-Arms Wilson Livingood, a member of the Page Board, was questioned for less than two hours. He would not comment afterward.

The committee still has not heard from the former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl, who as a board member confronted Foley in the fall of 2005, along with Shimkus.

Their visit came after the House speaker's office learned that Foley sent e-mails to a 16-year-old former male page from Louisiana. While the e-mails were far milder than the sexually explicit instant messages Foley sent to other former male pages, they raised questions. Foley asked what the youngster wanted for his birthday and requested a photograph.

Shimkus has said previously that Foley told him and Trandahl that he was acting as a mentor and that nothing inappropriate had occurred.

Foley was ordered by Shimkus to cease all contact with the former page and assured Shimkus he would do so, the board chairman said. He also was advised to watch his conduct with current and former House pages and he gave assurance he would do so, Shimkus said.

The ethics committee also heard Tuesday from Paula Nowakowski, chief of staff to House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Boehner has said he spoke to Hastert about Foley earlier this year, but the speaker said he does not recall the conversation.

Boehner has said Hastert told him the Louisiana page's complaint "had been taken care of." The majority leader is scheduled to testify this week.

The Kolbe trip was discussed at a conference call of the Page Board on Monday.

The meeting was first revealed several hours later by the lone Democrat on the Page Board, Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan, who declined to say what was discussed. Kildee has been upset that Shimkus never told him about the problems with Foley.

Kolbe took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his former spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0082584

A federal law enforcement official said last week an allegation related to the trip was given to the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix. It was not immediately clear whether it concerned any contention of improper activity by the retiring Kolbe — the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

The official described the inquiry as preliminary and as far narrower in scope than the federal investigation concerning Foley, who resigned Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit instant messages sent to former pages.

A second law enforcement official said the 1996 Kolbe trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal matter. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Cline said last week the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister, who was on the three-night trip, said that nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the news media.

Religious Right Finds GOP's 'Big Tent' May Be Too Roomy (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — In recent years, the Republican Party has broadened its appeal with a "big tent" strategy of reaching out to voters who might typically be Democrats. But a debate is now growing within the GOP about whether the tent has become too big -- by including gays whose political views may conflict with the goals of the party's powerful evangelical wing.

Some conservative Christians, who are pivotal to the GOP's get-out-the-vote effort, are charging that gay Republican staffers in Congress may have thwarted their legislative agenda. There are even calls for what some have dubbed a "pink purge" of high-ranking gay Republicans on Capitol Hill -- and in the administration.

The long simmering tension between gays and the religious right within the GOP has erupted into open conflict at a sensitive time, just weeks before a midterm election that may cost Republicans control of Congress.

"The big tent strategy could ultimately spell doom for the Republican Party," said Tom McClusky, chief lobbyist for the Family Research Council, a Christian organization that champions marriage. "All a big tent strategy seems to be doing is attracting a bunch of clowns."

Now the GOP is facing a hard choice -- risk losing the social conservatives who are legendary for turning out the vote, or risk alienating the moderate voters who are critical to this year's midterm outcome.

"There's a huge schism on the right," said Mike Rogers, a gay activist who runs a political "outing" blog to combat what he calls hypocrisy among conservative gay politicians. "The fiscal conservatives are furious at the religious conservatives, because they need the moderates for economic policy. But they need the social conservatives to turn out the vote."

The latest incident to outrage social conservatives was last week's remarks by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the new federal AIDS program administrator. With first lady Laura Bush looking on, Rice swore in AIDS ambassador Mark Dybul, while his partner, Jason Claire, held the Bible. Claire's mother was in the audience, and Rice referred to her as Dybul's "mother-in-law."

"The Republican Party is taking pro-family conservatives for granted," said Mike Mears, executive director for the political action committee for Concerned Women for America, a lobbying group that promotes biblical values. "What Secretary Rice did just the other day is going to anger quite a few people."

It's not just anger at Rice that worries Republicans, but the possible effect on evangelical voters next month.

"For them to highlight that was totally a damper to the base that we need to turn out," said the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, a California lobbying group focusing on religious and social issues.

Adding to the disaffection among conservative Christians are the revelations in a new book charging that the White House used President Bush's faith-based initiative for political purposes while mocking evangelicals behind their backs.

DOJ_NMG_0082585

The tension between gays and evangelicals in the GOP re-emerged in recent weeks during the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. The scandal drew scrutiny to the presence -- and behavior -- of gays in the Republican party, including Foley and several House staff members.

One evangelical leader, Family Research Council president Tony Perkins, said in a television interview last week there should be an investigation into whether gay congressional staffers were responsible for covering up Foley's habits of picking up men at parties and sending salacious messages to male pages.

Perkins also has questioned whether gay Republican staffers on Capitol Hill have torpedoed their priority issues, such as a Federal Marriage Amendment that would prohibit civil unions for gays. "Has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members and/or staffers?" he asked in an e-mail to supporters.

But some social conservatives deny they are interested in purging gay staffers from the party.

"We're not calling for what I've heard referred to as a pink purge," said McClusky. "We're asking that members (of Congress) might want to reflect on who's serving them. Are they representing their boss's interest?"

Mears of the CWA observed that purging gays from the party would not necessarily help the evangelical cause in any case. "If you get rid of all the homosexuals in Congress and on the staff, you'd still have Republicans like Chris Shays (the congressman from Connecticut) and Susan Collins (the senator from Maine) pushing the gay agenda."

This week a list of allegedly gay Republican staffers has been circulated to several Christian and family values groups, presumably to encourage an outing and purge. McClusky acknowledged seeing the list, but said his group did not circulate it and had no intention of using it.

Still, for gay Republican staffers on Capitol Hill, it feels as if the noose is tightening. Fearful of having their names on such a list and losing their jobs after the election, they are trying to keep a low profile.

None of the gay Republican staffers contacted for this article would speak for the record. But Eric Johnson, a former Republican staffer who left the party over its anti-gay policies and now works for a Democrat on the Hill, said many of his old friends are worried.

"There's a real concern, a legitimate concern, about a lower glass ceiling -- preventing them from attaining higher positions in the party," said Johnson. "Most Republicans do lip service to the conservative side of gay issues. But on hiring practices, most of them have been pretty reasonable."

Indeed, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., a staunch opponent of gay marriage, has a campaigner manager who is gay. Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., who has compared gay sex to bestiality, has a press secretary who is out of the closet. Both senators are in perilous races for re-election -- and neither staffer would talk.

The GOP for some time has been a bit schizophrenic in its approach to gay issues. Political guru Karl Rove ran Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 by mobilizing opposition to gay marriage, even as Vice President Dick Cheney noted that consenting adults of any orientation should be free to marry, and his daughter Mary Cheney's partner was welcomed at presidential events.

Bush himself has gone out of his way to telegraph a personal friendship with gays. He recently re-appointed Israel "Izzy" Hernandez, a gay man who had been a personal aide to Bush in Texas, to be assistant secretary of commerce and head of an international trade office.

And the Republican National Party says its tent is open to anyone who shares Republican views.

"The Republican Party welcomes individuals from all walks of life," said RNC press secretary Tracey Schmitt.

Regarding the threat of losing support from social conservatives, she added: "Our core supporters understand that a Congress led by Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi would be devoid of a values agenda. They are mobilized and committed to electing Republican on Nov. 7."

Not every Republican thinks running against gays will work for the GOP again this year, as it did in 2004.

"Anti-gay politics isn't playing as well as it did two years ago" said Patrick Sammon, executive director of the Log Cabin Republicans, a lobbying group for gay Republicans. "It's shameful to use gay and lesbian people to score political points, but a corner's been turned. As polls keep moving in our direction, the party will become more inclusive."

Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0082586

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — In the days after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, as elaborate battle plans were drawn to protect members of Congress and preserve government continuity, Jeff Trandahl, the clerk of the House, did something else. He obtained a commercial driver's license.

Mr. Trandahl wanted to be ready for the next emergency. Of all his responsibilities in Congress, a priority was safeguarding the high school students who work as pages. He arranged for buses to be parked nearby, so pages could leave their dormitories or the Capitol. If needed, he would drive them to safety.

His concern for the pages highlights the protection provided to the teenagers in their time here. But it also raises piercing questions about how years of whispers over a congressman's unwelcome advances could escape public notice until being exposed on a television news program.

Mr. Trandahl, a commanding behind-the-scenes player on Capitol Hill before stepping down last year, was little known outside Congress. But he has emerged as a central figure in the case of how the House Republican leadership dealt with the conduct of Mark Foley, the former representative whose sexually charged messages to Congressional pages have shaken the midterm elections.

As the House ethics committee pursues its investigation, few accounts are more crucial than Mr. Trandahl's in determining whether Republican leaders acted with enough urgency. He is scheduled to testify to the committee on Thursday, when he could corroborate — or contradict — accusations that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's behavior at least three years ago.

The House clerk, a vestige of the patronage system, serves at the pleasure of the speaker and, in recent years, Mr. Hastert's influential chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. House investigators are trying to deduce whether a deteriorating relationship between Mr. Van Der Meid and others in the Capitol, particularly Mr. Trandahl, had a role in the handling of the complaints about Mr. Foley.

As House clerk, Mr. Trandahl had a rare bird's-eye view of what was occurring beneath the Capitol dome. As a gay Republican, he also had a window into a subculture not widely discussed within his party.

Although he never dwelled on his sexuality, he also did not go to extreme lengths to conceal it, unlike Mr. Foley, who publicly acknowledged he is gay only after resigning this month.

Mr. Trandahl, 42, has told friends he was not a social friend of Mr. Foley and did not jeopardize pages' safety. He has declined to discuss the case publicly while it remains under investigation by the ethics committee and the F.B.I., which is trying to determine whether Mr. Foley broke laws by exchanging sexually explicit messages with current and former pages.

Interviews with more than 20 former colleagues and acquaintances, Republicans and Democrats alike, paint Mr. Trandahl as a fastidious manager with a penchant for playing by the rules. At the same time, the colleagues and acquaintances said, he was a keen inside player who mastered the art of navigating an institution that is structured to protect its own.

"When the rest of the trees blow down, Jeff Trandahl will be left standing up," said Craig Shniderman, executive director of Food and Friends, a charity here, who has known Mr. Trandahl for nearly a decade. "This is a pretty complicated situation, but I don't have any doubt that he did the right thing."

For seven years, Mr. Trandahl oversaw more than 300 employees, a $20 million budget and House functions. He also supervised the page program. And in the conflicting accounts and varying recollections about when Republican leaders learned of Mr. Foley's conduct, it is Mr. Trandahl who seems interwoven at each step along the way.

In the House, Mr. Trandahl had what amounted to an all-access pass, giving V.I.P.'s and friends tours through little-known corridors and up to the high arches of the rotunda. He guided many facets of House operations from an ornate second-floor office overlooking the Mall. Just a handful of politicians enjoyed a grander view of the Washington Monument.

Mr. Trandahl arrived in Washington in 1983, months after graduating from high school in Spearfish, S.D., to work in the office of Senator James Abdnor, Republican of South Dakota. After Mr. Abdnor was defeated three years later, he found his eager young aide a job on the House side of Capitol Hill, working for the senator's close friend Representative Virginia Smith, Republican of Nebraska.

DOJ_NMG_0082587

By then, Mr. Trandahl had earned a degree in government from the University of Maryland and began to stand out as a consummate networker in a city filled with networkers.

He ascended to various positions in the House, seldom forgetting a name or face, and was an experienced insider in 1994 when Republicans took control of the House for the first time in four decades.

In 1998, Newt Gingrich promised to clean up years of patronage largess in the House, first by Democrats and then by Republicans, and appointed Mr. Trandahl acting clerk of the House. After unexpectedly becoming speaker, Mr. Hastert made Mr. Trandahl's appointment permanent.

Suddenly, Mr. Trandahl was a constitutional officer, standing barely more than arm's length from President Bush as he took the oath of office and presiding over the House at the dawn of each session of Congress.

"He wasn't seen as partisan," said George Shevlin, a friend of Mr. Trandahl who is a longtime Democratic staff member of the House Administration Committee. "He was seen as very dedicated to the institution. When things got to be too partisan, that seemed to bother him."

As clerk, Mr. Trandahl supervised the page program. So concerns involving their conduct were routed to him. Most every year, he sent at least some pages home for drinking alcohol, smoking marijuana or simply misbehaving.

Former pages and staff members say he guided the young Congressional errand runners with a fair, but strict hand, earning him the nickname J. T. Money.

"With the kids, money was like gold, and his word was like gold," Matt Frattalli, a former tutor at the Congressional page school, said. "There was no slack with him. You respected him and you feared him."

Over the years, people who worked with him on the Hill said, Mr. Trandahl received periodic complaints that Mr. Foley was acting too friendly to the pages or interns.

The House ethics committee is trying to determine whether Mr. Trandahl simply passed along the information to Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley, or whether he alerted the speaker's office that Mr. Foley's overfriendly behavior had grown beyond idle gossip.

Representative Jim Kolbe, Republican of Arizona, said he informed the clerk's office more than five years ago of concerns a former page shared about an inappropriate e-mail exchange with Mr. Foley.

Last year, when Mr. Trandahl was alerted to e-mail messages that Mr. Foley had sent a former page in Louisiana, he confronted Mr. Foley with Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the page board.

By the time word of the e-mail exchange surfaced, Mr. Trandahl was making plans to leave Capitol Hill after 23 years. He had accepted a position as executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, blending politics with a lifelong passion for the outdoors.

Friends dismiss the suggestion that his departure was linked to the Foley case.

"This goofy notion that he vanished in a poof of smoke is wrong," said John Scofield, a Republican staff member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Before leaving, Mr. Trandahl received bipartisan praise from Mr. Hastert and the House minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California.

Some aides were surprised that Mr. Trandahl did not accept a lucrative lobbying position here. People close to him said he recoiled at the thought of returning to Capitol Hill to befriend members of Congress while pushing legislation for clients.

It was the culmination of a pattern, friends say, of never wanting to socialize on the Hill after long days and nights surrounded by politics and government.

"I don't control the actors," Mr. Trandahl once told The Aberdeen American News of South Dakota. "But I control every other part."

Now, he spends his spare time in Rappahannock County, Va., where he restored a brown A-frame house on the side of a rugged hill, overlooking waterfalls and a rippling creek filled with trout.

It is 72 miles, but a world away, from downtown Washington, where visitors travel across roads called Fogg Mountain, Fish Hawk Pass and Points of View Lane.

DOJ_NMG_0082588

Biz Groups Want Their Money Back (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 18, 2006

The small group of lobbyists who gathered, checkbooks in hand, for a lunchtime fundraiser at Bistro Bis on Capitol Hill a few weeks ago had no idea that some of them would soon be scrambling to get those checks returned.

It was Tuesday, Sept. 26, and the recipient of their largesse was a veteran Republican lawmaker with a choice seat on the House Ways and Means Committee, former Rep. Mark Foley (Fla.). Just three days later, Foley's political career and personal life dramatically self-destructed when ABC News broke the story that Foley had carried on inappropriate Internet conversations with former congressional pages.

These lobbyists are not the only contributors looking to distance themselves from the Foley scandal and recoup the thousands of dollars they gave to help the incumbent, who did not face a competitive challenger, return to the House for his seventh term.

In the weeks since Foley's resignation and retreat into an alcohol-abuse rehabilitation facility, a number of corporate and trade association PACs also have sent word to Foley's campaign that they want refunds.

"I stopped payment on my check," said Andrew Shore, a lobbyist with Mayer Brown Rowe and Maw and a co-host of Bistro Bis fundraiser. Shore already got his uncashed check returned, he said. He estimated that eight lobbyists attended the lunche on and still more sent checks along.

By Friday, Sept. 29, some of them were placing calls to Foley's campaign office in Florida or to the Washington, D.C.-based Catalyst Group, which administered his fundraising: they wanted their money back.

That same evening, the Catalyst Group had severed ties with the campaign and begun referring inquiries to Florida. The Catalyst Group's Joe Rachinsky said they got about 20 calls between Friday and Monday from donors asking what to do.

Under federal election law, campaigns are not required to return contributions on request but anecdotal accounts from donors suggest that candidates typically agree to return money when asked.

The Hill contacted more than a dozen PACs that ranked among the biggest contributors to Foley's campaign and to his leadership PAC this election cycle.

Most did not return calls. Some PACs declined to comment, such as Altria Corporation, which gave $6,000 to the campaign and $1,000 to the leadership PAC, and the Independent Insurance Agents and Brokers of America, which contributed $6,000 to Foley's campaign.

But others disclosed that they have or plan to deliver letters to Foley's campaign treasurer Donna Winterson, also his sister, asking that their money be returned.

The PAC associated with the National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) is one of those that plan to do so. It will ask the campaign to return its $5,000 contribution but it doesn't have high hopes.

"More than likely, [Foley will] say no because he'll use it for his legal defense fund," the spokesman said, voicing concerns that might be shared by many corporate and association executives

The Federal Election Commission (FEC) can permit officeholders to convert their campaign coffers into legal defense funds, as well as other purposes spelled out in regulations. Recently, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) have diverted campaign money to their criminal defenses.

The National Association of Federal Credit Unions, like those Bistro Bis lobbyists, acted quickly to ask for its $1,000, said Dillon Shea, the group's political director. "When we learned that there were inappropriate and possibly illegal [instant messages] and e-mails sent to young [former] pages, we immediately sent a letter to Foley's treasurer requesting our contribution back." They have not heard back.

Likewise, the PAC associated with the insurance company AFLAC has asked that its $10,000 be returned and the American Health Care Association's PAC will send a letter this week requesting a refund of the $7,500 it gave to Foley's campaign this cycle.

United Parcel Service (UPS) spokesman David Bolger said company policy is to ask any candidate who withdraws from a race to return contributions. But the PAC asked for only half of the $10,000 it gave Foley this cycle. UPS wants the $5,000 it views as a general-election contribution to be refunded, Bolger explained. The company considers the other half to have been for the Sept. 5 primary election, and did not ask for it back, he said.

Although only a handful of PACs declared they had written to request their money be refunded, or would do so, more could follow.

Trey Hawkins, the political director of the Credit Union National Association, said it was too soon to decide about the $5,500 the group's PAC gave Foley's campaign. Similarly, William Robb, the physician who serves as treasurer for the PAC affiliated with the American Association of Orthopaedic Surgeons, said its board had not had time to discuss what steps to take.

Even if Foley's campaign abides by requests from PACs and individual donors that their money be returned, the former lawmaker has a sizeable war chest he could use to mount a legal defense against criminal charges, should any be laid against him.

According to disclosure forms filed by Winterson to the FEC on Oct. 11, Foley has $1.94 million in cash on hand, including $193,000 he raised in the third quarter of this year. His leadership PAC raised $1,500 during the same period and has a $14,100 balance.

Foley Set To Name Abuser (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 17 (AP) — Former Representative Mark Foley will reveal to the Archdiocese of Miami the name of the Roman Catholic clergyman he says abused him as a teenager, Mr. Foley's civil lawyer said Tuesday.

The lawyer, Gerald Richman, said the clergyman was still alive.

An archdiocese spokeswoman said the church had urged Mr. Foley to identify his abuser. Mr. Richman said the statute of limitations on sexual assault had expired long ago. He said Mr. Foley had not told him the name of the clergyman but has told another lawyer.

Seeking Post-Foley Unity (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Desperate to talk about something other than scandal, House Republican leadership staffs are coordinating a messaging blitz in an attempt to shift some emphasis back to national security and the economy before the Nov. 7 election.

With less than three weeks for the GOP to salvage its majority, the new media campaign is the first formal coordination between leaders' offices since they were fractured by the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) sexual explicit messages to underage former pages.

Aides to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) met yesterday in the Lincoln Room of the Speaker's Capitol suite to plan ways to help embattled Republicans sidestep national media and target local press.

"We have 20 days to get our message out," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "Our focus will be to expose that a Democrat majority would stand for higher taxes and national security policies of weakness and appeasement."

Republicans are struggling to maintain their majority in the face of dismal poll numbers and stumbles by the White House and the elected leadership, particularly on the Foley matter.

Spending by the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) suggests that the field of vulnerable Republicans continues to expand. A handful of GOP lawmakers in safe seats also saw a modest drop in their internal poll numbers in the two weeks after the Foley scandal broke, aides to those members said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0082590

In an effort to refocus House Republicans after two weeks of questions about whether Hastert's senior aides knew about Foley's history of inappropriate contact with pages, Boehner sent members a memo on Monday urging them to move their message beyond the Foley scandal and work to define congressional Democrats on national security and taxation.

"Just as we were looking forward to going home to talk about what we'd accomplished, the despicable conduct of former Congressman Mark Foley instead became the story," Boehner wrote.

He then explained that leaders took "action to engage the appropriate authorities to conduct a thorough review of all the facts.

"Having done this, Republicans are back on offense on the big issues facing our nation."

These House GOP efforts come as national Republicans try to rally staff, donors and volunteers amid widespread fear that the party will lose power in at least one chamber.

On Monday, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman urged GOP aides at the Capitol Hill Club to contrast the two parties on issues such as national security and the economy, an aide present said.

Mehlman walked staffers through some positive developments in states he had visited recently, such as Missouri and Ohio, and explained how he thought Republicans could still hold their majorities in both chambers despite the poisoned political environment.

Afterward, Republican pollster Ed Goas explained how the Foley scandal had a limited political impact and how some of the most recent polls underrepresented the GOP's base voters.

Republicans have seized on remarks by Democratic leaders in the House to suggest they would let President Bush's tax cuts lapse or even raise taxes to close the budget deficit. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has said she would include a provision in the rules package to implement pay-as-you-go budgeting rules, something conservative Republicans strongly support but that would require Congress to either make drstic cuts in feeral spending or raise taxes.

In his memo to members, Boehner includes a transcript from NBC's "Meet the Press" in which Pelosi, responding to a question about whether Democrats would raise taxes, said, "You put everything on the table and you decide what are the priorities for the American people."

Democratic aides said their party remains committed to middle-class tax cuts and charged the Republicans with making desperate political attacks.

"Republicans are playing the only hands they have by trying to create a distraction with desperate and false barbs," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "Leader Pelosi and House Democrats making fiscal responsibility a high ethical standard and middle class tax cuts a top priority must be a frightening prospect for the failed economic policies and ballooning budget deficits created by President Bush and his rubber stamp Congress."

Republican leaders in the House are working to coordinate with the White House and various committee chairmen to hold conference calls with local media in competitive districts in an attempt "to define Democrats before they define themselves."

"We'll promote the strong Republican positions of fighting the War on Terror and growing the economy to a near 12,000 stock market high," Bonjean said.

The conference office sent out statements by Hastert, Boehner, Blunt and Pryce yesterday commending Bush for signing a law reinforcing the administration's program to try terrorism suspects. Hastert and Boehner both took shots at congressional Democrats while Blunt and Pryce focused on the benefits of the law itself.

Republican staffers are widely discouraged about their chance of holding the House in November.

Despite leadership efforts to refocus the debate, the ethics committee continues to question members and staff about when leaders first knew about Foley's inappropriate contact with pages, ensuring that this story will remain in the news through the election.

House Sergeant at Arms Bill Livingood, who is one of six members of the House Page Board, and Boehner chief of staff Paula Nowakowski appeared before the investigative panel yesterday. Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose office sponsored one of the pages at the center of the scandal, is scheduled to appear today and Boehner is expected to answer questions tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0082591

The Associated Press reported that members of the Page Board are interviewing former pages that took a rafting trip in 1996 organized by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.).

Whatever comes out of the ethics investigation, Republican leaders will continue their efforts to frame the debate as the election approaches.

The staff is planning to meet each morning and convene daily conference calls to discuss strategy during the remaining days before the election, aides said, adding that they hope to include committee staff and up to 30 Republican press secretaries to help.

"We're working together to remind the American people of the clear choice they face this election," Blunt spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said.

Foley Scandal Turns Parents Into Web Sleuths (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro And Anjali Athavaley

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Lori Hahn of Sacramento, Calif., has made a habit of talking to her three teenagers about being careful whom they talk to online. Now, after the discovery that former Rep. Mark Foley sent sexually explicit instant messages to congressional pages, she says she is no longer taking any chances.

WATCH A VIDEO

1

Parents can use2 Web filtering software to help protect their children from online predators.

"The Foley news spurred me to take action," says Ms. Hahn, senior operations manager for a consulting firm, who days after the scandal broke installed IMSafer, a new program that promises to send her an email when sexual or predatory language appears in her children's IM conversations. "I trust their judgment. But I don't trust the people who are out there. The software gives me a little peace of mind."

The fallout from the Foley scandal has sent shockwaves through Congress and rattled employees across the country who are increasingly on edge about whether their boss is tracking their every online move. And, as new evidence about the vulnerability of kids online emerges in spurts, it is also jolting parents into better monitoring what their children say and do at their computers.

Tools that allow parents to prevent their kids from accessing Web sites with potentially objectionable content have been available for years, often offered free through Internet service providers. But in recent weeks, more parents are turning to pricey software programs that record not only what Web sites their kids visit, but also the content of their emails and instant messages. Some software comes bundled with services that flag suspicious behavior automatically, eliminating the need for parents to sort through the digital trail on their own.

In the two weeks since the scandal broke, sales of services that enable parents to monitor their kids computer use -- from Solid Oak Software Inc.'s $40 CYBERsitter Web filtering tool to a social-networking profile tracker from BeNetSafe LLC ($20 a month or $80 a year), have seen double-digit sales growth, according to the companies. SearchHelp Inc. of Syosset, N.Y., maker of software programs that allow parents to block Web sites, peek at their kids' computers in real time and receive text messages or emails when their children type or search for certain keywords and phrases -- saw online sales jump 10% during the same period. The news is also helping them get their product stocked in more mainstream retail locations, most recently at 191 Duane Reade Inc. pharmacies in the New York City area where the company's line of Sentry monitoring software was in stores this week.

Vendors have rushed to capitalize on the interest with new products. IMSafer Inc. fast-tracked the launch of software that creates an online record of suspicious words or phrases (like phone numbers or body parts) that surface in IM conversations. Since then, more than 600 people have signed up for the service, says Brandon Watson, founder and chief executive of the Houston-based company. The basic service is currently free but upgrades, such as the ability to monitor chats on social-networking sites like MySpace.com, will soon carry a $30 annual subscription fee.

DOJ_NMG_0082592

More employers, meanwhile, are offering cyber-safety classes for employees grasping for advice on how to better protect their own kids online. ComPsych Corp., a Chicago-based company that provides employee-assistance services, reports a 20% increase in phone calls from parents who are concerned about cyber-safety since the Foley scandal broke. The company has also seen an increase in the number of employers who have requested counselors to come conduct cyber-safety classes, 90-minute sessions that review various online threats and provide tips on warding off predators.

With children spending more and more time online, protecting kids while they are at their computers is emerging as a huge concern. One in seven 10- to 17-year-olds who use the Internet have received a sexual solicitation or approach online, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Legislators are seeking a variety of ways to stamp out the problem by proposing new filtering and safety laws and by pressuring popular Web sites like News Corp.'s MySpace.com to better police their sites and enforce minimum-age restrictions.

Despite the warnings, experts say parents are still relatively complacent -- in part because they are intimidated by the software involved. Just 32% of online parents who have teens at home protect their computers with parental controls, according to Forrester Research, a market researcher. The vast majority of those use filters from Internet service providers because they are free and require little or no installation. AOL offers parental controls that can be tuned to the child's age or to block access to specific Web sites, for instance. Apple Computer Inc. and Microsoft Corp. offer similar options for some versions of their operating systems.

Only 10% of those who choose to monitor their kids invest in separate software purchased at a retail outlet, products that range from less intrusive applications that notify parents when suspicious activity occurs to nearly $100 programs that record exactly what appears on their kids' screens all the time.

Some of the newest products -- which must be installed on each machine being monitored and typically can't be disabled without the username and password of the person who installed it -- are designed to give parents the sense they are sitting at their kids' screens. SpectorSoft Corp. of Vero Beach, Fla., this month launched a new version of its surveillance software -- the $99.99 Spector Pro -- that lets parents scroll through a log of all the sites visited and emails and instant messages sent like a videotape on the computer they are tracking. The software, which resembles a product the company makes for corporate users, can be set to take pictures every second and to record keystrokes. Solid Oak Software, which has made a popular filtering software called CYBERsitter for years, last month launched SnoopStick, which allows parents to monitor their child's computer activities -- from IM conversations to Web browsing -- by plugging a USB drive into any computer.

But as with previous snooping software, problems such as high prices and installation glitches persist. Penny Herndon, a 44-year-old from Walnut Creek, Calif., recently tried to install SnoopStick on her daughter's computer, only to find that she was unable to connect to her daughter's computer from her own. Ms. Herndon, a forensic medical researcher, did finally get the connection working after customer service directed her to go to the start menu and to run a particular file. She says she hasn't had any problems since.

Cunningham Said To Help Two Contractors (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

Disgraced former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham parlayed his seat on the Intelligence Committee into at least $70 million in business for two contractors who in turn paid him millions in bribes, an investigator hired by the panel has concluded.

The investigator's report, released Tuesday by the committee's top Democrat, found that Cunningham had exploited weaknesses in the system for monitoring secret federal spending.

It said that he and at least one associate secured the cooperation — or at least the acquiescence — of many people. They included members of Congress and their aides who handled bills that directed money to certain programs, Pentagon officials who awarded the contracts and officials at agencies where the contract work was done.

"This was a lot of people to persuade, cajole, deceive, pressure, intimidate, bribe or otherwise influence to do what they wanted," the report's executive summary says.

DOJ_NMG_0082593

In a sign of partisan divisions on the committee, California Rep. Jane Harman, its top Democrat, unilaterally released the five-page document after months of disagreement with the committee's chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. Together, the two had initiated the investigation, led by special counsel Michael Stern, and had hoped to release the findings jointly.

Harman said the committee must examine why "red flags" did not trigger greater scrutiny of Cunningham's activities, and she added that she and Hoekstra had worked on internal changes that must be made permanent. "The goal should be to make certain that no Cunningham of either party should be able to soil our committee again," Harman said in an interview.

Hoekstra said Cunningham's efforts to enrich himself are "reprehensible" and Harman's decision to release an internal committee document "is disturbing and beyond the pale." Her action "underscores her personal decision to politicize the committee and this critical inquiry," he said.

Now serving a sentence of more than eight years, Cunningham pleaded guilty in November to accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes from alleged coconspirators — government contractors Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes.

Wade, former president of MZM Inc., has also pleaded guilty to lavishing Cunningham with a yacht, cash, cars, antiques and meals over four years. Wilkes, who has not been charged, was the founder of San Diego-based ADCS Inc.

Cunningham's attorney, Lee Blalack, and Wade's attorney, Reginald Brown, both declined to comment on the report. Blalack said the committee has not provided him a copy of the document, and Brown said he and his client weren't contacted for the investigation.

Wilkes' attorney did not immediately return a call for comment.

The House Intelligence Committee is charged with laying out intelligence spending priorities in an annual authorization bill, based on requests from lawmakers and government agencies. It then falls to the House Appropriations Committee, where Cunningham was also a member, to approve the spending.

Intelligence authorization bills are often quite broad, but some members are skilled at steering money to certain businesses.

The investigators found the committee authorized $70 million to $80 million in funding over five years that had been requested by Cunningham on behalf of Wilkes and Wade. When the legislation did not specify that the money go to companies associated with the two contractors, Cunningham still found ways to steer the funds by making his views known or using narrowly tailored language.

In one case spanning three years, Cunningham got the committee to direct to MZM a contract with a Pentagon unit called Counterintelligence Field Activity, despite aides' worries that it was a "pork barrel project and a waste of taxpayer money," the report says.

The investigators found that the committee's ability to conduct oversight of the work "appears to have been seriously impeded by the corrupt conspiracy between Cunningham and Wade."

The executive summary also acknowledges questions that remain unanswered:

• Stern's request to interview Cunningham has never been fulfilled. Harman and Hoekstra wanted to subpoena him, but Hoekstra didn't want to issue a subpoena only to have Cunningham invoke his Fifth Amendment protections, as his attorney has warned he would do. Hoekstra said discussions are continuing about Cunningham's testimony.

• Stern said "significant information" has remained out of reach. The House Appropriations Committee did not respond to requests to interview some of its staff, and follow-up requests to the Pentagon regarding some of its contracts have not been met.

• The report sees a need for law enforcement and national security agencies to examine Cunningham's dealings with foreigners. "While our review has not identified any national security breaches resulting from the Cunningham conspiracy, we are aware of dealings that that Cunningham had with certain foreign nationals," it said.

The investigations into Cunningham, Wade and Wilkes have included a number of figures whose alleged roles are only slowly coming into focus. They include the former No. 3 official at the CIA, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who retired this year under a cloud. Five federal agencies are looking into whether he used his position to improperly award classified CIA contracts to Wilkes, a close friend, and to others.

DOJ_NMG_0082594

The report says more investigation is needed into Foggo's dealings with the intelligence panel, given his close relationship with former committee aide Brant Bassett. The investigator highlighted a June 2003 dinner with Bassett, Foggo, Wilkes and an unnamed individual at a Capitol Hill steakhouse.

The report said the unnamed individual managed a company that is involved in the investigation into whether Foggo abused his position. Through CIA spokespeople, Foggo has denied wrongdoing.

Foggo and Bassett tried to motivate other committee aides with "gifts of government trinkets such as carpets emblazoned with the words 'Global War on Terror,'" the report said. "At this stage, it is unclear whether these actions violated any law or regulation, but further inquiry is appropriate."

Bribes Cost Millions In Earmarks (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham inserted up to $80 million worth of earmarks for the contractors who bribed him into classified intelligence authorization bills between 2000 and 2006, bullying staff who became concerned, according to an interim report from a special House investigation.

The report, an unclassified five-page summary of a much longer document, is the fullest accounting to date of how Cunningham -- a California Republican now in federal prison after pleading guilty last year to bribery charges -- corruptly used his position on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence to steer government business to two contractors.

It says that over six years, Cunningham and co-conspirators Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes "repeatedly sought to use [the committee] to facilitate the objectives of the conspiracy, particularly through requests for congressional funding ... that benefited Wilkes, Wade and other companies," which it does not identify.

The interim report, written by a specially appointed outside counsel, was made public by the ranking Democrat on the committee, Rep. Jane Harman of California, over the protests of Chairman Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican.

"The unilateral decision by Harman to break our bipartisan, written agreement ... by releasing an incomplete, internal committee document that has not been reviewed by the other committee members is disturbing and beyond the pale," Mr. Hoekstra said, accusing Mrs. Harman of attempting to "politicize the committee and this critical inquiry."

Hoekstra spokesman Jamal Ware said that the chairman and the majority staff became aware of Mrs. Harman's intention to release the document only a few minutes before it was made public.

Cunningham pleaded guilty last year to taking $2.4 million in bribes from Wade and Mr. Wilkes. Wade admitted bribing Cunningham and others, but coverage at that time focused on the abuse of Cunningham's position on the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense.

That subcommittee appropriates funds for U.S. intelligence agencies, and the intelligence committee also authorizes their spending. Earmarks can be added by either. Cunningham's membership on both panels, the report says, was "key to the success of the Wilkes/Wade funding requests."

Another key was Cunningham's "willingness to pressure and intimidate individual [committee] staff members" who became concerned about the projects he was supporting, according to the report.

Among the subjects that the report says are being investigated further by "appropriate law enforcement and national security agencies" are reported gifts to a Republican committee staffer from Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, a former ranking CIA official.

Report Spells Out Abuses By Former Congressman (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Former Representative Randy Cunningham pressured and intimidated staff members of the House Intelligence Committee to help steer more than $70 million in classified federal business to favored military contractors, according to a Congressional investigation made public on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0082595

The investigation found that Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican who is serving an eight-year prison sentence for bribery, repeatedly abused his position on the committee to authorize money for military projects, often over the objections of staff members who criticized some of the spending as wasteful.

The inquiry also found that despite numerous "red flags" about the propriety of a particular contract for work on a controversial Pentagon counterintelligence program, committee staff members for three years "continued to accept and support Mr. Cunningham's growing requests for this project."

Mr. Cunningham resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2 million in bribes from military contractors. His plea was mainly related to his activities as a member of the House Appropriations Committee.

The investigation's report lays out for the first time how Mr. Cunningham maneuvered within the classified world of the Intelligence Committee to win secret contracts for two friends, Brent R. Wilkes and Mitchell J. Wade, both contractors.

Lawyers for Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Wade declined to comment on the report. A lawyer for Mr. Wilkes was traveling outside the country.

The report is another embarrassment for Congressional Republicans, who, three weeks before Election Day, are trying to contain the damage from accusations that former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, made sexually explicit remarks in e-mail messages to Congressional pages. The report on Mr. Cunningham was made public by Representative Jane Harman of California, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee.

Ms. Harman's action drew a rebuke from Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan and chairman of the committee, who called the release "disturbing and beyond the pale."

In an interview, Ms. Harman said Tuesday that the public had a right to see the conclusions of the inquiry, which was led by Michael Stern, an outside special counsel, and completed in May. She said she had been pushing for months for the committee to produce an unclassified version of the report.

"I thought it would be out in early August," she said, "well ahead of the election season."

Only the five-page executive summary of the report was released. The full 59-page report remains classified.

Several crucial witnesses, including Mr. Cunningham, Mr. Wilkes and Mr. Wade, were not interviewed for the investigation.

Mr. Cunningham's positions on both the Intelligence Committee and the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee gave him an advantage in obtaining classified spending provisions called earmarks.

In theory, the Intelligence Committee is supposed to authorize classified expenses before the Appropriations Committee puts them into military spending bills. But in practice, the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee has sometimes originated classified earmarks on its own, and the Intelligence Committee depends on the appropriators for its spending requests. By serving on both panels, Mr. Cunningham had influence over the entire classified budget process.

The inquiry found no evidence that staff members of the Intelligence Committee had profited or expected to profit from Mr. Cunningham's dealings. It also concluded that committee staff members had been suspicious of Mr. Wade and "disinclined to provide him any favorable treatment."

At the same time, committee staff members repeatedly acceded to Mr. Cunningham's demands to steer money to Mr. Wade's company, MZM Inc. The report describes how Mr. Cunningham worked to gain support within the Intelligence Committee for a program run by MZM at the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency of the Pentagon.

The counterintelligence program has been criticized by civil liberties groups, which say it authorizes military officials to spy on Americans under the guise of protecting domestic military bases.

But as a result of a "corrupt conspiracy" between Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Wade, the inquiry found, the Intelligence Committee's ability to monitor the counterintelligence program effectively "appears to have been seriously impeded."

The report cited Mr. Wilkes's close friendship with Kyle Foggo, formerly a top administrator at the Central Intelligence Agency, who helped manage the agency's dealings with contractors. The inquiry found that Mr. Foggo also worked with Intelligence Committee staff members, including Brant G. Bassett, a former C.I.A. officer, on classified projects relating to the management of the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0082596

Mr. Bassett and Mr. Foggo provided Intelligence Committee members with "trinkets" to win favor for their efforts, including a carpet displaying the words "Global War on Terror." The report said it was not clear whether these activities violated any regulation or law, but it recommended further inquiry.

The report suggested that Mr. Foggo, who is under investigation by federal authorities in San Diego for his dealings with Mr. Wilkes on a logistics contract, might be facing a broader inquiry than had been known. It said the investigation of Mr. Foggo also involved "several large contracts" managed by an unidentified contractor, who attended a dinner in June 2003 with Mr. Foggo and Mr. Wilkes at the Capital Grille here.

Mr. Foggo's lawyer, Mark J. MacDougall, declined to comment.

Report: Staff Caved To 'Duke' (HILL)

By By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, October 18, 2006

An executive summary of an internal House Intelligence Committee report released Tuesday by the panel's top Democrat gives the fullest accounting to date of how disgraced ex-congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) used the intelligence panel and its professional staff to fund two defense contractors, who in turn, bribed him.

Cunningham, a former defense appropriator and chairman of the Intelligence terrorism, human intelligence, analysis and counterintelligence subcommittee, was able to obtain the intelligence panel's authorization for up to $80 million in funding for projects requested by defense contractors Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes.

The committee staff was fully aware that the funds were intended for a specific recipient and "either actively cooperated with or did not resist Cunningham's efforts to steer the funds toward that recipient," according to the report.

Intelligence Committee Chairman Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), took immediate offense to ranking member Rep. Jane Harman's (D-Calif.) decision to release the summary, saying that the move shows "blatant disregard" for a bipartisan agreement they had made to fully review the Cunningham matter and charging her with politicizing the inquiry.

Harman (D-Calif.) released the five-page unclassified report three weeks before Election Day as Republicans are playing defense on several ethics fronts.

In a statement, Hoekstra said that Cunningham had "reached out to the committee and offered his testimony, a possibility the independent counsel is still reviewing," noting that until a final determination can be made on whether Cunningham will testify, the inquiry cannot be considered complete.

Harman's decision to release the summary and Hoekstra's virulent reaction deepens a rift between the two that began months ago over whether Cunningham, who is now in prison, should be subpoenaed for the internal-panel investigation, which special counsel Michael Stern is conducting.

Harman has argued that the ex-lawmaker should be subpoenaed, but Hoekstra said subpoenaing him would not produce any new information because Cunningham would invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. In the meantime, Hoekstra contacted Cunningham in an effort he said was made to informally convince him to participate in the investigation — a move that Harman has called "totally inappropriate."

In a statement, Harman said that earlier this month Hoekstra agreed that it would be "appropriate" for the committee to release the five-page executive summary and Harman said she invited Hoekstra to join her in releasing it.

"In light of this report, our committee must examine why 'red flags' did not trigger greater scrutiny of Cunningham's activities, and what can be done to prevent this type of abuse in the future," Harman said in a statement.

The web of corruption involving Cunningham, Wade and Wilkes has spread beyond the halls of Congress to the Pentagon and the CIA.

The report did not identify any specific national security breaches resulting from the Cunningham corruption, but it did find that Cunningham had dealings with certain foreign nationals, a discovery the committee expects the appropriate national security agencies and law enforcement officials to examine.

DOJ_NMG_0082597

Cunningham's status as a defense appropriator with the power to influence the intelligence panel's key priorities and his willingness to pressure and intimidate individual staff members were key to the success of his funding requests to Wade, the owner of MZM Inc. and Wilkes, the owner of ADCS Inc., according to the report.

Wade pleaded guilty earlier this year to conspiring to bribe Cunningham, among other crimes. Cunningham is already serving an eight-year jail term after pleading guilty in November to accepting $2.4 million in bribes from Wade and Wilkes. Wilkes has not been charged with any crimes and has not pleaded guilty.

As a consequence of the conspiracy between Wade and Cunningham, the ex-lawmaker obtained support in 2003 for a new project at the Counterintelligence Field Activity office, which helps identify and thwart terrorists and spies. Committee staff agreed to support the project despite concerns that it wasted taxpayers' money.

Over time, aides also encountered numerous "red flags" with the new project, as well as with Wade's ethics, but despite those signs, Intelligence Committee staff members continued to "accept and support Cunningham's growing requests for this project from [fiscal year] '03 through FY 06," according to the report.

The conspiracy between Wade and Cunningham impeded the intelligence panel's oversight over the project and the agency itself. The committee was reluctant to share negative information about MZM and when it did, "there was little that … staff was willing or able to follow up," the report said.

But the report states that staff who dealt with Wade were, to varying degrees, suspicious of him and were not inclined to favor him other than the treatment they provided as a consequence of caving to Cunningham's demands.

The report also sheds light on the relationship between Brent Wilkes, Brant Bassett, a former panel staff member and ex-CIA operative, and Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's No. 3 officer, who resigned after federal investigators raided his house in connection with the Cunningham corruption investigation.

Porter Goss, the former head of the CIA and ex-chairman of the Intelligence Committee, who had a close relationship with Foggo, also resigned but insisted at the time that his decision to step down had nothing to do with the corruption investigation.

Bassett, also known as "Nine Fingers" after losing one digit in a motorcycle accident, served as staff director of the Intelligence Committee when Goss was the chairman. Bassett had a close relationship with Foggo, who has known Wilkes for decades. While on the committee, Bassett worked with Foggo "to achieve certain objectives relating to the management of the CIA, " according to the report.

Bassett also introduced Foggo to key committee staff and they both sought to motivate those staffers to take certain desired actions by giving them government trinkets such as a carpet emblazoned with the words "War on Terror."

"At this stage it is unclear whether these actions violated any law or regulation, but further inquiry is appropriate," the report recommends.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department investigation of Foggo in the Cunningham matter includes awards of several large contracts to a company owner other than Wade and Wilkes. Foggo introduced Bassett to that individual in the spring of 2003 when Bassett was contemplating whether to leave the committee for the private sector.

"While we have not determined that Bassett had any involvement in the award[ing] of the CIA contracts either to Wilkes or to the other individual, we believe additional inquiry is warranted to determine whether Bassett or anyone else at the [committee] facilitated or was involved in any of the contract awards," the report said.

Many In Government Helped Cunningham Or Yielded, Panel Finds (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) channeled more than $70 million in Pentagon and intelligence agency contracts to two companies that paid him bribes, and required the "cooperation or at least the non-interference of many people" to pull that off, a congressional investigation has found.

Since Cunningham had no authority to award contracts, he needed the acquiescence of some members of Congress, congressional staff members and Defense Department officials, according to the executive summary of an investigation by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence into his activities as a panel member.

"This was a lot of people to persuade, cajole, deceive, pressure, intimidate, bribe or otherwise influence to do what they wanted," the executive summary says.

Although the congressional inquiry was directed at Cunningham's activities and found no evidence of corruption among panel staff members, the five-page summary written by the panel's special counsel, Michael Stern, indicates how the continuing federal criminal investigation of corruption and bribery has continued to spread since it began almost two years ago.

The summary discloses for the first time that the government is investigating the CIA's award of "several large contracts" that involved Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo when he was No. 3 at the agency under then-Director Porter J. Goss. Foggo was a longtime friend of contractor Brent R. Wilkes, who federal investigators say was one of Cunningham's co-conspirators along with contractor Mitchell J. Wade.

Foggo resigned in May after being linked to the Cunningham inquiry. Days later, federal agents searched his agency office and his rented home in Northern Virginia.

Yesterday, agency officials refused to comment on the newly disclosed information, saying the matter is under investigation. Foggo was originally investigated by both the CIA inspector general and federal prosecutors after it was alleged this year that he had helped Wilkes obtain CIA contracts and had improperly accepted vacation trips from him.

The House report adds that another Foggo friend, Brant Bassett, a former CIA officer who worked as a staff member of the House intelligence panel, has been drawn into the case. Bassett, Foggo, Wilkes and the unnamed person who received the large CIA contracts "apparently had dinner together at the Capital Grille in June 2003," according to the summary. Stern says that meeting warranted further inquiry but was outside his jurisdiction to investigate.

The summary says Cunningham had "dealings . . . with certain foreign nationals" that have apparently triggered inquiry by "law enforcement and national security agencies."

In November 2005, Cunningham pleaded guilty to taking bribes and is serving a prison sentence of up to eight years. Wade pleaded guilty in February to giving $1 million in bribes, and his sentencing has been postponed until March. Wilkes has yet to be charged but was listed as co-conspirator No. 1 in court documents charging Cunningham.

Published reports have indicated that other members of Congress are under investigation, including Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. Stern, in his report, says requests to the committee for permission to speak to current and past staff members have not been answered.

House intelligence panel staff members were aware of Cunningham's activities and in some cases saw "red flags" but did not interfere, the report says. It adds that there was "no evidence" uncovered that any past or present committee aides "sought to profit or expect to profit personally from any of the funding requests," Stern wrote.

Release of the executive summary by the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), added fuel to the running partisan battling going on in the committee, and quickly drew criticism from its chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.).

Harman said that she acted because the original investigation was finished in May and the unclassified executive summary in July, and that the release was held up because of a disagreement between her and Hoekstra over subpoenaing Cunningham to testify. Earlier this month, according to Harman, Hoekstra agreed to release a mutually agreed upon version of the summary, which was completed last week.

Hoekstra, in a statement yesterday, described the release as "disturbing and beyond the pale," and called the summary an "incomplete, internal committee document" that other panel members had not reviewed. His statement echoed words Harman used this month when Hoekstra released reports by the committee majority staff on North Korea and Iraq that were done without the approval of Democrats on the panel.

Wade's company, MZM Inc., benefited from several questionable contracts given by the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency (CIFA), the Pentagon's newest intelligence arm, which was created in 2002 to coordinate protecting defense facilities and personnel at home and abroad from terrorist attacks. Its budget is secret, but congressional sources earlier this year said it totaled more than $1 billion over the past three years; its staff consisted of 400 full-time employees and 800 on contract status.

Cunningham, as a member of the intelligence panel, chaired the terrorism subcommittee that had authority over CIFA. The House committee's "ability to conduct appropriate oversight over the counterintelligence project at CIFA, MZM's other contracts with CIFA, and arguably CIFA as a whole appears to have been seriously impeded by the corrupt conspiracy between Cunningham and Wade," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0082599

CIFA's two top officials, director David A. Burtt II and his deputy, Joseph Hefferon, suddenly resigned in August, but other officials at the agency refused to discuss any link to the ongoing investigations. A Pentagon spokesman said their leaving was "a personal decision that they both made together."

Republican Weldon Blasts 'liberal Attack Machine' For Publicity (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale

AP, October 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A day after the FBI raided the offices of a lobbying firm run by Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and his close friend, the Republican's campaign blamed publicity about the Justice Department investigation on "the left-wing, liberal attack machine."

The FBI is investigating whether Weldon used his influence to get Karen Weldon's firm nearly $1 million in lobbying contracts with foreign companies, two people familiar with the inquiry have told The Associated Press.

Weldon pushed the agendas of three of the firm's clients in public and private, at times urging the U.S. to buy their weapons or issue them visas, according to news reports published over the past 2 1/2 years.

On Monday, Weldon questioned the timing of the raids and said his sometimes unpopular stances may have angered people on both sides of the aisle - including Republicans who control the Justice Department.

"Bureaucracy is not Democrat or Republican. Come on," Weldon said Monday.

But on Tuesday, his campaign lashed out at the left.

"Now three weeks before the election, the left-wing, liberal attack machine has launched a coordinated effort to smear U.S. Rep. Weldon and his family in a desperate attempt to steal this seat," Weldon's campaign said in a statement.

Weldon's campaign spokesman said there are Clinton-era holdovers among the civil-service employees in the Justice Department.

"I don't mean to impugn the motive of the Justice Department, but there may be partisan motives for leaking word of this inquiry three weeks before the election," the spokesman, Pete Peterson, said.

The 10-term incumbent already faced a razor-close race against Democratic challenger Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral. The two are scheduled to debate Friday.

Weldon has clashed with the Bush administration and others in Washington. Over the past year, the congressman has repeatedly said a secret military unit called "Able Danger" used data.m.ining to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. The Pentagon rejects the idea.

The FBI on Monday raided six sites in Pennsylvania and Florida linked to Karen Weldon, her business partner Charles P. Sexton Jr. and their firm. The FBI removed evidence from their homes and office and from the Jacksonville, Fla., headquarters of their former client, a Russian energy firm called Itera International Energy Corp.

The lawmaker on Tuesday blamed the investigation on the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and a group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which he said was supported by Democratic activists. In 2004, the group asked the Justice Department to investigate Weldon for alleged bribery for "using his public office to benefit companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist."

Weldon has not received a target letter - essentially a prelude to an indictment - and has not been contacted by the Justice Department about the probe, Peterson said.

Philadelphia attorney Jim Rohn, who was retained Monday to represent Karen Weldon, said she has not received a target letter and has offered to cooperate.

"From my point of view, my client hasn't done anything wrong. I've been in touch with the prosecutor, and I've offered to have her cooperate," Rohn said.

Karen Weldon, 32, runs Solutions Worldwide with Sexton, one of her father's closest friends and political allies. Sexton ran the Republican Party in Delaware County, Weldon's home base, for decades.

Sexton's lawyer, Joseph Fioravanti, declined to comment on the investigation Tuesday.

Investigation Is Just Politics, Lawmaker Says (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Representative Curt Weldon is describing a federal investigation into whether he acted improperly on behalf of his daughter's lobbying firm as an election-season ploy that will find that "I engaged in no wrongdoing."

"I am extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress," Mr. Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, said in a statement issued Monday evening. "The timing of this situation is deeply concerning."

Mr. Weldon is in a tight race against his Democratic opponent, Joseph A. Sestak Jr., a former vice admiral, in a district near Philadelphia that he has represented for 10 terms without a difficult re-election challenge.

He said in his statement that he had confirmed the government investigation, which was first reported in news accounts over the weekend, and that he would cooperate with it.

The congressman described the investigation as "preliminary." But law enforcement officials said the inquiry, which began in the spring, had advanced well along. These officials said searches carried out by federal agents on Monday at six locations, including the homes of his daughter and a close political ally of his, reflected its quickening pace.

Mr. Weldon said he was disappointed by the "politics of personal destruction," which he attributed to "left-wing liberal activists." He singled out one group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which two years ago sent a letter of complaint to the Justice Department asking that he be investigated.

The complaint was centered on a Los Angeles Times article in February 2004 that said Mr. Weldon's daughter, Karen, had reaped financial benefits from his position on the House Armed Services Committee. Mr. Weldon said Monday that the article had been referred to the House ethics committee and that the panel had concluded after its own inquiry that he had done nothing wrong.

The article reported that in September 2002, Mr. Weldon helped bring 30 Congressional colleagues to a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor the chairman of a Russian natural gas company, the Itera International Energy Corporation, several days before the company hired Karen Weldon's lobbying and public relations firm, Solutions North America.

The Jacksonville, Fla., offices of Itera, Solutions' first client, and the Philadelphia offices of Solutions were among the locations raided by F.B.I. agents on Monday. So was the home, near Philadelphia, of Ms. Weldon's partner in Solutions, Charles P. Sexton Jr., a longtime associate of the congressman.

Mr. Weldon spoke favorably about Itera in a floor speech in 2002, traveled to Russia that year to visit the company's offices and attended the opening of its American headquarters, in Jacksonville, in 2003. When he led a Congressional delegation to Eastern Europe in 2002, Itera paid for his daughter to join him on the trip.

Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Part Of Probe (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade were surprised three years ago to be invited to a luncheon in honor of visiting Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), hosted by Bogoljub Karic, a wealthy Serbian businessman who had been barred from visiting or trading with the United States because of his close ties to former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic.

Weldon "was visiting solely because of Karic," whom he was trying to get off the U.S. blacklist, a former senior embassy official familiar with the visit concluded. "It seemed odd" at the time, because Karic had no obvious tie to Weldon's district outside Philadelphia, and Weldon should have known the embassy was shunning contacts with him, the official said.

What the embassy apparently did not know is that the Karic family that year signed a contract with Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner that called for monthly payments of $20,000 for "management, government and public relations," according to a copy of the March 2003 contract. In all, the family paid Karen Weldon's firm $133,858 that year for efforts she undertook to set up a foundation for it.

DOJ_NMG_0082601

Curt Weldon's visit and that deal are under investigation by the FBI, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the probe. His efforts to assist clients of his daughter's consulting firm in their dealings with the federal government are the focus of that probe, according to sources familiar with it .

FBI raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida on Monday, including one of Karen Weldon's home and another of her consulting and lobbying firm, were part of the bureau's search for evidence of whether the lawmaker used his influence to benefit himself or his daughter's firm, according to the sources. They spoke on the condition that they not be named because of the sensitivity of the investigation.

A grand jury has been impaneled as part of the investigation, and it has obtained evidence gathered via wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers, the sources said.

Weldon has said he did not take actions to enrich his daughter or himself. His attorney, William J. Winning, said yesterday that "the congressman did nothing wrong, nor did his daughter do anything wrong." Winning added that he was not prepared to justify or discuss Weldon's travels.

Besides looking at Weldon's Karic connection, the FBI is examining the lawmaker's contacts with a Russian-managed oil and gas company, Itera International Energy Corp., the sources said. The company's offices in Jacksonville, Fla., were searched on Monday.

Itera spokesman Steve Koegler declined to answer questions yesterday, but released a statement saying that the government had expressed interest Monday in "any records or information Itera might have with respect to Itera's business relationship with Solutions Worldwide." The name of the firm that Karen Weldon operates with one of her father's close political supporters, Charles Sexton, is Solutions North America Inc.

"Itera and all of its employees have cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the government's request," the statement added.

According to a statement Karen Weldon filed with the Justice Department's foreign agent registration office, Itera agreed in September 2002 to pay her firm a $170,000 startup fee and $300,000 more in monthly retainer fees, in exchange for "such consulting services" as the company might request.

That was the same month that her father attended a lavish dinner for the company at the Library of Congress, at which Itera's director, Igor Makarov, announced the start of a U.S.-Russian student exchange program, based in Weldon's district. Members of Congress were to nominate participants in the program.

That year, Weldon complained to the U.S. Trade and Development Agency about its cancellation of a grant to Itera to explore a gas field in Siberia.

In filings with the Senate clerk, Weldon has reported that Itera paid for a trip he took to New York in September 2002 and a one-day trip to Jacksonville in January 2003. He also reported that a nonprofit group directed by Itera officials financed his two-day visit to Jacksonville in November 2002.

Weldon, who has long advocated closer U.S.-Russian trade ties, listed another client of his daughter's firm, Saratov Aviation, as the financial sponsor of a three-day trip to Moscow in January 2003, the same month as a visit he took to Belgrade.

Weldon's chief of staff went to Belgrade in November 2003, initially listing the Karic family as his financial sponsor in a filing the next month with the Senate clerk. Two months later, after reporters for the Los Angeles Times questioned him about the trip, he amended the filing to state that he had reimbursed the company for his travel expenses.

Some watchdog organizations previously noted Weldon's support for companies that had little to do with his constituents in Delaware County and that paid fees to the firm operated by his daughter and Sexton, or to a close friend of Weldon's, lobbyist Cecilia Grimes.

"There seems to be a pattern of Congressman Weldon's activities overlapping with his private and personal interests," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, which monitored the efforts of Weldon and other lawmakers on behalf of companies that had contracts with their associates. "You can explain away one or two cases, but here you really have to question what's going on here and is it really in the interest of the U.S. taxpayers."

Weldon gave testimonials on behalf of a company, Advanced Ceramics Research, in two separate hearings of the House Armed Services subcommittee on tactical air and land forces, which he chairs. Weldon had invited the Arizona company's CEO to testify in 2004 and 2005 about what he characterized as its "very interesting work in developing state of the art composites that have increased performance while significantly reducing component cost."

DOJ_NMG_0082602

The congressman lauded the company's work, noting its ability to produce "modern composites that lead to lighter weight, lower cost and tougher systems."

Advanced Ceramics Research paid Grimes $60,000 as its registered lobbyist in 2003 and 2004. An affiliate of Advanced Ceramics paid her an additional $40,000 during that time, according to her lobbying registration documents.

Efforts to reach Grimes at two phone numbers listed for her on lobbying registration forms were unsuccessful.

Weldon also supported an Italian defense contractor, Oto Melara, in a formal letter and testimony to the Armed Services Committee that recommended the Navy consider using the company's guns on its ships. Oto Melara has paid Grimes's firm $60,000 since she registered to lobby for it in June 2005, according to her lobbying reports .

Research director Lucy Shackelford and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Weldon's Itera Ties Long Known (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

As President Bush prepared to announce a new energy cooperation pact with Russia in May 2002, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and 10 fellow lawmakers sat down in Moscow with executives of oil and gas trader Itera Group, praising the company as a prime prospect for U.S. partnerships.

Itera had fallen under scrutiny at the time for its ties to Gazprom, Russia's state-owned natural gas giant, but its congressional clout remained strong, with help from Weldon and his daughter, Karen, whose public relations firm signed a $500,000 contract with Itera four months after the 2002 trip.

Itera is facing new questions this week after federal agents raided the company's Florida office as well as the homes of Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, her business partner and a longtime adviser to the embattled ten-term Republican, locked in the toughest re-election fight of his career. But despite Weldon's public speculation about a politically motivated probe, one Democrat came to Itera's defense yesterday.

"I only have good things to say about them," said Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.), whose district includes Itera's Jacksonville headquarters. Brown, who joined Weldon on the 2002 codel to Russia, led a later celebration of Itera's 10th anniversary in Florida that featured entertainment from Oscar winner Isaac Hayes and two Russian pop singers.

Brown said she was "really surprised by the nature of the investigation" of Weldon's links with Itera and two other foreign clients of his daughter, which Brown said she first heard of through news reports this week. "I just don't know how whether or not a person had a [lobbying] client would generate that kind of response."

Brown issued a statement on the 2002 codel, her portion of which was approved and paid for by the transportation committee. Lawmakers on the trip met with members of the Russian Parliament and the president of Uzbekistan and Azerbaijan, she said.

Karen Weldon and Sexton filed a lobbying registration for Itera International on Sept. 13, 2002, less than two weeks before nearly 30 lawmakers from both sides of the aisle joined Rep. Weldon for a Library of Congress dinner honoring Itera and its CEO, Igor Makarov. In a floor speech after the event, Rep. Weldon said the dinner was in gratitude for the May 2002 meeting and referred to meetings he suggested between Itera executives and former Central Intelligence Agency chief James Woolsey.

Itera did not return a request for comment on its meetings with Weldon and other lawmakers. Itera's lobbying stable includes Brown's daughter, Shantrel Brown Fields, who signed a deal in February for her firm, Alcalde & Fay, to represent the company on "international debt issues."

Weldon's office declined to comment on the ongoing probe, other than to point out that the lawmaker has not been contacted by the Justice Department. His lawyer in the criminal inquiry did not return a call for comment by press time.

James Rohn, a Pennsylvania lawyer representing Karen Weldon, said she plans to cooperate with the government actions. "From where I sit, she hasn't done anything that's wrong," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082603

In a statement posted late Monday to his campaign Web site, Weldon called the timing of the raid and investigation "deeply concerning."

Referring to a 2004 House ethics committee inquiry into Weldon's advocacy for his daughter's clients, opened at his behest, Weldon also asserted that the panel had absolved him of wrongdoing. Yet the ethics committee never publicly released any findings from that inquiry, suggesting that it may not have been completed.

Weldon's Democratic opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, out-raised Weldon during the third quarter and continues to win plaudits from the national party for a well-run campaign. His camp has stayed largely silent as the federal raid dominates local media coverage, letting Weldon's ethics drama play itself out with no distractions.

Despite Weldon's hints of a politically motivated probe, nonpartisan ethics groups point out that the Justice Department has conducted itself under a Republican administration.

"One thing I've noticed about the FBI is, they don't give two hoots about the election calendar or sessions of Congress," said Craig Holman, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch. "If they did, they would have come through with these indictments earlier in the session when we were trying to get meaningful lobbying and ethics legislation through."

William Canfield, a Williams & Jensen lawyer and former Senate Ethics Committee aide who represented Weldon in the 2004 matter, said the Justice Department's moves would likely stave off any further House ethics committee action this year.

"Plus, if he doesn't win, they're not going to care. … [There is] no impetus for them to do something until after the election," Canfield said. He questioned why federal prosecutors would rev up their pursuit of new information in the caseatthis late date. "Why it took two years for the Justice Department to read the L.A. Times, I have no idea."

Two other foreign clients of Solutions North America are at issue in the federal investigation: Russia-based Saratov Aviation, for which Karen Weldon and Sexton registered to lobby in 2003 under the firm name Solutions Worldwide, and the Karic brothers, members of a Serbian family linked to deceased dictator Slobodan Milosevic.

The Odor From Capitol Hill (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

As predicaments go for champions of family values, few can top the embarrassment suffered by Representative Curt Weldon when federal agents raided the home of his daughter, a Washington lobbyist, in search of evidence that the powerful lawmaker helped her with lucrative clients. The grand jury is still out on the investigation, and Mr. Weldon, a Pennsylvania Republican, says he is innocent. But with each fresh scandal, the tattooing of the G.O.P.-run 109th Congress continues in pre-election polls.

Voters had no sooner adjusted to the shock of seeing Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, disgraced from office by his come-ons to Congressional pages than Bob Ney took his turn on the pre-election scandal smorgasbord. Representative Ney, Republican of Ohio, pleaded guilty to being a principal in the quid-pro-quo insiders' market run by Jack Abramoff, the corrupt Republican lobbyist who is cooperating with investigators about his ties to Congress and the White House. Another Republican, former Representative Randy Cunningham of California, is already doing time. He sold his office in steering $70 million in contracts to companies that offered bribes ranging from a Rolls-Royce to a carpet emblazoned "Global War on Terror."

It should be remembered that Speaker Dennis Hastert, now under fire in the Foley scandal, helped dampen any chance of in-House ethical controls in his failed attempt to save the career of former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, an Abramoff ally who is accused of political money laundering and is awaiting trial. The sight of the ossified ethics committee forced back to life by the Foley scandal is more pathetic than heartening. It's small wonder that lawmakers feel empowered to make ethical stretches — like Representative John Doolittle's boosting his own family's value by having his wife designated a consultant and paying her a 15 percent commission off the top of his campaign kitty.

The hustings ring with Democrats' vows to restore ethical spine. But the minority has its own problem in Representative William Jefferson of Louisiana, who is accused of taking bribe money and hiding it in his home freezer. And Democrats are not helped when their Senate leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, amends his ethics filings to better report a real estate windfall, and misuses campaign money to pay helpers at his Washington condo.

The G.O.P. leaders have themselves to blame for their multiple millstones. If they had passed actual ethics reform, instead of deep-sixing it in bromides, there could have been a believable independent corruption office to take some of the heat off their current plight as compromised self-investigators. (One of the defeated reforms would have denied pensions to lawmakers convicted of official abuses. Instead, Messrs. Cunningham and Ney are likely to keep collecting behind bars.)

Congressmen caught in wrongdoing at this time of year like to complain that they're the victims of election-eve politics. If the looming elections inspire whistleblowers, we say bravo. The prospect of voting day fills the vacuum created by the absence of an actual set of enforceable ethics rules in Congress.

Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million (NYT)

By ANEMONA HARTOCOLLIS And STEVEN GREENHOUSE

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

Brian M. McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman who as head of the nation's biggest municipal labor council personified New York City's politically powerful labor movement, was arrested yesterday on federal racketeering charges involving embezzlement, receiving bribes, fraud and money laundering. Conviction on all 43 charges could send him to prison for decades.

A 186-page indictment charges Mr. McLaughlin, 54, with illegally obtaining $2.2 million from taxpayers, labor unions and contractors over the last decade since he became president of the New York City Central Labor Council, a federation of 400 union locals with one million members.

The accusations range from the Dickensian (stealing $95,000 from Little League baseball teams to pay his rent) to the brazen (creating two no-show jobs on his legislative payroll and keeping part of one salary), according to the painstakingly detailed racketeering indictment unsealed yesterday.

Mr. McLaughlin surrendered early yesterday. He pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in Federal District Court in Manhattan before Magistrate Judge James C. Francis IV, and was released on $250,000 bail. His lawyer, Jonathan Bach, did not return a call for comment.

Law enforcement officials said that Mr. McLaughlin used subordinates as "personal servants," to take his dog to the veterinarian, hang Christmas lights, trap rodents in his basement and clean out his barn.

He is also charged with making an aide use his E-ZPass at tollbooths to make it appear that he had returned home from Albany later than he really had, allowing him to bill for daily allowances given to legislators.

He is accused of using more than $330,000 from his re-election campaign funds to pay for personal expenses like a rehearsal dinner for his son's wedding, renovation of his $760,000 house in Suffolk County near Long Island Sound, payment of his country club membership fees and the purchase and installation of a plasma television for a female friend.

He is charged with using stolen money for an $80,000 Mercedes-Benz for his wife, marina fees, school tuition for one of his children, rent payments on his Albany residence and rent payments on his Queens residence.

Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for Manhattan, said the extent of the thefts was "stunning in its breadth and scope," at a news conference yesterday announcing the indictment.

"This case lends a new meaning to the term 'hand in the till,' " he said.

Asked why Mr. McLaughlin would go to so much trouble to steal money when he was making what many would consider much more than a decent living — $263,600 in combined salaries and expenses as an assemblyman and labor council president — Mr. Garcia said he could not offer any insight, except to say, "What we have here is really a story of greed."

For more than a decade, Mr. McLaughlin was among the most influential labor leaders in New York City and in the state, providing pivotal early support for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg's re-election and supporting the failed effort to build a football stadium on the Far West Side of Manhattan. He led the fight to keep Wal-Mart out of the city and lent strong support to transit workers during last year's strike.

The investigation became public seven months ago when the F.B.I. raided Mr. McLaughlin's offices.

Some labor experts said they were shocked by the scope of yesterday's accusations, which could represent a huge embarrassment for organized labor and elected officials.

"If these charges prove true, it's certainly a blot on the union movement, and whenever there's a corruption case involving a high-profile union leader, it has to hurt that much worse," said Joshua Freeman, a professor of labor history at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York.

Mr. McLaughlin, a Democrat, is the eighth state lawmaker accused of crimes in recent years. He announced in January that he would not run for an eighth Assembly term.

Republicans did not hesitate to capitalize on the indictment. "Today, New York's Assembly Democrats continued their long tradition of corruption," Stephen Minarik, chairman of the Republican State Committee, said in a statement.

A spokesman for the Assembly speaker, Sheldon Silver, a Democrat, would say only that the Assembly had cooperated with the inquiry.

Denis Hughes, president of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O. and chairman of the labor council's executive board, responded to the indictment with a statement: "Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations."

Labor Leader Arrested For Racketeering (AP)

By Pat Milton, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- The president of the nation's largest municipal labor council was arrested on federal racketeering charges Tuesday, accused of stealing more than $2 million from the state, labor unions and even a Little League fund.

Brian M. McLaughlin, a seven-term Democratic state assemblyman and president of the New York City Central Labor Council, has been under investigation for several years.

He surrendered Tuesday morning and was released on $250,000 bail after a brief appearance before U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. Francis. McLaughlin and his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, declined to comment as they left U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

"Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations," said the labor council's executive board chairman, Denis M. Hughes.

The labor council is an umbrella group of unions that has supported Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

In a 186-page indictment unsealed Tuesday, McLaughlin and others are accused of engaging in racketeering from 1995 through 2006 by using money collected for union activities to instead pay personal expenses, including credit card bills, rent and home improvements.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin committed mail fraud, embezzlement, money laundering and labor bribery by diverting money from various funds he controlled.

Among the funds identified were McLaughlin's political campaign committee, union accounts meant to provide benefits for union members and even contributions meant to support a Little League baseball program.

The indictment also alleges McLaughlin and others misappropriated funds from the state by creating fictitious jobs on his legislative staff and submitting false expense forms.

Among the expenses named in the indictment were more than $4,100 to maintain a boat in Tuckerton, N.J., and $4,200 for Long Island country club membership dues.

The indictment accuses McLaughlin of combining with others, not named in the indictment, to obtain hundreds of thousands of dollars in unlawful payments and things of value from street lighting contractors and other companies in the street lighting and traffic signal industry.

It also focuses at one point on a housing development created in 1950 by union leaders and electrical industry management that resulted in more than 30 large apartment buildings. As part of the development, residents created the Electchester Athletic Association Inc. to run a youth sports programs.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin used his position as state assemblyman to direct state money to that athletic association, then defrauded the association of more than $95,000.

Meanwhile, the indictment noted, McLaughlin continued soliciting donations to the athletic fund with sponsorship forms thanking the contributor and concluding with the message: "A CHILD IN SPORTS STAYS OUT OF THE COURTS!"

Associated Press Writers Larry Neumeister in New York and Michael Gormley in Albany contributed to this report.

McLaughlin Pleads Innocent To U.S. Charges (NYS)

By Russell Berman, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 18, 2006

A Queens assemblyman who is one of the city's top labor leaders is facing a lifetime in prison after federal prosecutors charged him with stealing $2.2 million from the state government, union members, a political club, and a Little League baseball association.

The assemblyman, Brian McLaughlin, the president of the New York City Central Labor Council, surrendered to authorities yesterday at federal district court in Lower Manhattan and became the latest in a series of state legislators from New York City to come under criminal charges. He pleaded not guilty to 44 counts of racketeering, embezzlement, conspiracy, and fraud.

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District, Michael Garcia, said Mr. McLaughlin's alleged crimes "add new meaning to the term 'hand-in-the-till.'"

A 186-page indictment alleges a complex scheme that Mr. Garcia called "stunning in its breadth and its scope." Prosecutors charge that Mr. McLaughlin, 54, accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from city street lighting contractors, installed his cronies in fictitious positions with the state Assembly and the labor council to funnel cash to himself, and laundered money to hide his crimes and evade law enforcement.

Mr. McLaughlin allegedly used the money to buy an $80,000 Mercedes-Benz, purchase a wide-screen plasma television for a friend, and pay an initiation fee and membership dues, totaling at least $28,600, for a Long Island country club. The indictment also alleges he used the money to finance his son's wedding and make payments on his residences in Albany, Queens, and Long Island.

The charges signal a steep fall for Mr. McLaughlin, who was once talked about as a potential candidate for mayor. The authorities yesterday portrayed him as a man motivated by greed who used each of his leadership positions as a money-making venture.

"The Midas touch turned everything into gold. The McLaughlin touch made money disappear into his own pockets," the special agent heading the FBI's New York criminal division, Andrew Arena, said at a press conference announcing the indictment.

No one else was named in the indictment, but Mr. Garcia said the investigation was ongoing and did not rule out further charges.

Mr. McLaughlin did not comment in response to the accusations. "The case is now in the court of law, so we're going to save our comments for the courtroom," his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, said after Mr. McLaughlin was arraigned before federal Magistrate Judge James Francis IV yesterday. Two of the 44 counts are filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which some have criticized when it is used in cases that don't involve traditional organized crime families.

The assemblyman was released on $250,000 bond.The maximum prison sentence for the 44 counts totals 535 years.

With yesterday's indictment, Mr. McLaughlin becomes the ninth state legislator representing the city to face charges in the last three years. Two others were charged in the last three months. State Senator Efrain Gonzalez Jr., a Democrat of the Bronx, was accused in August of using $37,000 in funds from a nonprofit group for personal expenses, including buying Yankees tickets and vacationing in the Dominican Republic. In July, Assemblywoman Diane Gordon, a Democrat of Brooklyn, was indicted for allegedly soliciting a $500,000 bribe. Both have pleaded not guilty and are seeking re-election.

First elected to the Assembly in 1992, Mr. McLaughlin is not seeking an eighth term this year, having said that he wanted to devote more time to union duties. He represents the 25th district in Queens, which includes Flushing, Whitestone, and Jamaica. Mr. McLaughlin has been a prominent supporter of Mayor Bloomberg and has backed several of his major development projects. A spokesman for the mayor declined comment yesterday.

The federal investigation of Mr. McLaughlin dates back years and became public in March when the FBI launched an early morning raid of the Central Labor Council's offices, removing boxes of documents.

As president of the council, Mr. McLaughlin led more than one million city union members. The umbrella group is the nation's largest municipal union association and is an affiliate of the AFL-CIO. Its leadership offered support for Mr. McLaughlin yesterday.

"Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations," the chairman of the council's executive board, Denis Hughes, said in a statement. Mr. Hughes is the president of the state AFL-CIO.

Union leaders held a conference call early yesterday to discuss how to respond to the accusations against Mr. McLaughlin, a spokesman for the state AFL-CIO, Mario Cilento, said. Although Mr. McLaughlin took a sixmonth paid leave of absence beginning last month, he will remain as president of the labor council pending the charges, Mr. Cilento said.

While the investigation and the possibility of criminal charges against Mr. McLaughlin were well known to union leaders, some were said to be shocked by the extent of the alleged scheme.

The charges also put the Democrat running to replace Mr. McLaughlin in the Assembly, Rory Lancman, in a political quandary. Mr. Lancman is close to Mr. McLaughlin and had posted on his campaign Web site a photographic "tribute" to the assemblyman. That tribute has since been removed, although photos of Mr. McLaughlin remain on the site.

"Everyone is entitled to the presumption of innocence in America, but the government's allegations are extremely disturbing." Mr. Lancman said yesterday, adding that it was a "sad day" for the community.

According to the indictment, Mr. McLaughlin, over more than decade, used a variety of nefarious methods to steal money from several organizations, including the labor council, the Assembly, and his political campaign committee. He also allegedly stole more than $140,000 from a division of the union he ran, Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. And he allegedly pocketed $95,000 that was intended for the Electchester Athletic Association, a Little League baseball program created for the children of union members.

The indictment further accuses Mr. McLaughlin of promoting a relative to head a labor council panel called the Commission on the Dignity of Immigrants. The relative was a chiropractor who had no experience working with immigrants, and there was no evidence he did any work for the commission. His entire salary went to Mr. McLaughlin, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors also say Mr. McLaughlin made union members perform menial tasks for him, treating them like his own "private workforce." Union members chased rodents in Mr. McLaughlin's basement, shoveled snow and hung Christmas lights for him, the indictment alleges.

The schemes and the servants allowed Mr. McLaughlin to "support his own version of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous,'" the commissioner of the city's Department of Investigation, Rose Gill Hearn, said.

Dem Leader Charged (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer; Compiled By Carl Macgowan

Long Island Newsday, October 18, 2006

Feds say Flushing Assemb. McLaughlin defrauded unions, Assembly and Little League of $2.2 million

Federal officials yesterday charged longtime Flushing Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin, a key Queens Democratic Party leader and a dominant labor leader in the city, with carrying out a scheme to enrich himself by plundering unions, the Assembly and even a Little League group of $2.2 million to pad his lifestyle.

McLaughlin, 54, who has a rent-controlled apartment in Flushing and a home in Suffolk County at 1 Hawks Nest in Nissequogue, surrendered yesterday morning at FBI headquarters in Manhattan to face a 44-count racketeering indictment accusing him of mail fraud, money laundering, bank fraud, federal labor law violations and other crimes.

If convicted of the most serious charge of bank fraud, he faces a 30-year prison term.

"This case lends new meaning to the term 'hand in the till,'" said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in announcing the charges.

"It is a case about greed, about a high-ranking union official stealing from union members by siphoning off dues and a State Assemblyman stealing ... by no-show jobs and fraudulent vouchers."

McLaughlin appeared before a federal magistrate judge in Manhattan U.S. District Court and was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond.

Defense attorney Jonathan Bach couldn't be reached for comment.

Garcia termed the charges "stunning in breadth and scope," ranging from McLaughlin allegedly taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from streetlighting contractors doing business with the city to embezzling Little League funds.

The money generated by the various schemes was used to pay for an $80,000 2002 Mercedes-Benz, marina fees for a boat, country club initiation dues, construction of a new Long Island home, credit card bills and a wedding rehearsal dinner for one of McLaughlin's sons, officials said.

The alleged theft was done so McLaughlin "could support his own version of lifestyle of the rich and famous," said Rose Gill Hearn, head of the city's Department of Investigation.

McLaughlin is accused of using union members while they worked on regular shifts for their bosses to do chores for him that included shoveling snow, changing light bulbs, cleaning out a barn and capturing rodents in the basement of his house, investigators said. According to the indictment, women who had a "personal relationship" with McLaughlin also reaped some financial benefits from his actions. McLaughlin is married and has five children.

Among McLaughlin's alleged victims were the Electchester Athletic Association of Flushing, which raises money to fund Little League programs. The association lost $100,000 through McLaughlin's misappropriation, the indictment charged.

Among the largest alleged thefts was $400,000 from streetlighting contracts, federal officials said. None of the companies were identified in the indictment.

Other alleged victims were a branch of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Central Labor Council, the Committee to Elect Brian McLaughlin and the Clinton Democratic Club.

Word had surfaced earlier this year that federal authorities were investigating McLaughlin.

He decided to take a leave of absence from his post as head of the New York Central Labor Council on Sept. 1, but continued to draw a $167,629 salary package.

In addition, he said he wouldn't seek re-election to the Assembly, where he has served for seven terms.

Brian McLaughlin

54 years old

Married

Has five children

In seventh term as Democratic assemblyman representing the 25th District in Flushing.

Last month, began six-month leave of absence from labor council amid federal probe of suspected bid-rigging on city streetlighting contracts.

Announced in January he would not run for re-election in order to spend more time serving the Central Labor Council, of which he has been president since 1995. The council represents 1.3 million workers in 400 union locals.

Compiled by Carl MacGowan

The accused

New York State Assemb. Brian McLaughlin was arraigned in federal court on corruption charges yesterday. Below, some of the cash amounts and allegations against him:

Amount Allegation

$400,000 Taken in illegal cash payments from contractors; also, three vehicles, one of which he gave to his son and a woman friend.

$330, 000 From his campaign committee to renovate and clean his Nissequogue house, paid for country club fees.

$100,000 From union dues to pay personal credit card bills and country club dues

$100,000 From a Little League based at the Pomonok Houses in Flushing.

$25,000 Pocketed from the state using a fictitious employee.

$19,000 From the William Jefferson Clinton Democratic Club of Queens, which he cofounded, for personal expenses, paying rent on his Albany home and a plasma television for a woman he had a "personal relationship" with

Other allegations

Stole funds from the J division of Local 3 of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Used union members on shifts for contractors to do personal chores such as moving appliances, shoveling snow, putting up Christmas lights, plumbing work and catching rodents in his basement.

The Secret Life Of Labor King (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, October 18, 2006

He even stole from the kids.

The powerful boss of the city's biggest labor group was charged yesterday with a massive $2.2 million shakedown scheme - using his influence and seat on the state Assembly to line his pockets.

No one was immune from his greed, not union members - not even Little Leaguers.

Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin allegedly used the stolen funds to finance a high-flying lifestyle that included a Long Island mansion, luxury cars, country clubs and gifts for several lady friends.

"What we have here is a story of greed," said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in announcing the charges. "This case lends new meaning to the term 'hand in the till.'"

The sheer size of the scam put McLaughlin, 54, a seven-term Democratic legislator and longtime executive director of New York City Central Labor Council, an umbrella group that has more than 1 million members, into the pantheon of crooked powerbrokers.

Prosecutors said he has been stealing money for much of the past decade while he held both jobs.

Added city Department of Investigation Commissioner Rose Gill Hearn: "This was all done so that the defendant could support his own version of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous.'"

According to Garcia, no scheme was too small for the money-grubbing legislator who started his working life as an electrician, then earned bachelor's and master's degrees and rose to lead Local 3 of the Electrical Workers Union.

The feds said McLaughlin ran a squeeze play on Queens' Little Leaguers for years while serving as treasurer of the Electchester Athletic Association, located at a union-sponsored housing development in Queens.

McLaughlin allegedly stole nearly $100,000 while raising funds for the group, using the slogan: "A Child in Sports Stays out of the Courts."

And when a league official tried to use $2,800 to pay for legitimate softball expenses in June 2004, McLaughlin was enraged, the indictment says.

"All that f-----g money, he's f-----g spending on other stuff, that ain't his money," McLaughlin said. "That's mine."

Among other crimes allegedly committed by McLaughlin, according to a 44-count racketeering indictment:

He got $400,000 in illegal payments as well as three cars from contractors who hired Local 3 electricians. One car went to his son and the other to a female friend.

nHe diverted campaign contributions to pay for a female friend's widescreen plasma television and got $61,000 from a contractor to pay for a Mercedes-Benz for his wife. He also used campaign cash to pay for his son's August 2004 wedding by creating a no-show consultant's job for his daughter-in-law.

He employed a battalion of rank-and-file electricians to drive family members to doctor's appointments, hang Christmas lights, shovel out his horse barn and snatch up rodents running through his basement.

nHe forced Local 3 members to kick back monthly payments from the sale of scrap metals and other materials salvaged from their work.

He took $100,000 from an electrical workers union account and used it to pay credit card bills as well as dues for the North Hempstead Country Club.

DOJ_NMG_0082610

He gave checks totaling $21,900 to a woman with whom he had a personal relationship; the money was taken from union funds. A second female friend was paid $6,000 out of his campaign committee funds. He also arranged for that same woman to be hired at the city labor council.

He also used the money to pay for school tuition for his son; the mortgage on his home in Nissequogue, L.I., and rent on an Albany residence.

McLaughlin had union members drive up to Albany using his E-ZPass so that he could get credit for the per diem he'd received from the Assembly for each Albany appearance.

At his arraignment in Manhattan Federal Court, McLaughlin pleaded not guilty to the indictment and was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. McLaughlin, who could go to prison for the rest of his life, declined comment as he left the courthouse with his wife, Eva.

After the FBI raided both his union and Assembly offices this year, McLaughlin announced he would not seek reelection. Later, he took a leave of absence from the Central Labor Council.

With Greg B. Smithand Joe Mahoney

St. Peters Mayor Likely To Plead Guilty (SLPD)

By Valerie Schremp Hahn, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 18, 2006

ST. PETERS -- St. Peters Mayor Shawn Brown is expected to plead guilty Friday in his bribery case, authorities said Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Albus said Tuesday that Brown "had indicated his intent to plead guilty." Brown, 34, is expected to appear before U.S. District Judge Henry Autrey to change his plea from not guilty.

Brown and his attorney, Scott Rosenblum, could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

By state law, if the mayor pleads guilty to a crime related to his job, he also forfeits his office.

Albus would not confirm whether a plea agreement had been reached but said it was customary to have one under these circumstances. A pre-sentencing report is usually made after a plea, and the defendant is sentenced about three months later. The charge carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

Brown was indicted in August on a charge of soliciting and accepting a $2,750 bribe from Redflex Traffic Systems Inc., which in June got the contract to install red-light cameras in St. Peters. Brown is accused of telling a Redflex employee he would veto the measure approving the system's installation unless the company paid him off. Redflex told the FBI and cooperated with the agency in giving Brown a check, authorities said. Brown has said the money was a campaign contribution.

Brown has remained free on his promise to show up for scheduled court appearances.

St. Peters city attorney Randy Weber said that if Brown had to leave office, the president of the board would become the acting mayor and would then call a meeting of the board within 10 days to elect someone to fill the position until the next municipal election. That will be in April, and candidates may run to fill the rest of the term, which ends in April 2008. Brown is serving his first term in office. He defeated longtime incumbent Tom Brown in 2004.

Board President Bruce Holt reacted with surprise and pity for Brown's family when told of the anticipated plea.

"I just wish him and his family the best, God bless him," said Holt. "He had a bright future."

Ex-GBI Agent Sentenced In Kickback Deal (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 18, 2006

A former special agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation was sentenced Tuesday to one year and a day in federal prison for receiving illegal kickback payments and failing to maintain firearms records.

James R. Garmon, 52, brokered the sale of more than $5,000 worth of firearms that had been seized by Bartow County deputies to a local pawnshop, the U.S. attorney's office said.

GBI Director Vernon Keenan said his agency cooperated with the FBI's investigation.

"It is extremely disappointing when any GBI employee is implicated in criminal activity, especially an individual sworn to uphold the law," he said.

Prosecutors said that between December 2004 and October 2005, Garmon brokered at least three deals involving 81 firearms between Bartow officials and Warren's Pawn and Jewelry. He received at least $1,600 from the pawnshop for brokering the deal, prosecutors said.

Georgia law requires that seized firearms be kept by sheriff's offices for use, destroyed or sold to the highest bidder at public auction.

Garmon, a Cartersville resident, resigned from the GBI in March after the GBI was advised of the results of the investigation.

"To make a little extra money, this defendant, a former law enforcement officer, circumvented the process for legally disposing of seized firearms," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias. "We will continue to hold public servants, especially those officials who have sworn to enforce the law, to the highest standard of lawful conduct."

— Associated Press

Feds Charge Alleged Pa. Mob Boss With Trying To Kill Witness (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, October 18, 2006

HARRISBURG, Pa. -- An alleged mobster facing drug charges planned to kill a witness against him while out on bail, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

A new indictment against William D'Elia, 60, of Hughestown, who reputedly heads the Bufalino crime family, charges him with solicitation of murder, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, violating bail conditions, money laundering and other offenses.

D'Elia told an informant in August that he would give him photographs of a witness who cooperated with prosecutors and told him to wait for a signal to kill the man, according to the 18-count indictment issued Tuesday.

He previously pleaded not guilty to charges he laundered drug proceeds through bogus companies, loans and consulting agreements. Those charges related to an investigation into John Doncses, who pleaded guilty in Florida six years ago to distributing more than 100 kilograms of marijuana.

D'Elia was arrested on the new charges last week, federal prosecutors said. A phone message seeking comment left late Tuesday afternoon at the office of Philip Gelso, listed in federal records as D'Elia's lawyer, was not immediately returned.

The U.S. Attorney's Office released information about the indictment shortly before the end of the business day Tuesday.

D'Elia has been linked to organized crime by the FBI, the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, and former Philadelphia and South Jersey mob boss Ralph Natale. New Jersey gambling regulators banned him from that state's casinos in 2003.

A court affidavit filed Thursday in Scranton said D'Elia "is often said to be used as a mediator between families when there are disputes. D'Elia has met, on a frequent basis, with members of the Joseph Ligambi organization from Philadelphia and also has frequent contacts with western Pennsylvania and New York families."

Man Arrested On Child-porn Charges After Internet Sting (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. -- An Orange County man was arrested by federal agents after he sent sexual pictures of himself and his 15-month-old daughter over the Internet, authorities said.

The man was ordered to be held without bail at a court appearance in federal court Monday. He faces child-pornography charges, and has been assigned an assistant federal public defender.

The Associated Press will not release the man's name to protect his daughter's identity.

An Internet sting conducted by the Central Florida Innocent Images Task Force, which includes a Seminole County sheriff's detective, led to his arrest.

The man "admitted to producing three videos of himself and his daughter engaged in sexual activity," FBI agent Keith Scott wrote in a charging affidavit. The suspect also "admitted to transmitting these videos to multiple individuals over the Internet."

He also chatted online with a Tennessee-based FBI agent posing as a 13-year-old.

Internet subscriber and user records kept by Yahoo, BellSouth and Level 3 Communications linked the Yahoo screen name used by the suspect to his address at an apartment complex.

DOJ_NMG_0082612

Agents showed the e-mailed video files to the girl's mother, who identified the child. The girl remains with her mother, who is not suspected of any wrongdoing, agents said.

A telephone message left at the federal public defender's office in Orlando, who is representing the man, was not immediately returned.

Grand Jury Indicts Capitol Intruder (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 18, 2006

A grand jury yesterday handed down an eight-count indictment to the man who breached Capitol Police security last month and led officers on a three floor chase inside the U.S. Capitol before he was apprehended on the basement floor.

The charges against Carlos Greene include fleeing a law enforcement officer, two counts of destruction of government property, assaulting, resisting or impeding certain officers or employees and unlawful possession of five grams or more of cocaine.

Also included in the charges were several firearms violations such as possession of a gun on Capitol grounds and carrying and possessing a firearm during drug trafficking offense.

Noe Called Coin Funds An ATM, Ex-aide Says (COLDISP)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, October 18, 2006

Woman also says he thought friends would bail him out

TOLEDO — Coin dealer Thomas W. Noe once described the $50 million state investment he managed "as having access to an ATM," Noe's former administrative assistant said yesterday in testimony against her former boss.

"What he went on to say was, when he needed it, he would tap the coin funds," Sue Bahn told the jury during the second day of testimony in the trial of Noe and his handling of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation coin investment.

Bahn, who worked for Noe for about two years at his Maumee coin shop and was trusted to pay his bills and balance his personal checkbook, said Noe made the comments in June 2005 after she questioned him about the controversy swirling around the investment at the time.

Prosecutors say Noe stole millions from the coin funds to pay debts and "to support the lifestyle that he felt he deserved."

Noe denies all charges, including theft, saying his contract gave him broad authority over the state funds.

In response to a question from Noe attorney John R. Mitchell on cross-examination, Bahn, whose last name was Metzger until she changed it in February, admitted there was no one else present during her talk with Noe and that he never directly referred to the coin funds.

But Bahn also said she asked Noe "if he took the money ... and if (Noe's wife) Bernadette knew."

When Mitchell questioned Bahn about why she did not disclose the information until after Noe had been indicted in February, she said, "I thought that he was going to tell the truth and make this right."

Bahn testified that Noe would make deposits into his personal account to cover expenses that sometimes reached hundreds of thousands of dollars in a month. She said there was an "escalation" of spending in 2004, including a $50,000 pool for Noe's home in the Florida Keys and other big-ticket purchases.

In response to a question from Mitchell, Bahn said she prepared Noe's application for a line of credit from the bank in January 2005 that put his net worth at $7.9 million. Mitchell had her repeat the figure three times for the jury.

But Bahn also testified that in a meeting with Noe after he made the comment about the ATM, Noe said he had "friends who were going to help him cover what was going on" to bail him out — and that Noe changed his mind about pursuing that option.

Bahn, who handled the presidential memorabilia and other noncoin collectibles at the Maumee shop, told the jury that the total value of such items bought with state money was $2.7 million at the end of April 2005.

Tom Wersell, director of special investigations for the workers' compensation bureau, testified that although agents expected to find about $13 million in coins at the Maumee shop in May 2005, they found only about $600,000 worth.

DOJ_NMG_0082613

Noe's lawyers have argued that there was no requirement for a certain amount of coin-fund assets to be kept in Maumee rather than any of the other locations where state coins were held.

Meanwhile, actual coins from the state investment — kept in their protective plastic holders — were brought into court yesterday for the jury to see during testimony from coin expert David Tripp.

Tripp worked as a coin appraiser and consultant for Sotheby's auction house in New York, which the state hired to help evaluate coins after the investment was shut down in 2005.

According to the court, witnesses in today's proceedings are expected to include two other former Noe employees, bookkeeper Jeannie Beck and Priscilla Livingston, as well as former State Highway Patrol Lt. Howard W. Hudson III, who signed the affidavit used to secure the search warrant for a raid of Noe's shop in May 2005.

Coin Dealer's Ex-Ass't Speaks At Trial (AP)

By John Seewer, The Associated Press

AP, October 18, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio -- A politically connected coin dealer accused of stealing millions of dollars the state had asked him to invest had treated the money like it was from his own ATM, his former personal assistant testified Tuesday.

Tom Noe, a one-time top GOP donor, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from the workers' compensation bureau's coin investment and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys.

His attorneys say the deal with the state allowed Noe to use the money however he wanted, including to pay off personal business debts.

Noe, 52, tapped into the state's cash whenever he needed, said Sue Metzger, whose duties included overseeing Noe's personal checking account from 2003-05.

Metzger said she met with her boss in the summer of 2005 after allegations of wrongdoing surfaced and asked Noe whether he took the money, she testified.

"He described it as having access to an ATM," she said.

The investment scandal has battered Republicans who control the state, raising Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office for the first time since 1990. Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland has a wide lead over Republican Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, in gubernatorial race polls.

Prosecutors say Noe was deep in debt when he got the money, and he quickly used it to pay off his creditors.

Within a week, Noe put $1.75 million into his own business and wrote himself a $135,000 check to support "a lifestyle he felt he deserved," said Lucas County Assistant Prosecutor John Weglian.

Metzger, who also goes by the last name of Bahn, handled payment of all of Noe's bills and began noticing that his spending increased greatly in 2004. He bought a house in the Florida Keys and spent $50,000 renovating the pool.

In some months, his expenses exceeded hundreds of thousands of dollars, she said. She said his paychecks weren't enough to cover the expenses and he would deposit money from other sources.

She initially didn't know where the extra money was coming from. Noe later told her he was tapping into the state's investment fund, she said.

Noe, once a go-to guy for the Republican Party, has pleaded not guilty to theft, money laundering, forgery and corrupt activity charges. He faces up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge.

Weglian said Noe kept two sets of financial records _ one for the workers' comp agency and one for his own business. When state officials wanted to check the status of the coins Noe told them he had bought, he created false documents and borrowed coins from other dealers to trick investigators, Weglian said.

The workers' comp agency initially invested $25 million with Noe in 1998, followed by another $25 million in 2001.

Noe spent only a fraction of the state's investment on coins, prosecutors said.

State agents expected to find $13 million in rare coins when they searched Noe's business last year, Tom Wersell, director of investigations for Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified Tuesday.

Instead, the agents counted up coins worth about $600,000, Wersell said.

DOJ_NMG_0082614

Investigations into the coin investments already have led to separate ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest last year to failing to report golf outings and other gifts.

Noe, in a separate case, pleaded guilty earlier this year to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced last month to two years and three months in federal prison. He won't begin that sentence until after the state charges are resolved.

The trial is expected to last at least six weeks, through Election Day on Nov. 7.

Noe Considered The State's Rare-coin Fund 'an ATM,' One Of His Former Assistants Says (TOLB)

By MIKE WILKINSON And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), October 18, 2006

Tom Noe considered the state's $50 million rare-coin fund he controlled "an ATM" that he could use into whenever he needed money, one of his former top assistants said this morning.

Sue Bahn, who was hired by Noe to catalog collectibles at his former coin shop in Monclova Township, said Noe made the statement in 2005 as she asked him about the coin funds and the tough questions that were being raised in news accounts and by state investigators.

"He described it as having access to an ATM," said Ms. Bahn, who changed her name from Metzger earlier this year. "He said when he needed it he would tap into the coin fund."

Ms. Bahn, who also managed Noe's personal checkbook, said she started having concerns about Noe's business when Noe began spending more money on homes and remodeling in 2004.

"I saw an escalation in the expenditures in the personal account," Ms. Bahn said.

The monthly income of Tom Noe — he netted more than $120,000 a year — and his wife Bernadette wasn't high enough to cover the bills, she said. To cover the expenses, Tom Noe would make deposits that Ms. Bahn never saw.

"Whatever was needed, he'd make a deposit to cover it," she said.

Ms. Bahn's comments were the most interesting comments yet in a trial that is expected to last from four to six weeks.

She talked about finding a Noe family checking account that had never been balanced until she took it over and ordered bank statements. She also noted that Tom Noe was writing checks to his personal account from his business, Vintage Coins and Collectibles.

"That's when I said he's going to get in trouble with the IRS. But he's the owner, it was his business," she said.

In one of two private meetings with Noe about the coin funds, Ms. Bahn said he indicated he had a plan to cover up the problems. But he allegedly told her that something she said caused him to change his mind.

"He decided not to use his friends to bail him out but decided to take the bull by the horns and face it," she said.

Ms. Bahn said she pointedly asked Noe if he had stolen the money and if his wife, Bernadette, knew. She did not say what the answer was.

She testified she also talked religion with Noe.

In one meeting as the questions mounted about the coin funds, Ms. Bahn said she told Noe that God had a plan and a purpose. "I said God is after his heart. He may lose everything but he'll get it back."

On cross examination, Ms. Bahn testified she didn't tell investigators about the ATM comment by Noe when she first interviewed with them in November, 2005. She said she finally told them about six months ago.

When asked by John Mitchell, one of Noe's defense attorneys, why she waited so long to share, she said, "I thought he was going to tell the truth and make it right."

Ms. Bahn also testified that she copied a net worth statement of Noe in January, 2005, that indicated he was worth nearly $8 million.

Noe has pleaded not guilty to all of the charges against him. He has been accused of embezzling more than $2 million from the coin funds.

DOJ_NMG_0082615

This morning, Tom Wersell, the director of investigations for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified that the bureau's chief legal officer asked him to show another executive how to delete e-mails in the weeks after the Tom Noe coin scandal erupted.

Mr. Wersell said he did not know why John Annarino made the request but that he showed former chief investment officer Jim McLean how to "double delete" e-mails.

Mr. Wersell, in his second day of testimony, acknowledged that the bureau has a information technology department.

The revelation came during cross examination of Mr. Wersell by Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Wersell had testified that many of the documents relating to the Noe coin funds were retrieved from Mr. McLean's office. He was fired last year by the bureau.

Nancy Smeltzer, a spokesman for the bureau, said this morning that the agency won't comment on the case.

"We don't have any comments on this case as it is going on right now," Ms. Smeltzer said. "We are like everyone else. We are waiting to see what happens."

Noe, 52, faces 44 felony counts related to charges that he took more than $2.2 million from the coin funds he managed for the bureau. If convicted, he faces decades in prison.

A little over a month ago, Noe was sentenced to 27 months in federal prison for illegally funneling more than $45,000 into the re-election campaign of President Bush in 2003. He will report to federal prison at the conclusion of the state trial.

Opening statements began yesterday morning, with testimony starting in the afternoon. The trial could last as long as six weeks.

FBI Director Wants ISPs To Track Users (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, October 18, 2006

Robert Mueller becomes latest Bush administration official to call for ISPs to store customers' data.

FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday called on Internet service providers to record their customers' online activities, a move that anticipates a fierce debate over privacy and law enforcement in Washington next year.

"Terrorists coordinate their plans cloaked in the anonymity of the Internet, as do violent sexual predators prowling chat rooms," Mueller said in a speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston.

"All too often, we find that before we can catch these offenders, Internet service providers have unwittingly deleted the very records that would help us identify these offenders and protect future victims," Mueller said. "We must find a balance between the legitimate need for privacy and law enforcement's clear need for access."

The speech to the law enforcement group, which approved a resolution on the topic earlier in the day, echoes other calls from Bush administration officials to force private firms to record information about customers. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for instance, told Congress last month that "this is a national problem that requires federal legislation."

Justice Department officials admit privately that data retention legislation is controversial enough that there wasn't time to ease it through the U.S. Congress before politicians left to campaign for re-election. Instead, the idea is expected to surface in early 2007, and one Democratic politician has already promised legislation.

Law enforcement groups claim that by the time they contact Internet service providers, customers' records may have been deleted in the routine course of business. Industry representatives, however, say that if police respond to tips promptly instead of dawdling, it would be difficult to imagine any investigation that would be imperiled.

It's not clear exactly what a data retention law would require. One proposal would go beyond Internet providers and require registrars, the companies that sell domain names, to maintain records too. And during private meetings with industry officials, FBI and Justice Department representatives have cited the desirability of also forcing search engines to keep logs--a proposal that could gain additional law enforcement support after AOL showed how useful such records could be in investigations.

A representative of the International Association of Chiefs of Police said he was not able to provide a copy of the resolution.

Preservation vs. retention

DOJ_NMG_0082616

At the moment, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool based on whether a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

FBI Chief Addresses Police Chiefs (BOS)

By April Simpson, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 18, 2006

FBI Director Robert Mueller told the nation's police chiefs today that law enforcement must strike a careful balance between fighting crime and protecting the homeland.

Mueller said while violent crime more directly affects most Americans, the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks made anti-terrorism activities the FBI's top priority.

"I wish I could assure you that there will be never be another terrorist attack in America, but I cannot. The world remains a perilous place," said Mueller, who received a standing ovation before and after his speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police 113th annual conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center.

Ex-F.D.A. Chief Pleads Guilty In Stock Case (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Lester M. Crawford, the former commissioner of food and drugs, pleaded guilty Tuesday to lying and conflict-of-interest charges in connection with stock he and his wife owned in companies regulated by the F.D.A.

Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, who accepted Dr. Crawford's plea to two misdemeanor charges, scheduled sentencing for Jan. 22 in Federal District Court.

Dr. Crawford, 68, could face up to a year in prison and a fine of up to $100,000 on each of the two counts, but his lawyer has said she expects him to be placed on probation.

Senior employees of the agency are barred from owning shares in companies it regulates. Dr. Crawford and his wife, Catherine, accordingly sold their holdings in nine companies around the time he became deputy commissioner early in 2002, the government said.

But they retained shares in three others: the food giants Sysco and Pepsico, and Kimberly-Clark, which makes consumer health products and other goods.

In addition, Mrs. Crawford held shares in another regulated company, Wal-Mart, but her husband did not list them in his 2002 financial disclosure.

In addition, Dr. Crawford, who is a veterinarian and pharmacologist, exercised options to buy shares in a poultry biotechnology company regulated by the Food and Drug Administration in 2003 and 2004, earning almost $30,000 altogether. He did not list them in disclosure filings, as he should have, even though he properly reported the transactions on his tax returns, the government said.

The conflict-of-interest charges stemmed from the Crawfords' ownership of shares in Pepsico and Sysco while he was chairman of the Obesity Working Group at the F.D.A., which was reviewing calorie-content labeling for soft drinks.

There is no evidence that the obesity group's conclusions were altered because of the Crawfords' ownership of stock, Howard Sklamberg, an assistant United States attorney, told Judge Robinson.

DOJ_NMG_0082617

Mrs. Crawford's brother, William W. Walker III of Birmingham, Ala., said his sister had told him "if they had to do it over again, they'd put everything in a blind trust."

UPDATE: Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (DOW)

Dow Jones, October 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (Dow Jones) -- Lester Crawford, the former head of the FDA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to two misdemeanor federal criminal charges he failed to disclose his financial interest in companies his agency regulated, according to media reports.

Crawford, who served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005, was charged by the Justice Department with filing misleading financial-disclosure reports about his holdings in Sysco Corp. (SYY) , Kimberly-Clark Corp. (KMB) and Embrex Inc. (EMBX) .

Crawford was confirmed as FDA chief in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B.

Crawford also owned stock in Pepsico (PEP) , the soft-drink and food product maker.

Crawford was at one time head of an Obesity Working Group that was studying recommendations about food labels and calorie counts.

Court papers say both Pepsico and Sysco had financial interests at stake in the work being conducted by the group, which Crawford headed, according to a CNN report.

Crawford, 58, may face a sentence of up to six months in jail or house arrest and a fine of up to $50,000, his attorney told the media on Tuesday.

Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder

Market Watch, October 18, 2006

Admits failing to disclose his financial interest in FDA-regulated companies

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration, pled guilty Tuesday to two misdemeanor charges that he failed to disclose stock ownership in regulated companies and had a conflict of interest, according to federal prosecutors.

Crawford is scheduled to be sentenced on Jan. 22 and faces up to a year in prison on each charge. He pled guilty Tuesday afternoon before U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson of Washington, D.C. as part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors.

The charges against Crawford alleged he or his wife owned shares in Sysco Corp., which were regulated by the FDA, according to a Tuesday statement from the Department of Justice.

"One of the most important principles of our ethics laws is that public officials cannot have a financial interest in any decision that they make," U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor stated. "Lester Crawford, who held one of the most important jobs in government, blatantly violated these principles. Today, he is being held accountable for his actions."

Crawford, 68, of Chevy Chase, Md., served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005. He was confirmed as commissioner in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B.

Crawford, who also had owned stock in PepsiCo, was at one time head of an Obesity Working Group that was studying recommendations for FDA regulations about food labels and calorie counts. Crawford's ownership of Sysco and PepsiCo shares, and his role with the Obesity group, gave rise to the conflict of interest charge. Robert Schroeder is a reporter for MarketWatch in Washington.

Ex-FDA Chief Strikes Plea Agreement In Stock Disclosure Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0082618

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-As head of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, Lester Crawford oversaw a federal agency that regulates products that account for an estimated 25 cents of every dollar spent each year by U.S. consumers.

At the same time, Crawford, through his broker, oversaw an investment portfolio that included tens of thousands of dollars in shares in food, beverage and medical device companies regulated by the very federal agency he ran.

Crawford knew what he and his wife owned, but still failed to fully disclose that information as required by federal law, the Justice Department said in court papers charging him with filing false financial disclosure forms and conflict of interest. In some cases, Crawford even assured federal ethics officers that he and his wife had sold stock in FDA-regulated companies that the couple in fact continued to hold, according to the papers.

Because of that, the former FDA commissioner was set to plead guilty Tuesday to the two misdemeanor counts, said his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder. She said Crawford would not dispute the federal government's claims under the plea agreement.

A fine is likely, though the two counts each carry a maximum penalty of one year in prison.

"At the end of the day, he owned these stocks, and he will admit he owned them while he was at the FDA, and he will take responsibility for that," Van Gelder said.

Crawford and his wife owned stock in Pepsico Inc., Sysco Corp., Kimberly-Clark Corp., Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other companies that fall under the regulatory control of the agency, the Justice Department said in accusing the former FDA commissioner of making a false writing. Crawford's ownership of those shares was prohibited under federal regulations, since the companies are considered to be "significantly regulated" by the FDA.

The Justice Department also accused Crawford of conflict of interest, charging that as chairman of an FDA panel studying the problem of obesity, he and his wife owned at least US$140,000 in stock in Pepsico, the mammoth snacks and drinks company, and Sysco, a major food distribution company.

Both companies had a stake in the outcome of the panel's recommendations, which included a proposal that would require companies to more prominently display calorie information on food and drink labels.

The papers also say Crawford failed to disclose his income from exercising stock options in Embrex Inc. of Research Triangle Park, North Carolina, an agriculture biotechnology company. The failure to disclose came even as Crawford properly reported his earnings from stock sales on his tax returns. Crawford had been a member of Embrex's board of directors, according to federal filings.

Crawford, a veterinarian and food-safety expert, abruptly resigned from the FDA job in September 2005, but gave no reason for his decision to step down. He had held the top position for just two months, following his confirmation by the Senate, but had been acting head of the agency for more than a year.

Crawford refused to take a reporter's telephone call at Policy Directions Inc., the lobbying firm where he now works. FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza declined to comment.

On the Net:

Food and Drug Administration: http://www.fda.gov

Trial That Could Out Feds Alleged To Have Bogus Degrees Delayed (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, October 18, 2006

Names of 135 federal employees who allegedly bought fake diplomas from an outfit in the western United States will not be revealed for at least one year, if ever, according to a U.S attorney's office.

Last week in Spokane, Wash., during a pretrial hearing for eight people accused of selling counterfeit degrees from nonexistent universities, a defense attorney told the judge that employees from the National Security Agency and the Health and Human Services, Justice and State departments were among 6,000 people who bought the diplomas, according to the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0082619

The AP also reported that Peter Schweda, attorney for alleged diploma mill operator Steven Randock, said the names of 135 government employees who supposedly purchased the degrees for promotions or pay raises would be released during the course of the trial.

The trial will not start for another year, though. Judge Lonny Suko of the District Court of the Eastern District of Washington delayed it until Oct. 1, 2007, to give attorneys more time to prepare. Suko said more than 150,000 pages of e-mails, 40 CDs of documents and up to 50 witnesses will be used.

Tom Rice, a spokesman for the U.S attorney's office in Spokane, Wash., which is prosecuting the case, said Schweda's assertions that government purchasers would be revealed "were not necessarily accurate."

Rice also said he cannot confirm or deny that there is a separate Justice Department investigation into federal purchasers of the fake degrees. The case was built around a sting operation by a handful of Secret Service agents.

"It has been said that [names] may become available in that trial, but sitting here discussing it with you, I don't see how it's relevant to the Randock trial who purchased them," Rice said. "That'd be like saying everybody who used cocaine would be introduced in the trial of Manuel Noriega."

The 40-page indictment for defendants Steven Randock, Dixie Randock, Richard Novak, Blake Carlson, Amy Hensley, Heidi Lorhan, Roberta Markishtum and Kenneth Pearson accuses them of conspiracy to commit mail fraud, among other offenses. Pearson pleaded guilty last week.

The defendants allegedly set up a number of bogus universities, including "Saint Regis University," "James Monroe University" and "Trinity Christian School." They then sold diplomas and fake transcripts without requiring any coursework or testing.

One of the fake universities, "Robertstown University," used a photograph of Blenheim Castle, the birthplace of Winston Churchill and home of the Duke of Marlborough, to depict its campus on a Web site, according to the indictment.

In 2004, the Office of Personnel Management held seminars to train federal managers on spotting fake degrees. OPM and congressional overseers stepped up efforts to thwart diploma mills after Laura Callahan, a senior director in the Homeland Security Department chief information officer's office, was found to have purchased her degrees from an alleged diploma mill in Wyoming.

OPM did not respond to requests for comment on any current investigation into federal employees involved in the Randock case.

Man Pleads Guilty In 3 Idaho Slayings (FINDLAW/AP)

By Nicholas K. Geranios, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho-The man accused of kidnapping two children from their Idaho home and killing their family pleaded guilty Monday to murder and kidnapping in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty.

Joseph E. Duncan III, 43, was charged with bludgeoning two adults and a teenager to death at the home near Coeur d'Alene so he could kidnap the family's two youngest children for sex.

Duncan pleaded guilty shortly before his trial was to begin Monday. Under his plea agreement, he is to be sentenced to three consecutive life terms without parole in an Idaho prison. But authorities said that sentencing would be postponed pending federal prosecution that could result in the death penalty.

Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas said the sole survivor, young Shasta Groene, had agreed to testify against the man accused of holding her captive in the woods for seven weeks.

"This agreement is possible because of a brave little 9-year-old girl who was willing to confront Duncan face-to-face in the courtroom," Douglas said.

Federal prosecutors have said they intend to charge Duncan with kidnapping Shasta Groene and her brother Dylan and taking them to a primitive campsite in Montana and that they expect to seek the death penalty. Court documents allege he repeatedly molested the pair, then killed Dylan, whose body was found later at the campsite.

Shasta Groene was rescued after she walked into an Idaho restaurant with Duncan seven weeks after the slayings.

DOJ_NMG_0082620

If the federal trial does not produce a death sentence, Duncan could be brought back for a death penalty hearing in state court, Douglas said.

Steve Groene, the children's father, is unable to speak because of recent throat cancer surgery. After the hearing, he wrote a message on a board that said: "We feel this is the best possible outcome."

The agreement calls for Duncan to cooperate with state and federal authorities. Duncan must also provide the key to unlocking coded files in his computer that could hold additional evidence.

Duncan, a registered sex offender who has spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons, was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota at the time of the slayings. He declined to make a statement Monday before the judge.

Duncan was charged with three counts of first-degree murder in the attacks on Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; Groene's fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade, in May 2005.

Ex-Stafford Man Admits Role In $10M. Stock Scam (ACP)

By J. STAAS HAUGHT, Staff Writer

Atlantic City (NJ) Press, October 18, 2006

CAMDEN -- A former Ocean County man pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to involvement in a stock fraud case that cost investors millions of dollars and involved partners from Canada, New York, Florida and New Jersey, including a man from Upper Township.

Joseph F. Morgan, formerly of Stafford Township and now of St. Pete Beach, Fla., admitted to U.S. District Court Judge Jerome B. Simandle that he helped swindle investors of about $10 million in a scheme that netted more than $20 million throug h stock price manipulations.

As part of the scheme, involving several co-defendants and other unindicted partners, Morgan and others used a system of illegal stock compensations, fraudulent companies and shady brokerage deals to take control of nearly 100 million shares of TeleServices Internet Group Inc. and then sold those stocks to unsuspecting investors.

The scam, which ran from December 1996 through October 2005, involved at least 16 publicly traded companies, all trading on the Over the Counter Electronic Bulletin Board System. The shares â€" called penny stocks â€"â€‰ generally traded for less than $1, often as little as 5 cents.

An official with the U.S. Department of Justice said the scam operated like a pump-and-dump or boiler-room scheme, in which brokers drum up investors by suggesting the stock is ready for a major price lift. In this case, Morgan and others used their connections to move the stock around, giving investors the appearance of true market activity.

Many investors bought stocks only to see the price collapse a short time later.

Morgan and four co-defendants were initially charged in October 2005.

On Monday, the Justice Department said an Upper Township man also was involved in the scheme.

Rhett Howard Kirchoff, who owned DiMedio Kirchoff & Co. from 1995 to 1998, pleaded guilty in March to his involvement in the scam and is awaiting sentencing.

Morgan is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 2. He faces a maximum of five years for each of the two conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges and a maximum of 20 years for the two conspiracy to commit money laundering charges to which he pleaded guilty. Morgan has also agreed to forfeit $3.5 million in property and assets.

Other New Jersey defendants include:

nâ€‰ Thomas S. King, of Cherry Hill. King was the broker on an account owned by Robert Gordon, the CEO, CFO, chairman and director of TeleServices. The account was maintained at Kirchoff's company.

nâ€‰ Robert Pozner, of Ridgewood Park. Pozner was a licensed securities seller with two New Jersey brokerage firms.

Gordon, Pozner and King have pleaded not guilty and await trial.

Crime In Florida Continues To Drop, Except Murder (AP)

By David Royse, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082621

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- Crime continued to drop in Florida during the first half of this year, but the rate of violent crimes, particularly murders, went up, according to state figures released Tuesday.

Crimes tracked by federal officials dropped from 412,743 in the first six months of 2005 to 411,608 in the first half of 2006, statistics compiled by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement showed.

That represented a decrease of 0.3 percent, continuing a downward trend that has put the state's crime rate at its lowest in more than three decades.

But there was a striking anomaly in this year's figures: an increase in the number of murders. Local police agencies reported 518 killings in Florida through the end of June, up 27 percent from the 408 murders the state saw in the first six months of 2005.

Violent crime in general is bucking the overall trend in Florida, increasing 3.2 percent in the first half of 2006 over the same period last year.

The increase mirrors a mysterious uptick in violent crimes and murders in cities nationwide.

Officials don't have a clear explanation for what may be making the murder rate jump, following small but steady declines through recent years that were attributed in part to tougher sentencing laws.

In Orlando, officials have noted that the city has already seen 41 homicides this year, surpassing its old record of 36 for an entire year, set back in 1982.

Jacksonville had seen 92 murders through the end of last week, passing the 91 the city had in all of 2005. While the city has seen a slowing of murders in recent months, it is on pace to have its highest number of homicides in more than a decade.

Local officials have noted that many murders are drug related, but it's not clear whether some increase in drug use or trade is causing the spike. In fact, officials aren't sure what's going on.

"It's happening across the country too, for some reason," Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday. "I don't know if there's any particular reason that can be identified."

Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001.

In a speech to police chiefs on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal officials are looking for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. Gonzales also acknowledged that some law enforcement agencies have been stretched a little by new duties in anti-terrorism efforts.

U.S. Judge Again Rules Lethal Injection Procedure For Executions Is Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - KANSAS CITY, Missouri-A federal judge has ruled for a second time that Missouri's use of a three-drug lethal injection for executions is unconstitutional, confirming his ruling last month that the procedure could cause "torturous" pain.

The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. follows his September ruling that said the death penalty protocol could subject inmates to an unreasonable risk of cruel and unusual punishment and halted all executions in the state.

Gaitan had first ordered in June that the Missouri Department of Corrections make sweeping changes to its execution protocol. At issue is how painful lethal injection can be if the three drugs used are not given correctly. If the injection is given improperly, an inmate could be in pain but would be paralyzed and unable to show it, Gaitan said in his September ruling.

In that order, Gaitan gave the state until Oct. 27 to provide a revised protocol. But the state resubmitted the same proposal Oct. 6, arguing that it was constitutional and asking the judge to reconsider his decision.

The state's attorneys had asked Gaitan to rule quickly, so they could file an appeal if he ruled against them.

"The state's response does nothing to address these concerns and indicates its lack of willingness to even attempt to comply with the court's order," Gaitan wrote Monday.

Gaitan's ruling comes in the case of Michael A. Taylor, one of two men convicted of raping and killing Kansas City teenager Ann Harrison in 1989. Taylor came within hours of death earlier this year before his execution was stopped by the legal challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0082622

Gaitan ordered the state to improve the monitoring of inmates to be sure they get enough anesthesia during the execution process. He also ordered that a doctor trained in administering anesthesia either mix the chemicals or oversee the mixing of chemicals for executions.

U.S. Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Case (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

General Reinsurance, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., is in the clear and won't be charged by federal prosecutors in their continuing criminal investigation into the collapse of a professional-liability insurer in Virginia, according to a statement by Berkshire.

Berkshire, the Omaha, Neb., holding company headed by billionaire Warren Buffett, said General Re received a letter yesterday from the office of the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia in Richmond stating that the federal prosecutor "does not currently view General Reinsurance as a target or subject in connection with the EDVA U.S. attorney's pending investigation of Reciprocal of America."

Stanley Twardy, an attorney at Day, Berry & Howard LLP representing General Re, said, "The U.S. attorney's office has advised us that General Reinsurance will not be charged in any way in connection with the ROA matter. The government has declined prosecution."

Four of General Re's current and former employees are also not targets of the U.S. attorney's Reciprocal probe, even though they had earlier received subpoenas, and one of the former employees was previously identified as a target, according to Berkshire's statement about the letter.

Berkshire has never disclosed the names of the current or former employees who received subpoenas. The company said it would continue to cooperate with the investigation.

Marc Hamburg, Berkshire's chief financial officer, didn't return a call seeking comment. Assistant U.S. Attorney David Maguire, the lead prosecutor in the Reciprocal case, also didn't return a call seeking comment.

In rare cases, U.S. attorneys issue statements or letters -- sometimes by request of parties involved in continuing cases -- to help clear up public uncertainty over whether they are targets of investigators. It is unclear whether Berkshire requested the letter.

Reciprocal, which sold professional-liability insurance, was a customer of General Re. Previously, criminal investigators were probing whether General Re for more than a decade helped executives of Reciprocal disguise loans as reinsurance, according to people familiar with the case.

Specifically, investigators had wanted to know if General Re aided an alleged program to deceive state regulators and policyholders of the Richmond-based insurer with transactions dating to the early 1990s. In June 2005, a federal judge in Virginia gave a 12½-year jail sentence to a former president of Reciprocal.

Man Is Convicted Of Two Counts Of Murder In L.I. Drunken Driving Case (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

MINEOLA, N.Y., Oct. 17 — A man who crashed into a wedding limousine last year, killing the driver and a 7-year-old girl while driving drunk in the wrong direction on a Long Island parkway, was convicted on Tuesday of two counts of murder.

The verdict against Martin R. Heidgen, 25, of Valley Stream, which came on the fifth day of deliberation after jurors twice said they were deadlocked, is one of only a few murder convictions won in fatal drunken driving cases anywhere.

And it was the first in Nassau County, where the high incidence of drunken driving has become a public policy issue that figured heavily in the 2005 election campaign for the office of district attorney.

“We would hope that this verdict sends a message that if you drink and drive and kill someone, you will be prosecuted for murder,” said the district attorney, Kathleen M. Rice, who won that election, at least in part by criticizing her predecessor, Denis Dillon, for purportedly timid use of murder charges in fatal drunken driving cases.

DOJ_NMG_0082623

The family of Katie Flynn, the 7-year-old girl who was killed, had forcefully encouraged the district attorney's decision to bring a murder charge, and attended every day of the five week trial with a group of rarely less than 50 supporters, both family and friends.

"Murder was the only acceptable verdict," said Katie's father, Neil Flynn, of Long Beach, after the jury's decision, which was rendered while several jurors wept and others held their heads in their hands. "This man murdered my daughter, and we're glad he's moving on to prison, where I hope it's as bad as I've heard it is."

Katie Flynn and her family were returning from a wedding at 2 a.m. on July 2, 2005, when Mr. Heidgen's pickup truck, traveling north in the southbound lanes of the Meadowbrook Parkway, plowed into their hired limousine. The limousine chauffeur driver, Stanley Rabinowitz, 59, of Farmingdale, was also killed. Katie's parents, a sister and her grandparents were injured.

From a hospital where she was recovering from her injuries, Katie's mother, Jennifer Flynn, told reporters several days after the crash that she had held her daughter's decapitated head in her lap at the scene and had to be physically separated from it by emergency workers.

Mr. Heidgen's lawyer, Stephen LaMagna of Garden City, said Mr. Heidgen's family was "devastated and disappointed" by the verdict. The defendant's parents and several relatives also attended each day of the trial. Mr. LaMagna said that Mr. Heidgen "has always expressed remorse for what happened," and promised to appeal the verdict, adding, "when the appeals court reviews the record, I hope they will see it for what it is." He would not elaborate.

The murder charge brought against Mr. Heidgen, murder in the second degree by depraved indifference, carries the same penalties as intentional murder — a minimum of 15 years and a maximum of 25 years to life — and has been the subject of several appellate court decisions in the last two years. Though the case law is still evolving, the drift of the appellate rulings has been toward increasing the burden of proof for a sustainable conviction.

Whereas "depraved indifference" was previously considered a self-evident set of circumstances, it is now understood as a state of mind that must be established with evidence. In his instructions to the jury in this case, Acting Justice Alan R. Honorof of State Supreme Court described that state of mind as one in which a person "engages in conduct which creates a grave and unjustifiable risk that another person's death will occur, and when he or she is aware of and consciously disregards that risk."

He said the depraved indifference state of mind "reflects a wicked, evil or inhuman state of mind."

Jurors who were interviewed said they saw depraved indifference in Mr. Heidgen's behavior not only because he was very drunk — three times the legal limit — and not only because he was driving the wrong way, but because he passed six cars over a distance of almost three miles before he crashed into the Flynns' limousine.

"We didn't think he was trying to avoid the accident," said the juror Michael Derita, 39, a graphics designer from Levittown. "He didn't try to get out of the way."

A majority of the jurors favored a verdict of murder from the beginning. Four held out for a lesser charge of manslaughter, Mr. Derita said. At one point during the five days of deliberations, with only two jurors favoring the lesser charge, one of them withdrew from the discussion altogether and "went to sleep for a couple of hours."

The jury filed into a hushed courtroom in the ninth hour of their fifth day of deliberations, at 5:10 p.m. Tuesday.

After the jury forewoman uttered the word "guilty" to the first of the two murder charges, the 50 or 60 friends and relatives of the Flynns, and several of Mr. Rabinowitz's relatives, exploded with a keening cheer that they then almost immediately choked back, falling silent again to hear the verdicts on the remaining charges.

The accumulated anxiety and emotion of the five-week trial and weeklong deliberations seemed to sweep through the room as relatives and friends of the crash victims fell into each others' arms, gasping and weeping.

Mr. Heidgen, an insurance salesman in Manhattan, was also found guilty of drunken driving and aggravated assault in connection with the other family members' injuries.

He was scheduled to be sentenced next month.

Williams Seeks $11 Million To Extend Anti-crime Package (WT)

By Matthew Cella And Amy Doolittle, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082624

Mayor Anthony A. Williams yesterday asked the D.C. Council for $11 million to continue and expand a package of emergency crime measures passed in July.

The legislation includes a request for $5 million for youth-violence prevention programs, $4.2 million for additional police overtime and $1.7 million for the city's burgeoning network of neighborhood surveillance cameras.

It also would renew four key provisions of the mayor's emergency package, which is set to expire at midnight tomorrow.

Those provisions authorized the use of neighborhood surveillance cameras, allowed some offenders to be held until trial, gave police access to juvenile criminal records and granted the mayor power to set the time of the juvenile curfew.

Today, the council is scheduled to vote on whether to renew the package for 90 days on an emergency basis. But, the council's general counsel first must determine whether the legislation violates a statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis.

Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, the counsel, told The Washington Times last month that the bill would require a "very substantial modification" to be permitted under the statute, which is designed to prevent city officials from circumventing the congressional review period to which D.C. laws are subject.

Mrs. Brookins-Hudson could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Adrian M. Fenty, the Democratic nominee for mayor, cast the lone vote against the crime package in July. Reached last night, Mr. Fenty said he was "being briefed" on the mayor's proposal.

Permanent anti-crime legislation that addresses the provisions of the emergency measure is before the council, but it cannot be enacted before December, at the earliest.

Mr. Williams yesterday also announced an end to the 10 p.m. juvenile curfew. Beginning Friday, curfew hours for those 16 or younger will return to 11 p.m. on weekdays and midnight on weekends.

"It has been useful," Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. "It was a temporary measure. It just gave the mayor the authority to change the hours. It was never meant to be a permanent solution."

Chief Ramsey said the overtime money would be used to pay for expenditures the police department has incurred in recent weeks since officials spent the $8 million that the council appropriated for overtime in the emergency measure in July.

He said he expected to continue through the end of the month the crime emergency, which suspends the provisions of the police union contract that mandates a two-week notice before changing officers' assignments.

He said some of the overtime money would be used to fund overtime assignments after the emergency ends, but those would be on a limited volunteer basis.

The chief could not say how many more cameras he expected the department to purchase. He said that more than $1 million of the $2.3 million that the council authorized in July was spent on infrastructure but that those costs should be far less this time.

"The majority of it will go to cameras," he said. "I would think we would be able to get another 35-40."

Janis Bolt, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Office of Contracting and Procurement, said each camera costs $21,975.

CIVIL LAW:

Agency FOIA Administration Found To Be Improving (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, October 18, 2006

Agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Act are for the most part complying with an executive order outlining a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law, according to a new Justice Department report.

All 91 federal agencies subject to FOIA have prepared plans for improving the process of releasing federal documents to the public, refined the plans where necessary and posted them on their Web sites for public review, the report stated. Most agencies also fulfilled the order's first requirement successfully by appointing chief FOIA officers by Jan. 13, 2006.

In fiscal 2005, agencies handled more than 2.6 million FOIA requests at a cost of $300 million. This represents a 35 percent increase in activity over fiscal 2001, the report stated.

DOJ_NMG_0082625

The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec.14, 2005, directed agencies to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations.

A number of improvement plans failed to properly address how the agencies would address backlogs of requests for information, the report stated. A few agencies have modified plans to comply with the order, including the Education Department, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, NASA, the National Archives and Records Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But a number of other agencies have yet to complete the modifications. These were the Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Homeland Security, Labor and Veterans Affairs departments; the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Trade Commission, the General Services Administration, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the National Science Foundation, the National Transportation Safety Board and the Social Security Administration.

The report recommended a follow-up to a March 8 meeting of chief FOIA officers, a requirement that agencies review standard forms and correspondence formats used for FOIA purposes and increased use of technology for FOIA administration. Justice reviewers highlighted efforts at the Defense and Interior departments to use technology to streamline the process for releasing documents.

A recent governmentwide technology initiative is aimed at automating FOIA processes as a means of reducing backlogs. Several large decentralized agencies, such as the Housing and Urban Development and Veterans Affairs departments, reported they were seeking automated systems for tracking FOIA requests.

GSA reported that its "field office" structure contributes to an inability to accurately track the types of responses throughout the agency.

The report stated that the Justice Department has focused on reducing backlogs by establishing a goal of closing the 10 oldest pending FOIA requests for records from its leadership offices on a regular basis. Other agencies, such as the Small Business Administration, do not have such backlogs, the report said.

Justice also urged agencies to follow GSA's lead by sending postcards to acknowledge the receipt of a FOIA request, rather than the standard written letters. This is a means of saving time and money for more substantial FOIA activities, the report said.

In the next step, agencies will be required to report on the implementation of the improvement plan's first stage by Feb. 1, 2007. Fiscal 2006 FOIA reports are due to President Bush by June 1, 2007. The fiscal 2007 report will be due in February 2008.

House Government Reform Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee Chairman Todd Platts, R-Pa., said in a statement the report provides a fair accounting of agencies' actions to improve the public's access to information.

But to further improve FOIA, Platts urged action on legislation he introduced to close loopholes in the law. The bill (H.R. 867), which would amend the FOIA, has passed out of Platts' subcommittee.

A companion bill in the Senate (S. 394) passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee in September.

No Death Benefits For Studds's Spouse (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

BOSTON, Oct. 17 -- The federal government has refused to pay death benefits to the spouse of former congressman Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.), the first openly gay member of Congress.

Studds married Dean Hara in 2004 after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts. But Hara will not be eligible to receive any portion of Studds's estimated $114,337 annual pension because the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act bars the federal government from recognizing Studds's marriage.

Peter Graves, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the congressional pension program, said same-sex partners are not recognized as spouses for any marriage benefits. He said Studds's case is the first of its kind known to the agency.

Under federal law, pensions can be denied only to lawmakers' same-sex partners and to people convicted of espionage or treason, Graves said.

DOJ_NMG_0082626

The homosexuality of Studds was exposed during a teenage-page sex scandal in 1983. He died Saturday at 69, several days after collapsing while walking his dog. Doctors said he had developed two blood clots.

Graves said Studds could have purchased an insurable interest annuity, similar to an insurance policy, which is allowed under both the civil service and the federal-employee retirement system and is not affected by the Defense of Marriage Act. Graves said he did not know whether Studds used that option.

Peter J. Sepp, spokesman for the nonprofit watchdog group National Taxpayers Union, estimated Studds's annual pension at $114,337. That would have made Hara, 48, eligible for a lifetime annual pension of about $62,000, which would grow with inflation, if the marriage were recognized by the federal government, Sepp said.

Hara declined to comment.

Gary Buseck, legal director for the group Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, said Studds's case may offer "a moment of education for Congress."

"Now they have a death in the congressional family of one of their distinguished members whose spouse is being treated differently than any of their spouses," Buseck said.

In 2004, Massachusetts became the first state to legalize same-sex marriage after gay couples successfully sued for the right to marry.

Studds was elected to Congress in 1972. In 1983, a 27-year-old man disclosed that he and Studds had had a sexual relationship a decade earlier when he was a congressional page. The House censured Studds, who revealed on the House floor that he was gay.

Constituents reelected Studds until he retired in 1997 to become a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Letter Investigated For Warning To Immigrants (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 17 — Federal and state authorities are trying to determine who sent a letter to some Latinos in Southern California that falsely suggested that it would be a crime for immigrants to vote in the coming election.

The letter, written in formal, sometimes clumsy Spanish and signed “Sergio Ramirez,” was mailed last week to an undetermined number of people with Spanish surnames in Orange County, the authorities said. It advised recipients that “if you’re an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration,” or deportation.

While illegal immigrants are barred from voting, legal immigrants who have become citizens are permitted to do so.

The letter also stated that the federal government had installed a computer system to verify the names of new registered voters who vote in October and November and that anti-immigration groups would be able to access that information. Election Day is Nov. 7, but early voting is allowed Oct. 20-29 in Orange County.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, which along with the California attorney general’s office is investigating the letter’s source, said there was no such database.

“The letter contains false information,” Ms. Magnuson said.

The letter was printed on stationery labeled with the name of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform, a strident anti-illegal-immigration group whose Web site features a video on how illegal immigrants bring disease to the United States.

But Barbara Coe, the group’s leader, told The Los Angeles Times, which first reported the letter on Tuesday, that her group had not sent or authorized it, and that she did not know a Sergio Ramirez. On Tuesday, Ms. Coe did not return repeated phone calls and e-mail seeking comment.

Some Latino leaders expressed doubts on Tuesday about Ms. Coe’s denial and said they suspected the letter was part of a concerted, long-term effort on the part of groups like hers to intimidate voters.

DOJ_NMG_0082627

"They're taking as much action as they can to make the lives of Latinos as miserable as possible," said Brent Wilkes, the national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, a civil rights group.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called the letter racist and urged Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general, to prosecute those responsible with a hate crime. A collection of other civil rights groups also called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate the letter as a violation of federal voting laws.

Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Mr. Lockyer, said his office had been alerted to the letter on Monday morning, after a weekend in which Latino leaders fielded calls from outraged constituents.

"They could be naturalized citizens or they could be fourth-generation Californians," Mr. Barankin said of the recipients. "What we do know is that some of the recipients of this letter are legal and longtime registered voters in California."

Mr. Barankin said the letter could have violated two California laws. One bans the use of coercion or intimidation in an effort to prevent someone from voting; the other makes it illegal to knowingly challenge a person's right to vote on fraudulent and spurious grounds.

It was unclear, Mr. Barankin said, how many of the letters were distributed, but his office expected more complaints.

"We're going to determine who sent it, and why they sent it and then from that, if there's enough evidence to prosecute," Mr. Barankin said.

Orange County, between Los Angeles and San Diego, has seen a substantial increase in its Latino population over the last two decades. A 2005 estimate by the Census Bureau reported that nearly one in three Orange County residents was of Latino or Hispanic origin.

Representative Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat from Garden Grove, in northern Orange County, said that she had heard from a handful of constituents in her district who received a letter, and that she feared it could scare off first-time voters.

"Santa Ana and Anaheim are the new Ellis Island of the United States," Ms. Sanchez said, mentioning two Orange County cities with large Latino populations. "New people are becoming citizens every day, and who knows the sophistication level when they get a letter like this?"

But others thought the letter would have little effect.

"I think Latino voters are astute enough not to be intimidated," said John Trasviña, the interim president and general counsel for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund in Los Angeles. "And they've seen the same tactics used against them in the recent past as well as the farther ago past. And they won't take it."

Election Board Votes To Send New Letter To 305,000 Misinformed Voters (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

ATLANTA - The State Election Board on Tuesday approved a letter that will inform more than 300,000 Georgia voters who were told they needed a photo ID to vote that they can still use 17 forms of identification to cast a ballot on Nov. 7.

The board also approved radio and television public service announcements to be broadcast statewide. The Secretary of State's Office will be responsible for distributing the letter and ads, and will partially fund the efforts.

The mailing is expected to cost $127,000, and the ads will be taped and aired using $16,000 from the election board budget previously reserved for voter education.

Both measures were approved at a special meeting called by election board member David Worley after he discovered nearly 200,000 voters - not the 20,000 initially reported by Vice Chair Claud "Tex" McIver - were told they would need to get a photo ID at the polls.

In all, the board of elections contacted by mail 305,000 registered voters believed to lack state-issued photo identification. Most received letters after a Sept. 19 ruling by Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford declaring the photo ID law violated the Georgia Constitution as an undue burden on voters.

At the meeting, Worley - the lone Democrat on the panel - questioned McIver on how the discrepancy was made and where he got his information. McIver approved the mailing of the additional letters after Bedford's ruling.

Worley said that mailing was a "deliberate attempt to make people think they needed a photo ID they did, in fact, not need."

McIver said he reported the information he was given about how many letters remained to be sent after the judge's order.

DOJ_NMG_0082628

"I can assure you our staff did not get that information from the tooth fairy," McIver said, adding that he was also surprised to see that so many letters had gone out after the law was banned.

For months, lawyers have been battling over Georgia's photo ID law - one of several passed recently across the country - in state and federal court, and lawyers opposing Georgia's photo ID law are set to ask a judge on Friday to hold the state in contempt of Bedford's order.

Opponents claim the photo ID law is intended to discourage minorities, the poor and the elderly from casting ballots. In a motion filed Monday, the attorneys also asked the judge to force the state to send new letters to those voters.

The Chicago-based Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, led by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, sent a letter Tuesday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales criticizing Georgia's actions and demanding that corrective action be taken to inform voters of the current election rules.

"Georgia and other states still insist on interposing burdensome obstructions between the American people and their right to vote in violation of the 15th Amendment," reads the letter, signed by Jackson. "The State Board of Elections...wants to pretend that mailing the notices was harmless error. It was either intentional voter fraud or grossly negligent disregard of the right to vote."

After the meeting, Worley said he was not satisfied with McIver's explanation of why he would report that only 20,000 letters were left to be mailed after the judge's order, but that he is satisfied that the issue will be corrected with the new mailing by the Secretary of State's Office.

"Based on the way this was handled, I didn't trust the Republican majority to do it properly the second time," Worley said.

McIver maintained he did not regret his decision to mail the first letter - which he called an education piece - and that he does not believe voter confusion exists over the photo ID law.

Supporters of the law - primarily Republicans - have said it is needed to prevent voter fraud, despite the absence of examples of in-person voter fraud.

FBI Forwards Rylee Investigation To Justice Department (ADG)

By DEBRA HALE-SHELTON

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, October 18, 2006

The FBI has forwarded information from its investigation into Russellville police officers' fatal encounter with Bobby Joe Rylee last summer to the Civil Rights Division of the U. S. Department of Justice.

The Washington-based office will determine whether a federal civil-rights violation occurred in the forcible arrest of Rylee on July 15 in a parking lot along Arkansas 7 in Russellville, said Steven Frazier, a spokesman for the FBI office in Little Rock.

Rylee, 61, quit breathing several hours after police took him to the Pope County jail. He died five days later in a Little Rock hospital.

Russellville Police Chief James Bacon has said he understood the FBI was investigating at the request of Rylee's family. Frazier previously declined to comment on an ongoing investigation, which is FBI policy.

In August, Prosecuting Attorney David Gibbons of Clarksville declined to charge four Russellville police officers, saying they were justified in the force they used to subdue and arrest Rylee. Police said Rylee had fought with them and stabbed one officer in the arm with a ballpoint pen, which Gibbons concluded was a deadly weapon.

Rylee's family filed a federal lawsuit in Little Rock last month, contending that Russellville police officers beat Rylee before taking him to jail, where, the lawsuit said, he was refused medical attention despite life-threatening injuries. Police have said Rylee declined medical treatment.

"I believe we have forwarded the initial information that we have received about this case," Frazier said by telephone Monday.

"Some of that has come from the [Russellville] Police Department, the media and others."

Frazier said all FBI civilrights investigations ultimately are presented to the Justice Department.

He said he had no idea how long the process would take.

He also said he could not say when the FBI forwarded the information to Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0082629

Frazier said the Civil Rights Division can make one of three decisions: That there is a prosecutable violation. That there is "no prosecutive merit."

That more information and investigation are needed.

"In order for [the latter] to happen... there needs to be enough of an allegation to warrant additional investigation," Frazier said.

In a response filed last week with the U. S. District Court in Little Rock to the Rylee family's lawsuit, Pope County Sheriff Jay Winters and jail supervisor Luke Sawdy denied allegations of failing to provide medical care to Rylee when they should have known his injuries were serious.

Russellville police filed a separate response, denying allegations of beating or assaulting Rylee.

Both responses asked that the suit be dismissed.

Study Finds Race Disparity In Breast Cancer Mortality Rates (CHIT)

By Judy Peres, Ronald Kotulak And Peter Gorner

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

A study showing an alarming gap in breast cancer death rates for black and white women in Chicago has mobilized health experts to find the root causes and recommend within a year ways to reduce the unusually high mortality among African-Americans.

Why black women are more likely to die of breast cancer is unclear, but medical leaders said genetics, lack of awareness about breast self-examination, inability to afford routine mammograms and limited access to medical facilities may play crucial roles.

Some Chicago researchers are also beginning to look at whether the stress of social isolation and living in impoverished or crime-ridden neighborhoods might make some women more vulnerable to cancer.

Another possibility is that some facilities serving black women are doing a poor job of detecting cancers early.

"Women are dying—overwhelmingly poor and black women—because of inadequate quality of the mammography process. That's our hypothesis," said Steve Whitman, director of the Sinai Urban Health Institute, which conducted the study released Tuesday.

The study, which has not yet been published or undergone the scrutiny of peers, found that the odds that a woman will die of breast cancer has been declining steadily for close to two decades, yet African-American women have been seeing the reverse. (The report did not analyze data for women of other races.)

As recently as the 1980s, mortality rates for black and white women in Chicago were both around 38 breast cancer deaths per 100,000 women per year, according to the study. The rates started to diverge in the 1990s, as overall mortality rates began to drop thanks to improvements in treatment and early detection.

By 2003, the last year for which statistics are available, the rate for Chicago's black women was 73 percent higher: 40.5 breast cancer deaths per 100,000, compared with 23.4 for white women.

For the U.S. as a whole, the mortality rate for white women is 25.2, compared with 34.6 for black women—37 percent higher. The study reported the gap in New York City was only 17 percent (35.8 for blacks, 30.7 for whites), which suggests "it's not just an issue of big urban areas," Whitman said.

Researchers have been trying for years to discover why black women in America have a higher risk of dying of breast cancer, even though they're less likely to get the disease.

Some studies have found biological differences that may cause black women to get more aggressive types of breast cancer. Experts say black women are more likely than white women to have a combination of three genetic defects that makes their tumors harder to treat.

"We've known for years that African-American women have a more aggressive type of breast cancer compared to white women," said Dr. Virginia Kaklamani, an oncologist at the Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine. "One of the reasons for that is that the kind of breast cancer they get is genetically worse."

DOJ_NMG_0082630

At the University of Chicago, meanwhile, a large federally funded study is under way to look at social factors that might bring about biological changes that lead to breast cancer. The team includes specialists in the medical, biological, behavioral and social sciences.

"We think the black-white disparity is due to complex interactions of genetic and environmental factors. By joining together is the only way we're going to get a handle on them," said study leader Sarah Gehlert, director of the Center for Interdisciplinary Health Disparities Research.

"Between 70 and 80 percent of all breast cancers are due to sporadic mutations, not inherited mutations. That means it's things that happen in the environment," Gehlert said.

"We think that if you live in really adverse circumstances in a neighborhood with a lot of crime, so the threat's always there, you'll be afraid to go out and will develop what we call a dysregulated stress response," she said. "And you'll be more likely to have spontaneous mutations of the breast cancer genes."

Gehlert said her study is based on the work of U. of C. psychologist Martha McClintock, who showed that socially isolated female laboratory rats suffered an increase in spontaneous breast cancers.

"We're testing this hypothesis in Chicago and Gary on 233 newly diagnosed African-American breast cancer patients," Gehlert said. "We go into their homes and look at their neighborhoods. Then we examine their tumors after they've been biopsied to see if they're due to spontaneous mutations or are inherited."

Experts also noted that black women also are more likely to get inferior care, fail to seek appropriate testing and be unable to afford routine mammograms.

Sandra Stewart, 55, who lives on Chicago's South Side, said she hadn't had a mammogram in 10 years when she felt a hardness in her breast one morning last October—breast cancer awareness month.

"Most of us can't afford it," she said. "I didn't have any insurance."

Scared, she called a cancer hot line she'd seen on TV and was able to receive a free mammogram. "They found an advanced cancer," she said. "The very same day, they sent me up for a biopsy."

The Stand Against Cancer project arranged for Medicaid to cover her treatment, and today Stewart is in complete remission.

To address the idea that the mammography available to black women may be of poor quality, the Sinai report calls on area hospitals and breast centers to collect and share mammography quality measures as the first step toward improving services.

"In health care, what gets measured gets better," said Alan Channing, president of the Sinai Health System.

Mammograms, which are specialized X-rays, are difficult to read, and their effectiveness in spotting cancer early depends in part on how well they are interpreted. The American College of Radiology has established quality standards and recommends that all mammography programs keep track of their performance. But many programs do not, and most do not release the data if they have it.

To stimulate transparency and perhaps challenge other facilities to release their data, the Sinai report includes quality measures for Mt. Sinai Hospital (part of the Sinai Health System) and Mercy Hospital.

The task force organized to figure out how to reduce Chicago's racial gap in breast cancer death rates will call a summit meeting in January with leaders in radiology, mammography, medical financing and others concerned about breast cancer.

"We expect experts from all the leading medical centers to participate, as well as breast cancer survivors and epidemiologists, and map out a plan to eliminate these terrible disparities," Whitman said.

The task force will be co-chaired by Ruth Rothstein, former CEO of the Cook County Bureau of Health and now president of the board of Rosalind Franklin University of Medicine; Sister Sheila Lyne, CEO of Mercy Hospital and former commissioner of the Chicago Department of Public Health; and Donna Thompson, CEO of Access Community Health Network.

Calling the co-chairs "the three most powerful women in health care in Chicago," Whitman said, "I think the task force has a real chance at fixing this. I'm optimistic."

Chris Rock's Mom Claims Discrimination (AP)

By Bruce Smith, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0082631

AP, October 18, 2006

CHARLESTON, S.C. -- Rose Rock, the mother of comedian Chris Rock, claims she was racially discriminated against when she was seated but ignored for more than a half hour at a Cracker Barrel restaurant along the South Carolina coast.

Rock said Tuesday she planned to sue the Lebanon, Tenn.-based company. A Cracker Barrel spokeswoman said the restaurant chain was investigating and taking the complaint "very seriously."

Cracker Barrel has in the past faced numerous lawsuits and a federal inquiry over complaints of refusing to serve black customers, discriminating against minority workers and firing gay employees. The company has taken steps to rebuild its folksy image and reach out to minorities.

Rock, who is from Georgetown, said she and her 21-year-old daughter were the only blacks at the chain's Murrells Inlet restaurant in April. She said when she asked the manager about the delay she was told they could have a free meal.

"He never called over the waitresses and asked, `Why did these people sit here for an hour without service?'" she said. "The only thing he said was we could have a free meal and neither of us wanted to eat."

Cracker Barrel spokeswoman Julie Davis said the company doesn't "tolerate any form of discrimination."

"It has always been a violation of our policies and procedures and it is neither condoned nor allowed," she said. "We do not allow the type of behavior you are describing," Davis said.

Rock said she contacted the South Carolina Human Affairs Commission and was told her complaint would be handled, but "nothing ever happened."

The head of the commission, Jesse Washington, said Tuesday that after initial discussions, the complaint was finalized Aug. 7 and his agency also was investigating. He would not comment on the complaint.

"We get thousands of charges coming through here in the course of a year," he said. "It's not out of line _ the time frame on this. It is being investigated and we will be in touch with her when we have a report."

The Rev. Al Sharpton will join Rock on Wednesday in South Carolina to announce that Sharpton's Action Network will finance the planned lawsuit.

"I'm getting reports from all over the country about Cracker Barrel," Sharpton said from New York on Tuesday.

He also said state officials are slow to act on such complaints.

"When people are talking about there is no more discrimination, a lot of it is because they are not following this stuff up," Sharpton said.

Cracker Barrel, established in 1969, operates 547 restaurants in 41 states, according to the company's Web site.

Georgetown is about 60 miles northeast of Charleston.

ANTITRUST:

Feds OK Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Bid (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

PITTSBURG, Texas --Chicken producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. on Tuesday said federal regulators have cleared its proposed acquisition of Atlanta-based poultry company Gold Kist Inc., which opposes the bid.

Pilgrim's Pride launched its hostile $20-a-share takeover bid last month, after Gold Kist declined to make a deal in August, the company has said. The offer represents a premium of 55 percent over Gold Kist's closing stock price on Aug. 18.

Gold Kist has said the offer is not in the best interest of its shareholders.

On Tuesday, Pilgrim's Pride said the antitrust division of the Justice Department granted an early expiration to the waiting period mandated by antitrust laws.

Pilgrim's Pride President and Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby Jr. called the move "a positive step forward in our efforts to acquire Gold Kist."

The company's tender offer to acquire all outstanding shares of Gold Kist is scheduled to expire at midnight on Friday, Oct. 27.

DOJ_NMG_0082632

Shares of Pilgrim's Pride fell 18 cents to $27.13 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Gold Kist shares rose 24 cents to $20.63 on the Nasdaq.

Kucinich Questions Giant Eagle Purchase Of Ohio Stores (PPG)

By Teresa F. Lindeman, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 18, 2006

Ohio congressman Dennis J. Kucinich, concerned about losing jobs in his region, is asking federal officials to look at potential antitrust issues when considering O'Hara-based grocer Giant Eagle's plans to buy 18 stores in the Cleveland area.

Rep. Kucinich, the former Cleveland mayor, presidential candidate and a fifth-term Democrat who is up for re-election, this week sent a letter to the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission asking that they investigate the potential for the sale to impact the price of food in the Cleveland area.

Giant Eagle, already a major player in the northeast Ohio market, said last week it would buy 18 Tops Market stores for an undisclosed amount from Dutch owner Ahold. The parent company put 46 Tops stores up for sale earlier this year and hopes to have buyers for the remaining 28 stores by the end of the year.

The O'Hara company supplied about 45 percent of the Cleveland-Elyria-Mentor grocery market as of June, according to TradeDimensions International in Wilton, Conn. Tops claimed a little more than 20 percent while Wal-Mart had about 6 percent.

An antitrust review would try to determine if, after the sale, Giant Eagle could control the market to the point it could significantly raise prices, said Robert Fleishman, an antitrust lawyer with Washington, D.C., law firm Steptoe & Johnson. That might be hard to do in an era when supermarkets face increasing competition from retailers such as Target as well as dollar stores and convenience stores.

Even if the overall deal is not a problem, there might be particular Tops locations that officials would be concerned about. When the owner of Macy's bought Kaufmann's, the retailer agreed to sell certain overlapping locations to department store competitors, if possible.

However, Giant Eagle officials do not believe there's a problem. "Our attorneys researched the issue carefully and have advised that there are no antitrust problems with this acquisition," spokesman Dan Donovan said in an e-mailed response.

Rep. Kucinich has been concerned about the 4,000 part-time and full-time jobs at the Tops stores since the original announcement that the stores would be sold. His letter to federal officials cited a local newspaper report that a group of buyers had been interested keeping all 46 stores locally owned and operated.

A Tops spokesman said yesterday preserving jobs is a goal. He said the company would like to sell the remaining stores to supermarket operators but, "We will look at any and all offers."

(Teresa F. Lindeman can be reached at tlindeman@post-gazette.com or at 412-263-2018.)

Feds' Power To Renege On Immunity May Be Tested In U.S. Supreme Court (LAW)

By Lisa Brennan, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, October 18, 2006

A 3rd Circuit case at the door of the U.S. Supreme Court will test the federal government's power to revoke immunity from prosecution granted to antitrust violators who agree to rat on their rivals.

During an Oct. 27 conference, the Court will decide whether to hear Stolt-Nielsen, S.A. v. U.S., 06-97, which would test whether a court can enjoin the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from withdrawing immunity promised under its Corporate Leniency Program.

The case piques the interest of not only antitrust lawyers but also white-collar criminal defense attorneys, because the lifting of immunity means that all items of evidence a cooperating company has willingly handed over can become weapons in the government's arsenal.

"Stolt could have broad implications in every instance in which the government promises a benefit to a defendant in exchange for cooperation," says Alison Smith, a former Antitrust Division lawyer now at Haynes & Boone in Houston. "A corporation considering applying for immunity must now question whether the evidence it provides to the government will simply be used against it."

DOJ_NMG_0082633

Smith says an eventual ruling by the Court "could clarify the nature and extent of the defendants' constitutional rights in these agreements" and "could determine the limits of the government's ability to revoke agreements unilaterally and the power of the courts to restrain the government's decision to prosecute."

Demonstrating the gravity of the case, no fewer than nine amici curiae have filed briefs supporting the petition for certiorari. One of them is the Association of Corporate Counsel, led by senior vice president and general counsel Susan Hackett. "The impact on my members is their concern that they can no longer make rational decisions that would suggest predictable results," she says.

Under the Corporate Leniency Program, companies that first report illegal antitrust activity can get immunity from indictment and prosecution. In exchange, they must incriminate themselves, turn over key documents, waive attorney-client privilege and fully cooperate with prosecutors seeking to convict their competitors. Companies that wait receive lesser degrees of leniency, similar to deferred prosecution agreements or single-count guilty pleas common in other corporate crime cases.

Since it was instituted in 1993, the program has been a strong magnet for cartel cases, attracting more than 100 applicants and generating $2 billion in fines, according to a former federal prosecutor, Donald Baker of Washington, D.C.'s Baker & Miller.

But the Antitrust Division's action in Stolt will cause some second-guessing among would-be participants. "If you're going to disclose what you did in exchange for leniency, and then the government turns around and pulls your ticket, it will have a potential chilling effect in all of these cases," says defense lawyer Michael Himmel, of Roseland, N.J.'s Lowenstein Sandler. "Corporations will have to think long and hard about coming forward for fear of being bitten."

The parties in the case are London-based shipping company Stolt-Nielsen, S.A., and two executives, who were indicted Sept. 6 for antitrust violations. A federal judge enjoined the indictment last year, but the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed on March 24.

In that ruling, a two-judge panel said a district court judge has no power to enjoin prosecutors from filing an indictment because the equitable powers of the court do not exist when there is "an adequate and complete remedy at law." That remedy is to raise the immunity agreement as a defense after indictment, the court said.

U.S. District Judge Timothy Savage in Philadelphia, who decided the case below in January 2005, recited that Stolt had entered into the Antitrust Division's program and had provided information about a price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy that led to guilty pleas from two co-conspirators and more than $62 million in fines. Because the company had fulfilled its obligations under an immunity agreement, Stolt was entitled to an injunction barring the filing of an indictment, Savage held.

Prosecutors had argued that Stolt misled the government by claiming that its participation in the antitrust conspiracy had ceased in March 2002, but Savage found the government had explicitly immunized the company and its executives from prosecution for activity prior to Jan. 15, 2003.

Because the government drafted the agreement, it "cannot depend upon a tacit understanding of what it contends was meant during negotiations but was not memorialized in the integrated agreement," Savage said.

Savage concluded that the only way to protect the company's and its executives' due process rights was to decide, prior to indictment, whether the government could void the agreement.

The 3rd Circuit disagreed, finding the trial court's ruling not only ultra vires but also violative of separation of powers. U.S. Circuit Judge Thomas Ambro said the appeal presented "a significant constitutional question of first impression in this circuit: whether federal courts have authority, consistent with the separation of powers, to enjoin the executive branch from filing an indictment."

Although federal courts have such authority "in narrow circumstances, ... this is not such a case," wrote Ambro, joined by visiting U.S. Court of International Trade Judge Jane Restani. (Judge Samuel Alito Jr. was on the three-judge panel when the case was argued in September 2005 but did not participate in the ruling due to his elevation to the U.S. Supreme Court.)

According to court papers, Stolt admitted to participating in an international conspiracy to allocate customers, rig bids and fix prices on parcel tanker affreightment contracts for the shipment of specialty liquids to and from the United States and elsewhere.

On the basis of information Stolt provided, the government filed criminal charges and secured guilty pleas from two co-conspirators -- Odfjell Seachem of Norway and Jo Tankers B.V., which is based in the Netherlands.

DOJ_NMG_0082634

Odfjell Seachem agreed to pay a $42.5 million fine, and Jo Tankers agreed to pay a $19.5 million fine. Two Odfjell executives and three Jo Tankers executives also entered guilty pleas. All five were sentenced to prison terms in the range of three to four months and paid fines totaling more than $600,000.

In April 2003, the Justice Department suspended Stolt's participation in the program on the grounds that it allegedly did not withdraw from the conspiracy in March 2002, as it had claimed, but had continued its illegal activity into the second half of 2002.

In June 2003, Stolt executive Richard Wingfield was arrested and charged with participating in the conspiracy to allocate customers, fixing prices and rigging bids between March 2001 and October 2002.

Under threat of indictment, Stolt filed suit in February 2004, seeking enforcement of its rights under the agreement. Wingfield's suit followed.

In March 2004, the Justice Department formally revoked Stolt's conditional leniency and notified the company that it intended to seek an indictment.

Although the Court on the average grants only one out of 70 petitions for certiorari, bulking up with amici improves the odds. Of the 27,000 cert petitions filed over three terms from 2002 to 2004, only six cases had as many as nine amici, and cert was granted in three of them.

The other amici supporting Stolt's petition are the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Washington Legal Foundation, the New York Council of Defense Lawyers, the New England Legal Foundation, the International Association of Independent Tanker Owners and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg.

Futures Giants To Merge (CHIT)

By Greg Burns

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

After decades of stormy courtship, Chicago's two major futures exchanges on Tuesday announced an $8 billion merger, as the stock market's hunger for their shares overcame long-standing differences.

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange, which saw its stock price soar after it went public in 2002, said it has agreed to buy its longtime rival in a deal that would put its leadership in control of the combined business.

By the middle of next year, the Merc plans to abandon its sprawling trading complex along Wacker Drive and move into the historic Board of Trade building at LaSalle Street and Jackson Boulevard.

The new exchange will have average daily trading volume approaching 9 million contracts per day, easily surpassing all of its direct competitors, with a market capitalization of more than $25 billion.

Under pressure from their profit-minded shareholders, the two Chicago institutions have put aside a legacy of mistrust and antagonism over everything from seating arrangements at social events to who has a better system for electronic trading. Now Chicago has a united front as it battles for dominance in the global financial-services business.

Some exchange veterans who were pushing in vain for a merger as long as 30 years ago said they could scarcely believe it finally happened.

"This represents the culmination of a Don Quixote impossible dream," said Leo Melamed, who led the Merc off-and-on since the 1970s.

The stock of both companies shot up, with the Board of Trade soaring $17.48, to $151.99, and the Merc $13.25, to $516.50.

Leaders of both exchanges said the Merc takeover bodes well for the city. Mayor Richard Daley, who once separated a pair of exchange leaders who had a shouting match in his City Hall office, predicted the combination will be "good for the Chicago economy."

Though the exchanges directly employ fewer than 2,200, a number expected to shrink by several hundred after merger-related layoffs, they generate tens of thousands of local jobs through their trading activity. "This is going to go a long way to make sure those jobs stay here in Chicago," said Merc Chairman Terrence Duffy, who will serve as chairman of the combined CME Group Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0082635

Without the merger, the two separate organizations could find themselves at a competitive disadvantage and more vulnerable to a takeover themselves.

Melamed said the merger will preserve Chicago's stature as a global center for managing financial risk. Fellow Merc leader Jack Sandner noted, "They used to call us the hog butchers to the world. We are now the risk managers of the world."

Shouting and waving

Indeed, as stockyards and steel mills have faded from the scene, the boisterous trading pits have filled the void. Hoarse, sweaty guys shouting and waving their arms as they stand shoulder-to-shoulder in their colorful jackets have become one of Chicago's most recognizable commercial images.

Lately, the markets have been busier than ever. Every day, bankers, money managers and speculators bet on the future direction of everything from interest rates to ethanol. With a tiny down payment, they can buy and sell vast quantities of whatever they choose to trade.

Known as "derivatives," the contracts changing hands at the Merc and Board of Trade provide the leverage that can turn small fortunes into big ones, like a stock market on steroids.

The annual incomes of top traders can exceed $10 million, though many more who roll the dice "bust out"—slang for going broke. Family and friends have taught each other the business, and folks from all walks of life have taken a shot at riches in the Chicago markets, which have survived scandals including the FBI sting in 1989 that resulted in sweeping indictments.

But derivatives have shrugged off their bad reputation in recent years as the market for them has kept expanding. Billions of dollars flow through the exchanges in a single trading session.

Both the Merc and Board of Trade got their start in corn, soybeans, butter, eggs and other agricultural commodities, and their rough-and-tumble traders still set benchmark prices for the global farm economy.

During the 1970s and '80s, the exchanges hit it big by applying the same trading formula that worked for pork bellies to bonds, foreign currencies and stock indexes.

Yet only recently have the exchanges fully embraced electronic trading, and much of Wall Street's enthusiasm for their prospects is based on computers enabling them to reach more customers globally.

Many believed a merger made strategic sense long ago. But for decades, the two home-grown businesses, so alike in many ways, were kept apart by jealousies and suspicions.

In 1980, then-Board of Trade Chairman Les Rosenthal attempted to engineer a merger with the Merc's Melamed, only to see the idea flounder because of the "we-they culture," Rosenthal recalled. "Who was top dog? Whose building would be out front? It was all silly stuff, but you couldn't get over that. The barrier has always been the culture of the two places."

The Board of Trade, formed in 1848, was for most of its history the larger, better-established and reputedly stodgier exchange, while the upstart Merc was scrappier and more willing to experiment with technology. Even the ethnic heritage of the members at each respective institution differed, with the Board of Trade leaning Irish and the Merc Jewish, though both memberships were overwhelmingly white and male.

In the late 1980s and '90s, the exchanges were limited by the entrenched interests of arm-waving floor traders who controlled their governance. Floor traders worried that electronic markets would undermine their ability to make money.

As the Chicago exchanges restricted access to their products by refusing to combine their efforts, and move trading onto computer screens, the U.S. stock market flourished and competition grew at all-electronic exchanges and over-the-counter markets.

"Both exchanges were driven by hubris, egos and historical legacies," said Patrick Arbor, a former Board of Trade chairman. "Now they're owned by investment managers demanding performance and efficiency."

The Merc, which embraced electronic trading and sold shares to the public well before the Board of Trade, has become the city's No. 1 futures exchange by far.

As Melamed observed: "The culture changed completely."

Huge financial rewards

The stock market's enthusiasm for Merc and Board of Trade shares made Tuesday's takeover possible, Rosenthal said, not least because members have reaped huge financial rewards for surrendering control.

DOJ_NMG_0082636

Membership "seats" on the Board of Trade were valued at about $1.47 million each when the exchange sold shares in October 2005 at $54 each. The stock received by the owners is now worth more than $4 million, and Merc shareholders likewise have prospered handsomely as their stock has shot higher.

"The Merc has a very valuable coin of the realm in their share price," Rosenthal said. "The Board of Trade put a price on itself, and the Merc said, 'Sold!'"

Other deals could be in the offing, as trading becomes increasingly electronic and investors seek to reduce trading costs.

"The timing is perfect," said Merc Chief Executive Craig Donohue, who will continue in that post at the combined company. "We're in an increasingly competitive environment."

The Merc's deal for the Board of Trade is expected to be completed by the middle of 2007.

Chicago Derivatives Exchanges In $8bn Deal (FT)

By Doug Cameron And Norma Cohen

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

Chicago's two main derivatives exchanges on Tuesday unveiled an $8bn (£4.3bn) merger plan that will increase momentum for consolidation in the financial exchange sector by creating a platform with unmatched global reach.

A combination of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the smaller Chicago Board of Trade would create the world's largest futures exchange. The merged group would have an estimated annual $125m in synergies to fund expansion into Europe and Asia, as well as fast-growing areas such as credit derivatives and foreign exchange, which remain dominated by over-the-counter trading.

The announcement follows a year of talks and flirtations with rival exchanges. An all-American solution arrives at a time when the competitiveness of US capital markets has come under pressure from regulatory changes that have driven users overseas.

It comes two years after the CBOT rejected an approach from the CME in favour of its own listing last year, a move that proved crucial in providing an agreed price for the smaller exchange, with both trading near record levels in recent weeks.

"The transaction was done with both companies in a position of strength," said Terry Duffy, CME chairman, who would chair CME Group, as the company would be known.

The deal will raise the ante on the New York Stock Exchange to close its transatlantic deal with Euronext, the Paris-based stock and derivatives exchange. It would also leave Deutsche Börse, the world's largest derivatives platform, with a shortage of friendly merger partners, in the light of Euronext's preference for a deal with the NYSE.

European analysts and investors said the deal raised pressure on Deutsche Börse to seek a rival merger that would create a viable competitor and on competition authorities in Brussels to approve that combination. "It makes the case for a merger of European competitors even more compelling," said Mamoun Tazi, analyst at Man Securities.

Craig Donohue, the CME chief, who would retain that role in the merged group, said he did not expect regulators to block the deal, which is forecast to close in mid-2007, subject to shareholder and antitrust approval.

Robert Fleishman, an attorney at Steptoe & Johnson, said that the Justice Department would probably find that the benefits of "demonstrable efficiencies" in IT operations, staffing, and trading floor platforms would outweigh potential negative competitive effects of the deal, particularly because technological leaps would make it difficult for the DoJ to predict how markets will be shaped in the future.

However, users said they would be watching closely for synergies to be passed on in the form of lower trading fees

Futures Shock Chicago Merc To Buy Board Of Trade (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti, Alistair Macdonald And Edward Taylor

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and the Chicago Board of Trade agreed to join forces to form the world's largest financial market, one that will dwarf exchanges in the U.S. and Europe -- even the New York Stock Exchange.

The Chicago Merc announced plans to buy the smaller CBOT Holdings Inc. for about $8 billion. As the biggest deal yet in a global consolidation of the financial-exchange industry, the plan sets aside more than a century of crosstown rivalry.

DOJ_NMG_0082637

The agreement reflects the rapid growth in the investment industry's hottest sector: derivatives, or contracts whose value is derived from the movements in other financial instruments such as stocks and bonds. The linkup will make trading in many such derivatives a simpler matter, while also raising concerns that the increased power of the combined exchanges could lead to higher fees for traders.

Having grown far beyond their roots in putting together buyers and sellers of eggs, butter and corn, the Chicago exchanges, together, will trade some nine million futures contracts a day. Futures contracts give investors the right to buy or sell something later at a set price. Thus, they are used to hedge risk, allowing investors to enjoy smoother growth of their assets without the bumps that come with simpler investments on, say, a portfolio of stocks.

"Chicago used to be known as the hog butcher of the world. The city now will be known as the world's risk manager," said John F. Sandner, a Chicago Merc board member.

Futures have also become tools for making investment bets: on commodities such as wheat or oil, on trends in the economy and on broad measures of the stock and bond markets. Futures contracts can be tied to price movements of stock indexes, bonds, interest rates and foreign currencies. Commodities now make up only about 2% of the CME's trading and around 18% of the CBOT's.

Though futures are little understood outside professional circles, a wide array of investors trade them, including hedge funds, pension funds, some individuals and even mutual funds that manage money for millions of people. In recent years, hedge funds and investment banks' own trading desks have used new technology and trading methods to fire in rapid trades to exchanges across the world, leading to a surge in trading volumes. Some exchanges, including the CME, have responded by catering directly to hedge funds, a sign of the growing power of some exchanges versus Wall Street firms in serving sophisticated investors.

The business of the Chicago exchanges thus is exploding, especially as they ramp up electronic trading. Doing so has enabled them to compete with European rivals that long ago moved away from the older model of a big floor on which traders jostle and shout. Last year almost 10 billion derivatives contracts, including futures, were bought or sold on the world's exchanges -- in a business that barely existed 20 years ago. Trading has grown by an average of almost 18% a year between 2002 and 2005, according to the World Federation of Exchanges.

FULL TEXT

Read the full text2 of the CBOT's announcement of the deal. WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

WSJ's Aaron Lucchetti discusses3 how the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's plan to buy CBOT Holdings will likely impact investors. 4 • Plus, CME Chairman Terrence A. Duffy and CBOT Chairman Charles P. Carey discuss5 the deal, commenting on whether the merger is a "game changer" and how this affects the derivatives landscape.

The Chicago deal illustrates the increasingly rapid pace at which financial exchanges world-wide are consolidating to lift profits by cutting costs. Exchanges have morphed from member-owned clubs into profit-hungry publicly traded companies. This gives them an incentive to make acquisitions and also a currency, their stock, with which to do so.

Distinct Styles

The Chicago exchanges' styles are distinct even though they're just a few blocks apart. The CBOT has long operated in a 45-story Art Deco building topped by a statue of Ceres, the Roman goddess of grain. The CME occupies modern sand-colored towers stacked above its trading floor -- a hectic scene of arm-waving, boisterous traders. The CME's largest contracts are Eurodollars. At the CBOT, grain remains important but has been eclipsed by Treasury-bond futures.

Both exchanges also trade options, which convey the right, but not the obligation, to buy or sell an asset later at a set price.

The two Chicago markets have a combined market value of $26 billion, and the underlying value of contracts they trade daily is a massive $4.2 trillion. Now, "it's going to be one big animal," said Steve Rodosky, head of U.S. government-bond trading at Pacific Investment Management Co., or Pimco, a large mutual-fund management company. "It will be a massive part of what the markets rely on every day and the only exchange to use for fixed-income derivatives."

The exchanges had talked occasionally about aligning for decades, but were deterred by rivalries between their floor traders, who owned the markets before they became public companies. This time, serious talks began before the CBOT went public in the fall of 2005. The talks revived about a month ago when CME executives contacted the CBOT, said people familiar with the matter. A flurry of meetings followed, including a dinner between the CME Chairman Terry Duffy and his CBOT counterpart, Charles Carey, at Gene & Georgetti, a famous Chicago steakhouse. About a week ago, the exchanges' executives shook hands on a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0082638

The Chicago markets sealed their agreement as the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market continue separate bitter fights to close their own deals -- international transactions they hope will push them into Europe and take advantage of robust stock trading overseas.

NYSE Group Inc. announced a merger deal in June with Euronext NV, which trades both stocks and derivatives. But the Big Board is in a fierce battle to close the deal as Germany's Deutsche Börse pursues its own proposal to merge with Euronext in an all-European combo.

Chicago exchange officials pointed to the consolidation overseas as a catalyst for their own deal. "If you look at the discussions of consolidation, this is the best alternative for us," said Mr. Carey, a third-generation grain trader whose grandfather and uncle preceded him as chairman. All of them once worked the floors.

The proposed combination represents another triumph for electronic trading over pit trading. The Chicago Board of Trade started so-called open-outcry trading in 1848, and three years later traded its first corn-futures contract, for delivery of 3,000 bushels.

The Merc's value has surged, driven by the growth of its electronic trading system, called Globex. By 2001 the CME had passed the CBOT to become the largest U.S. futures exchange by number of contracts traded. The CBOT delayed embracing of electronic trading and then relied on an outside technology vendor to develop a system that was partially owned by a European competitor.

As part of the deal, the CME will close its trading floor and move the remaining trading in its pits to the CBOT, probably in late 2008. That will cut the number of major exchange trading floors in the U.S. to two: the CBOT's and the New York Stock Exchange's. The NYSE's, too, is endangered, owing to increased electronic trading there. Most exchanges in Europe and Asia rely fully on computers to match investors' orders to buy or sell.

The CBOT's Mr. Carey said the deal wouldn't have happened without the Board of Trade's 2005 initial public offering. Before the offering, the CME offered to buy the CBOT for the equivalent of less than $60 a share, according to people familiar with the matter. But the CBOT elected to go public first, and investors drove its shares up steeply from the start. It closed yesterday at $151.99 a share, up $17.48, or 13%, on the day. CME shares -- which are up tenfold from their December 2002 debut -- rose $13.25, or 2.63%, to $516.50.

The CME's Mr. Duffy is to become chairman of the combined firm, and CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue is slated to be CEO. Mr. Carey of the CBOT will be vice chairman. The deal effectively pushes aside the CBOT's chief executive, Bernard Dan, who will serve as special adviser for a year after the deal closes in mid-2007. The new company will have a large and potentially unwieldy board of 29 members, including 20 named by the CME.

The partners will save some $125 million annually on a pretax basis starting 12 months after the deal closes, according to Mr. Donohue. The savings will come from losing one trading floor, combining the technology platforms of the two companies and much of their staff.

The savings could be used to reduce fees for customers, though that might be small comfort to some investors: Both the CBOT and the CME have raised fees in recent years -- empowered by regulations that give them exclusive trading rights to their contracts. Stock exchanges, by contrast, face much more competition because shares can trade on different exchanges.

These exclusive rights, along with the Chicago exchanges' sheer size, will provide a formidable bulwark against the NYSE and other markets that are trying to get into the futures business. Successful futures contracts are lucrative for exchanges. This is especially so for the CME, because in addition to matching trades, it "clears" trades -- that is, guarantees that both sides of every trade get what they bargained for, either money or a viable contract. For several years, the CME has handled clearing for the CBOT.

Both exchanges have come a long way in recent years. They were put on the defensive at the time of the 1987 stock-market crash, as many argued that computerized futures trading exacerbated the losses, enabling stock declines to feed on themselves. Then a few years later, a Federal Bureau of Investigation sting operation exposed fraud on both Chicago trading floors.

DOJ_NMG_0082639

As the stock market roared in the 1990s, giving the NYSE and Nasdaq record trading volumes, the Chicago exchanges struggled to compete with growing derivatives trading done off exchange, or over the counter. Big banks privately negotiated their own contracts and didn't need the financial guarantee provided by an exchange clearing house.

Those trends reversed in this decade, giving far more power to the exchanges that trade derivatives. In the early 2000s, stock trading faced a bear market and U.S. recession. But the Chicago exchanges' business proved resilient, as a tide of hedge funds continued placing bets in markets that were doing well -- bonds, foreign currencies and commodities.

The Chicago exchanges got another boost after the collapse of energy giant Enron Corp. in the early 2000s underscored the danger of private deals that would prove worthless if a company defaulted on its obligations.

By 2002, the Chicago Merc's business had improved to the point where it sold its shares to the public. The stock soon soared. By 2005, the CME was worth well more than the NYSE, long the world's marquee exchange.

The NYSE copied the CME's strategy, announcing a public offering and following this year with its deal to buy Euronext -- thus getting into futures trading through that exchange's Euronext.liffe platform. The NYSE wants to use Euronext.liffe to grow into the futures business in the U.S. It doesn't intend to compete on products the Chicago exchanges already dominate. Instead, the NYSE will compete in new products that allow investors to bet on corporate credit risk, weather or economic indicators such as inflation.

The Chicago merger means fewer competitors in the futures industry, raising questions over whether the previously scrappy rivals will continue to innovate as effectively. That may be small comfort for the NYSE's designs on the futures business, because the Big Board now faces a much stronger competitor. Its market value would be larger than a combined NYSE-Euronext by about $3 billion.

Battle for Dominance

The Chicago exchanges have battled for dominance in the U.S. futures industry for decades -- each lobbying for an upper hand in regulations, competing for customers and vying to create and launch the next new blockbuster product. The rivalry thawed a few years ago, when the German-Swiss futures market Eurex made a run at the CBOT's Treasurys-bond futures contracts and Euronext.liffe took on the CME Eurodollar contract. The moves prompted the Chicago exchanges to cut fees and embrace electronics to keep their edge. The CBOT also agreed to have its contracts cleared by the Chicago Merc to save costs.

Since then, the per-trade prices that exchanges charge have crept back up. The result could be some antitrust concern. There also may be regulatory concerns about the combined company's ability to handle so much business on one technology platform. The deal faces regulatory reviews by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department antitrust lawyers. Current and former federal officials yesterday said it isn't likely to be derailed.

"The Justice Department is going to want to look over any overlap in products and services, and whether the deal will avert potential competition, especially in electronic-trading platforms," said Steven Sunshine, a former antitrust enforcer now with Cadwalader Wickersham & Taft. "I don't see any major hang-ups" given strong global competition. A U.S. official agreed, because the two exchanges specialize in different types of futures and don't overlap.

Exchange officials said there will still be plenty of competition -- the large volume of derivative trades done privately through commercial and investment banks. Mr. Donohue said, "We're not expecting any significant regulatory obstacles. We're in an increasingly competitive environment. The market is globalizing. The OTC market is much larger." CME officials maintain that greater efficiencies and cost-cutting would benefit customers and that its trading systems can handle the added stresses of the merger.

The combined exchange will tie together products on one platform that make sense to trade together -- the CME interest-rate futures with the CBOT's bonds, for example, and the CME's livestock contracts with CBOT's corn, wheat and soybean contracts. The exchanges also compete with New York commodity exchanges. The CBOT launched electronic metals trading in recent years, and the CME provided technology for electronic trading of the New York Mercantile Exchange's booming energy futures contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0082640

The deal calls for a swap of each CBOT Class A share for 0.3006 share of CME Class A common. CBOT shareholders can elect to receive cash, but the cash portion of payment for CBOT will be limited to $3 billion. The CME could issue up to 15.9 million new shares as part of the deal. Of the up to $3 billion in cash it could spend, it would raise about $2 billion in new debt.

The Chicago Merc will own from 69% to about 80% of the combined company -- to be called CME Group Inc. -- depending on CBOT shareholders' decision on whether to accept cash or stock.

The historic deal comes as other U.S. exchanges have encountered some trouble completing their own deals. Nasdaq has built a 25.3% stake in London Stock Exchange PLC but is still being rebuffed by London, which rejected Nasdaq in an earlier approach in March. In all, LSE has had four approaches from potential buyers in two years.

And Deutsche Börse, in trying to block the NYSE from buying Euronext, has played the political card, lobbying European politicians and regulators to back a Europe-wide exchange group. The NYSE deal will be put before Euronext shareholders in December, but it is far from certain they will approve. Euronext operates stock exchanges in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon as well as the Euronext.liffe derivatives exchange in London. Deutsche Börse operates the Frankfurt Stock Exchange and the Eurex derivatives exchange and trades products similar to those the CME and CBOT trade.

The CME looked at doing a deal in Europe, holding preliminary talks with Euronext and Deutsche Börse, but got nowhere, say people familiar with the matter.

Analysts said that the CME and CBOT merger won't immediately present a threat to Europe's derivatives trading platforms because it's hard for even large exchanges to take away business from an efficient electronic exchange in its home market.

In fact, the CME and CBOT tie-up could act as a stimulant to Europe's own lethargic consolidation race. It also could appease antitrust concerns in Europe about a possible combination of Deutsche Börse and Euronext, both big derivatives players. "The emergence of an even larger global competitor will be taken into account" when European antitrust regulators review deals that in the past concerned them, said Marc Reysen, a Brussels-based lawyer.

Asia has been largely absent from the global consolidation so far. Yesterday at the World Federation of Exchanges annual gathering in São Paulo, Brazil, exchanges focused on alliances in fast-growing emerging markets, not full-blown mergers. Euronext announced a plan to cooperate with Taiwan Stock Exchange Corp. And a host of Western exchanges, including the London Stock Exchange, are angling to sign agreements with the Bombay Stock Exchange that may include an investment.

The NYSE and Euronext have expressed interest in Asian exchanges once they complete their own deal. Some analysts said that after the Chicago exchanges finish their merger, the CME Group will be among the best positioned to expand internationally.

Lehman Brothers Holdings and William Blair advised the CME, which also had legal advice from Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. J.P. Morgan Chase and attorneys from Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw LLP advised the CBOT. Lazard Ltd. and Latham & Watkins advised a CBOT board panel on the deal's merits.

Chicago Exchanges Combine Thunder (WSJ)

By Susan Carey And Joseph T. Hallinan

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO -- By setting aside decades of rivalry, the downtown trading pits here have secured the Windy City's place as derivatives market to the world.

Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.'s planned $8 billion purchase of CBOT Holdings Inc., parent of the Chicago Board of Trade, would pair two exchanges that are leaders in global trading of futures and options, with combined average daily trading volume of nine million contracts, or about $4.2 trillion in notional value. The deal needs approval by regulators and shareholders.

"It's a great day for Chicago," said Robert Hamada, former dean of the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business and a public director of the CBOT for 12 years. "If they had continued divvying up the market as they had been, they would have beaten each other to the ground," he says, paving the way for rivals to surpass and buy them.

Said John F. Sandner, a Chicago Merc board member: "Chicago used to be known as the hog butcher to the world. The city now will be known as the world's risk manager."

DOJ_NMG_0082641

The move comes during an explosion in trading of futures, options and other derivatives as hedge funds and Wall Street firms develop more complex ways to make financial bets. The exchanges also have benefited from greater trading in physical commodities -- where the two exchanges are also leaders.

Though the two exchanges employ just 2,200, they have helped to keep the city a financial center even as its home-grown banking industry has steadily been bought out by larger rivals. The exchanges have also spawned numbers of trading firms.

New York has long overshadowed Chicago as a financial capital. But the CME has exploited electronic trading to dominate the markets in derivatives and futures in recent years. Futures contracts represent the right to buy or sell a commodity or financial instrument at a set time and price; derivatives are contracts whose values are derived from an underlying security or other asset. The deal could accelerate the trend toward electronic trading.

Traders who duck away from the trading floor to play ice hockey in the afternoon live in handsome homes along Lake Michigan and make seven-figure contributions to schools, theaters and other charities. One successful trader who now manages a trading firm said, only half-jokingly, "My job now is to convince 27-year-olds that it's OK to make only $2 million a year."

CME and CBOT have been bitter competitors for decades. But within the past 10 years or so, the relationship has thawed a little in the face of global trading threats from other exchanges and over-the-counter trading of derivatives. The path for this deal was paved in 2003, when the two agreed to combine their "clearing," or trade-processing, operations. The idea gained steam once the CBOT went public last year. CME became a for-profit organization and began trading in 2002.

Chicago has other famous rivals, most notably baseball's White Sox and Cubs. But the rivalry between the blue-blooded CBOT and the upstart CME "was much, much more intense and acrimonious and deeper because it's about making money," said Mr. Hamada. "The Cubs and Sox rivalry is a phantom."

James McCann, who trades Eurodollar futures at the CME, says the bad blood between the two exchanges is "overdone." But the 36-year-old, who has worked at the CME for 12 years, recalls that "the last time I was at the Board of Trade, I was 10."

The deal calls for the CBOT to move its electronic trading to the CME's Globex electronic trading platform. The CME will move its "open outcry" trading pits to the CBOT about five blocks away. Those pits, where runners and traders do their business with loud voices and hand signals, are a shrinking part of the business.

The CBOT, founded in 1848, started out handling "to arrive" or "forward" contracts for flour, hay and corn. In 1930 the CBOT moved into its current 45-story building, an Art Deco Chicago landmark topped by a golden statue of Ceres, the goddess of grain -- a nod to the CBOT's origins as a place to trade cash grain. Today, though, most trading involves financial instruments such as U.S. Treasury securities. Some 82% of all of the contracts traded at the CBOT during 2005 were either financial futures or options on financial futures contracts.

The CME was founded as the Chicago Butter and Egg Board in 1898 and evolved into the Chicago Mercantile Exchange in 1919, focusing on agricultural futures. It moved in 1983 into 487,000 square feet of office space in a 40-story building overlooking the Chicago River and across the street from the Lyric Opera. That lease expires in 2008.

The exchange also occupies 70,000 square feet of trading floor that it leases from the CME Trust. A spokesman said the CME intends to move its trading floor activities into the CBOT-owned building a few blocks away, but hasn't decided what to do with its leased space. He said no decision has been made about where the merged entity will be located. In 1992, the Merc launched the first global electronic futures trading platform. Originally for after-hours trading, Globex now enables electronic trading 23 hours a day, five days a week.

Leo Melamed, chairman of the CME from 1969 to 1977, says yesterday's agreement to join forces has been a dream of his since the 1970s. "We are so much stronger together," he said. "Chicago will be the big beneficiary and the center of gravity for derivatives and risk management." The combination "makes a much more formidable force world-wide and a magnet of business in our industry."

2 Exchanges In Chicago Will Merge (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082642

CHICAGO, Oct. 17 — The Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade, longtime fierce competitors, said Tuesday that they would merge in an $8 billion deal creating the largest market for financial derivatives contracts in the world.

The transaction would be the latest in a wave of mergers among the leading financial exchanges, as they transform themselves from member-owned clubs to for-profit companies competing in markets that have become increasingly global and electronic.

The New York Stock Exchange, the Nasdaq Stock Market and smaller exchanges have announced mergers, and the New York exchange's recent pursuit of Euronext, operator of four European stock markets, is driven in large part by Euronext's derivatives exchange in London.

A combination of the two Chicago markets, which were founded in the 19th century to trade agricultural futures, would trumpet the spectacular rise of derivatives — financial contracts whose value is tied to or derived from currencies, interest rates, commodities or other things of value.

Derivatives have made risk more manageable for many businesses, including oil companies seeking to insure themselves against storms and banks trying to protect themselves against home mortgage defaults. Yet they have also fueled trading blow-ups, as in the near-collapse in 1998 of the hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management that shook the financial markets.

The business of trading such financial contracts has generated huge fortunes that have led many exchanges to begin looking for merger partners. They seek to create greater efficiency and more liquid markets where buyers and sellers more easily find what they want for the right price, much as on eBay.

By combining, the Chicago exchanges, to be named the CME Group, will have average daily trading volume of close to nine million contracts a day, representing $4.2 trillion in notional value, or the amount of the underlying assets, not the value of the contracts themselves. By a comparison of sorts, some 1.8 billion shares, or $87.2 billion, are traded on average on the New York Stock Exchange, the world's biggest stock market, every day, although those shares, unlike derivatives, represent direct ownership stakes.

"That makes us the risk capital of the world," said Terrence A. Duffy, the mercantile exchange's chairman.

The combination of the two exchanges also signals the growing importance of Chicago as a center of global finance. The board of trade pioneered the concept of a futures contract — the delivery of a specific commodity by a certain date — in the 1860's, originally for grains like corn and wheat. The mercantile exchange led the push into electronic trading in the early 1990's.

Since then, these Chicago markets have been pressing further into the ever-growing world of trading derivatives contracts.

Derivatives can refer to a futures contract that is tied to the price of a commodity, like soybeans, and it can refer to arcane financial products not traded on any exchange, like credit default swaps, which can be negotiated between two hedge funds.

Often, the bet is not central to the underlying asset's role; a bet on the coin toss in a football game rather than the outcome of the game itself would be a derivative bet, for example. Or a contract to hedge the weather risks affecting crop prices, rather than the future prices of those crops, would also be considered a derivative.

Driven by companies' increasing desire to hedge risks, the derivatives markets have been growing rapidly. Since 2004, the notional value of interest rate, equity and credit derivatives has risen 44 percent, to $283.2 trillion, according to the International Swaps and Derivatives Association.

"The notional amounts are eye-popping," said Janet Tavakoli, president of Tavakoli Structured Finance in Chicago.

The two exchanges, situated a few blocks from each other in Chicago's downtown Loop, have storied histories. The board of trade once financed the formation of three regiments and an artillery battery for the union army during the Civil War, and the exchange's first building was torched in the Chicago Fire of 1871. The mercantile exchange began as the Chicago Butter and Egg Board, later branching out to frozen pork-belly futures and live-cattle futures contracts.

While a half-century older, the board of trade was slower to move to electronic trading and to issue public stock, causing it to lose ground to the mercantile exchange. The move to electronic trading, led by the Chicago Merc, has made the board of trade's clubby floor-trading world less relevant.

"The C.B.O.T. had to be dragged into the 21st century kicking and screaming," Ms. Tavakoli said.

DOJ_NMG_0082643

Tuesday's announcement took some in the financial world here by surprise because the two exchanges, despite their intense rivalry, had discussed combining off and on for more than three decades. The ice began to thaw between them after they struck an agreement in 2003 for both to use the Chicago Merc's clearinghouse, the board of trade's chairman, Charles P. Carey, said in an interview.

After his exchange finally went public last year, the newly issued stock provided a currency to consider such a deal. "When we had member organizations," Mr. Carey said, "the hurdles were insurmountable."

Last December, over dinner at Gene & Georgetti's, a popular steakhouse here, Mr. Duffy and Mr. Carey began to discuss a deal seriously. The talks accelerated over the last eight weeks, Mr. Duffy said.

The combination is expected to save $125 million annually in the second year after the deal closes, mostly through cuts in administrative and technology areas, the companies said. The exchanges will combine their trading operations into one trading floor at the board of trade.

But the mercantile exchange clearly prevailed over its rival. Mr. Duffy will become chairman of the combined organization, with Mr. Carey, vice chairman. Craig S. Donohue, chief executive of the mercantile exchange, will head the CME Group. The mercantile exchange will have 20 of the 29 board seats.

The deal faces regulatory scrutiny and a stiff breakup fee of $240 million if either exchange walks away. Regulators are expected to examine whether the combined entity can leverage its share of the futures and derivatives market into pricing power.

The merger "will create a mammoth enterprise with extraordinary pricing power," said Meyer Frucher, the chairman and chief executive of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange. "Ironically, it may create more opportunities for others."

Mr. Duffy and Mr. Donohue said that with an increased focus on electronic trading, the merged exchanges will make markets more transparent and more liquid for investors.

Mr. Donohue said the CME Group would compete more aggressively to build the exchanges' derivatives market in Europe and Asia. Some traders said it would face tough sledding against Euronext's London-based derivatives business and the Deutsche Börse's Eurex derivatives market.

Jay Feuerstein, who heads Xenon Capital Management in Chicago, a hedge fund that focuses on trading futures contracts, said: "It will be tough for the mercantile exchange to take on the European exchanges and beat them. If they decide to offer some of the products that the Chicago exchanges offer, they have some built-in competitive advantages."

Mr. Feuerstein added, "I am going to trade where there is the deepest liquidity, the cheapest transaction costs and the least credit risk."

Still, while the deal could increase the CME Group's reach overseas, the combination could stifle plans by Euronext and the New York Stock Exchange to increase its derivatives business in the United States. Euronext agreed to merge with the Big Board this summer, explaining in part that the move could create revenue opportunities related to derivative operations, some of which included plans to grow in the United States.

The combination of the two exchanges "makes them into a very, very big competitor indeed," said Lynton Jones, a founder of Bourse Consult in London. "Euronext has been trying to get into U.S. markets without much success. They thought with the clout of the N.Y.S.E. behind them, they might do something. But I don't see what that could be now."

Exchanges Bank On Passing Antitrust Muster (CRAIN)

Crain's Chicago Business, October 18, 2006

(Crain's) — Exchange officials are assuming that antitrust concerns won't stop creation of the world's largest futures market, even though the proposed acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade would give the Chicago Mercantile Exchange a near monopoly on U.S. futures trading.

"We've been very well advised by the Department of Justice on antitrust issues, and we're not expecting any regulatory issues," Merc CEO Craig Donohue told investors Tuesday in a conference call.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the regulatory outlook, nor would she confirm whether any informal meetings already have taken place on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.'s proposed acquisition of CBOT Holdings Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0082644

The merger must also be approved by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and exchange officials said it faces "modest" regulatory reviews overseas. A CFTC spokesman says the exchanges mainly have to certify that their bylaws and surveillance systems meet the agency's requirements.

Advertisement

Related Article Topics | Related Industry News

That means the biggest hurdle is likely to be any antitrust questions the deal raises with either the Federal Trade Commission or the Justice Department, the latter of which is considered more likely to be the agency that reviews exchange mergers such as this.

Antitrust clearance will largely depend on how regulators define the market in which the two exchanges compete. Their combined trading volume of more than 1.4 billion contracts last year dwarfs the New York Mercantile Exchange's 166.6 million contracts, and other U.S. futures markets are much further behind.

However, on a global scale, the combined firm would still face strong competition. Germany's Eurex traded almost 785 million contracts last year, second only to the 883 million contracts traded at the CME.

London-based Euronext, with volume of nearly 344 million contracts, was not far behind third-ranked Chicago Board of Trade's 561 million contracts.

"I wouldn't say on the antitrust side that it's a slam dunk, but they'll have a very strong argument," says Michael Greenberger, professor of law at the University of Maryland and a former head of trading and markets for the CFTC. "It is a global market and U.S. markets are in fierce competition with Europe and Asia. It's almost a necessity for the U.S. to have this merger to remain competitive."

But another longtime industry observer cautions that it could get complicated, especially if Congress decides to take a look at the deal's implications.

"For mom-and-pop traders and individual speculators, they don't necessarily trade globally," says John Lothian, president of the electronic trading division of Price Futures Group Inc. in Chicago and publisher of an industry newsletter that bears his name. "Congress isn't elected by hedge funds or big banks. The question is, how does this affect the little guy?"

Several years ago, he notes, the Merc and the CBOT competed for the rights to trade a futures contract based on the Dow Jones industrial average. The Merc lost, but went on to develop a contract based on the S&P 500 index, which proved to be far more successful.

"Innovation and competition are major drivers of success in the U.S. futures industry," Mr. Lothian says. "My concern is, if you suppress competition, does that lead to less innovation?"

But the exchanges will point out that global competition, particularly if exchanges around the world consummate their mating dance, will keep them on their toes.

Another consideration is that over-the-counter trading of swaps and other derivatives adds trillions of dollars in off-exchange trading volume to the competition facing the exchanges.

"That's the argument they will make, and it's a legitimate argument," says Mr. Lothian.

Tata Steel Offers $8 Billion For Corus (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman In Mumbai, India, And Jason Singer In London

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Tata Steel Ltd.'s formal proposal to buy British steelmaker Corus Group PLC for about £4.4 billion ($8 billion), if successful, would represent the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company and underscore the loosening of India's regulatory environment.

Tata's proposal, which would create a major global steel company, is expected to receive a recommendation from Corus's board later this week. Tata is likely to quickly clear India's foreign-exchange hurdles, where in some cases a committee must give permission for an Indian company to raise money for overseas activities.

The fact that such a big purchase is expected to pass regulatory muster in India is a turnabout from the past, when the country's rules on foreign-exchange and overseas purchases by companies were so onerous that high-technology companies needed central-bank approval to buy computers from abroad. In the past several years, those rules have eased significantly as India's international commercial ambitions have risen.

While Indian companies have been buying assets and whole companies overseas, a purchase of Corus by Tata could spark a wave of large foreign acquisitions by Indian companies that have expanded domestically amid brisk economic growth.

Corus yesterday confirmed reports that it has been in negotiations with Tata and said in a statement that the company, based in London, received a proposal "regarding a possible recommended offer for Corus at a value of 455 pence a share in cash." On the London Stock Exchange, Corus shares edged down to 479 pence ($8.92), off 0.5 pence.

The fact that the shares are trading higher than the price of Tata's proposal suggests to some investors that a rival bid may emerge. The deal also may be subject to regulatory hurdles outside India.

People close to the matter said Tata has largely completed a due-diligence inspection of Corus, which has steel plants in Britain and the Netherlands, and that Corus's board is likely to approve the deal. Corus's board is scheduled to meet tonight. Credit Suisse AG is advising Corus. Tata couldn't be reached for immediate comment.

Together, the two companies may be able to achieve about $345 million in cost savings. That estimate is based on the annual $15 per ton in savings anticipated by the combination of Arcelor SA of Luxembourg and Mittal Steel Co. of the Netherlands, the world's top two steelmakers by output that merged earlier this year. While Tata and Corus don't have overlapping operations, much of Corus's systems, administration and technology could be outsourced to India, where Tata Group companies provide low-cost services for U.S. and European companies.

Tata and other Indian companies that used to have to navigate New Delhi bureaucracy for the dollars needed to import new equipment today have little trouble raising billions at home and abroad either through bank loans or from investors. Meanwhile, Indian regulators who used to have to rubber-stamp each step of the process are staying out of the way.

When N.R. Narayana Murthy, the retired founder of Infosys Technologies Ltd., was starting his software-outsourcing company, he had to take regular trips to New Delhi to get approval to raise the few thousand dollars needed to import computers. Today, his company doesn't have to ask for anyone's permission. It will have sales of more than $3 billion this year and is planning to raise $1.5 billion on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Since 2000, the limit on acquisitions by Indian companies that could be made without regulatory approval has risen from 25% of a company's net worth to 200% last year. Former central bank Governor Bimal Jalan said companies today commonly inform the central bank of an acquisition.

A company looking to raise more than twice its net worth needs approval from a committee made up of members of the Reserve Bank of India, India's central bank; the Ministry of Finance; the Ministry of Commerce and Industry; and the Ministry of External Affairs.

Tata's net worth is estimated at $2 billion, analysts said. The company is planning to finance the acquisition through bank loans arranged in the United Kingdom and may breach the threshold for needing committee approval. But even here, Tata is unlikely to hit any road bumps. Because Tata is well-known and the steel industry is a solid investment area, approval for a Corus deal is likely to come easily, Mr. Jalan said.

Lilly Sets Deal To Acquire Icos For About $2.1 Billion (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to acquire biotechnology company Icos Corp. for $2.1 billion in a move to gain full ownership of the erectile-dysfunction drug Cialis.

As the sole owner of Cialis, Eli Lilly is expected to muster a stronger challenge to Pfizer Inc.'s Viagra, the first drug approved for erectile dysfunction and the market leader in the U.S., with more than 50% of the market. Cialis -- made by the two companies' joint venture, Lilly Icos LLC -- has a 25% market share.

Richard Evans, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York, said Lilly is likely to put more marketing and sales resources behind Cialis than when it owned only half of the drug. "With the 50-50 split, it's practically difficult for Cialis to get the attention it deserves within Lilly," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082646

Take a peek2 at what to expect in the quarterly reports of other major companies.

Eli Lilly CEO Sidney Taurel discusses4 the deal and responds to a query whether Lilly was able to low-ball Icos since no one else was interested in buying it.

Launched in 2003, five years after Viagra, Cialis generated global sales of $456 million in the first six months of this year. Its sales are expected to exceed $1 billion -- the threshold beyond which a drug is considered to have reached blockbuster status -- next year. The drug's patent expires in 2017.

The market for erectile-dysfunction drugs had weakened as the drug makers pulled back on consumer advertising that was judged to be overly explicit and amid concerns that some of the treatments could cause eye problems. But those worries have abated, and some of the companies have restarted ad campaigns that take a less-controversial approach.

"We've seen a significant improvement in the market since then," said Sydney Taurel, Lilly's chief executive, on a conference call.

Mr. Taurel said he expects "significant numbers" of jobs will be eliminated at Icos. The company, based in Bothell, Wash., has 700 employees.

Under the terms of the deal, Icos shareholders will receive $32 for each share of Icos common stock. The bid represents an 18% premium to Icos's closing price Monday of $27.12.

Lilly shares fell 11 cents yesterday to $57.55 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Icos rose $4.38, or 16%, to $31.50 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Lilly, of Indianapolis, said the deal, which is expected to close in late 2006 or early 2007, will reduce its 2007 earnings but will start adding to profit in 2008. The company expects to take a charge related to in-process research and development.

Vivendi's Universal Sues Two Web Sites Over Video Sharing (WSJ)

By Ethan Smith And Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group filed copyright-infringement lawsuits against two Internet companies, including one acquired by Sony Corp., over the ability they give users to upload and download video content with their Web sites.

Universal, in a statement, said the companies it had sued "build their business on the backs of our content and the hard work of our artists and songwriters -- without permission and without in any way compensating the content creators."

The suits, against Sony Pictures Entertainment's Grouper Networks Inc. and Bolt Inc., mark the first time a major media company has tried to use the courts to narrowly interpret "safe harbor" protections provided by the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998 so it would exclude video-sharing sites. The DMCA provides protection from liability for copyright infringement to Internet companies if they meet certain criteria and follow so-called takedown procedures. Under the procedures outlined in the DMCA, sites have to remove any infringing copyright when notified specifically by the copyright holder.

Filed Monday in U.S. District Court for California's Central District, the suits follow recent deals reached by Universal and two other big music companies to license their video and music content to video-sharing giant YouTube Inc. A person familiar with the Grouper and Bolt matters said Universal had discussed licensing agreements with those companies, but said the talks never progressed.

Sony, which in August paid $65 million for Grouper, wasn't named in the suit, but Universal said it reserved the right to add Sony's film studio as a defendant. A representative for Bolt didn't respond to requests for comment. A Sony Pictures spokesman sent a statement from Grouper Chief Executive Josh Felser calling the lawsuit "without merit" and adding: "Our Web site is protected by federal law, and we're vigilant about taking down copyrighted content when we're properly notified."

"They're making a copy, so that's direct copyright infringement. Then they're posting it on their Web sites and financially benefiting," says Gill Sperlein, general counsel of adult-entertainment company Io Group Inc., which filed a complaint against video-sharing site Veoh Networks Inc., in June in U.S. District Court for California's Northern District. A Veoh spokesman declined to comment on the suit.

Record Labels Turn Piracy Into A Marketing Opportunity (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin, Sarah Mcbride And Ethan Smith

DOJ_NMG_0082647

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A video clip from Jay-Z's live concert in June at Radio City Music Hall is popping up on all sorts of illicit music-sharing hotspots. But Jay-Z isn't upset.

That's because the rapper, at the request of Coca-Cola Co., agreed to allow distribution of the eight-minute clip -- which included promotions for Coke -- on the peer-to-peer sites, using technology usually used to thwart music pirates.

The unusual alliance demonstrates a new tack being taken by the music industry to deal with the challenge posed by widespread music piracy. For years, the industry has been suing individual downloaders and file-sharing services, hoping to discourage the practice. In a tactic little known outside the music industry, record labels have also started to hire outside companies to plant "decoy," or fake, files on the sites. (One such company, ArtistDirect Inc.'s MediaDefender, says it has deployed decoys for as many as 30 of the top 100 Billboard songs at any given time.) The decoy files frustrate users because they fail to download even though, thanks to the companies' technical expertise, they often claim the top spot in search results for a tune.

But now there's a growing recognition among some record executives and performers that the people who are downloading illegally are frequently huge music fans and that marketing to them may be more desirable in the long run than suing or otherwise harassing them.

Hence the alliance between Jay-Z and Coke. By inserting promotional material into the decoy files, and then planting those files prominently on file-sharing sites, record labels and other marketers can turn what is now an antipiracy tool into an advertising medium. "The concept here is making the peer-to-peer networks work for us," says Jay-Z's attorney, Michael Guido. "While peer-to-peer users are stealing the intellectual property, they are also the active music audience," and "this technology allows us to market back to them."

Concert outtakes aren't the only content. Audioslave, Ice Cube, Yellowcard and other music groups have used decoy files for their own version of viral marketing. With help from niche companies like Sparkart LLC and NFA Group's BuyDRM, they put snippets of a song into the files with the promise that a stream of the entire song will be "unlocked" for everyone once the promotion is forwarded to enough people. The hope is that this will motivate people to send the file to lots of friends.

Alternative rock band Dashboard Confessional tried that approach with its single "Don't Wait" to promote its latest album, "Dusk and Summer," released jointly on the independent Vagrant label and Universal's Interscope label. "It just emanated out of one more thing we could do on the Internet, because that's where our customers are," says Dashboard's manager, Rich Egan, who credits filesharing rather than radio airplay with the performer's success.

Right now, only about 1% of the decoy files on peer-to-peer sites include promotions or ads, but the potential audience is huge. While many well-known peer-to-peer services such as eDonkey and Grokster have been shut down by legal action, new ones pop up all the time. In September, an average of nine million people were logged on to the services at any given time, up from 6.8 million two years ago, according to BigChampagne, which tracks the industry. By comparison, last month YouTube attracted about two million visitors a day and MySpace.com attracted 16.8 million visitors a day, according to comScore Media Metrix.

The typical downloader is a tech-savvy male between 14 and 25 years old. "It's a wonderful audience that is very difficult to reach through any other means," says Mitchell Reichgut, a principal at Jun Group, the ad agency in Norwalk, Conn., that crafted the Coke promotion.

The record industry's approach toward downloaders began to change after last year's landmark Supreme Court ruling on Grokster. The Justices found that file-sharing companies like Grokster could be held liable for copyright infringement if their products encouraged consumers to swap music or movies illegally. Before the ruling, record labels worried that they might undercut their legal arguments if they used peer-to-peer sites for their own purposes. Now, "we're basically free to exploit these billions of fake files we're putting out," says Randy Saaf, chief executive of MediaDefender.

Still, marketing on peer-to-peer sites is "a bit of a tricky dynamic for entertainment companies," says Mr. Reichgut. He says many of his clients in the entertainment industry don't want to be identified.

DOJ_NMG_0082648

Not so reticent is EMI Group PLC's Virgin Records, which says it's in talks with MediaDefender about marketing options. "It's an opportunity that will hopefully lead to a better experience for the artists, the labels and the consumers," says Virgin Chairman Jason Flom.

Labels typically must approve file-sharing marketing projects, says Peter Katsis, an executive at The Firm, an entertainment-management company. Coke, which devised the Jay-Z promotion as part of a bigger marketing push, says it wouldn't have gone ahead without the agreement of Universal Music Group, Jay-Z's record company. Helping facilitate the deal was Jay-Z's unusual role at Universal: He heads Def Jam Records, the Universal label that releases his albums. Coke did a similar decoy-file promotion using another Def Jam artist, the R&B act Ne-Yo, earlier this year.

Coke says that 3.5 million people downloaded the Ne-Yo video during the six weeks it was on the peer-to-peer networks, and the Jay-Z concert clip has already been downloaded more than 2.5 million times. "It has so far exceeded our goals that you should look for us to do more," says Katie Bayne, senior vice president of Coca-Cola North America.

Some music acts are using peer-to-peer sites to gather marketing data. Over the summer, MediaDefender ran a promotion for the alternative music group Gin Blossoms. File sharers looking for songs got files with links that asked if they wanted to win a free iPod preloaded with Gin Blossoms tunes. If they clicked on the link, they landed on a page that asked them to fill in demographic data, including name, age and email address, and 25% of them did. MediaDefender executives say they were surprised so many responded, but they believe that placing the questionnaire on ArtistDirect, a well-known music site, gave the promotion legitimacy.

Meanwhile, some file-sharing sites are fighting back against the marketing-infused decoy files, which they consider spam. When they release new versions of their filesharing programs, they are including tweaks that can make planting the covert ads more difficult. The latest version of LimeWire, for example, won't allow people responding to other users' searches to easily include a link to a Web page.

At the same time, MediaDefender and other decoy-file distributors are constantly trying to beef up their own technology. "It's a constant cat and mouse game," says MediaDefender's Mr. Saaf.

Music Companies Sue 8,000 More In Anti-Sharing Fight (WP/AP)

By Jane Wardell, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Trade Group Files Cases in 17 Nations

LONDON, Oct. 17 -- The international record industry filed thousands more lawsuits around the world Tuesday against people it accuses of illegally sharing digital music.

The International Federation of the Phonographic Industry filed 8,000 cases in 17 countries, including its first in South America and Eastern Europe.

The lawsuits, which are aimed at "uploaders," include criminal and civil cases. Uploaders have put hundreds or thousands of copyrighted songs onto Internet file-sharing networks and offered them to millions of people worldwide without permission from the copyright owners.

The industry contends that such file-sharing has cost it billions of dollars in lost revenue.

The London federation, which represents 1,450 record companies around the world, said many of the people targeted are the parents of children who shared music files.

The music industry has been criticized for targeting individual Internet users in its legal warfare against piracy instead of the Internet service providers that host file-swapping sites. The ISPs are harder to pursue legally because they can claim to have no knowledge of piracy occurring on their networks.

"Around the world many people have already paid a heavy price for their illegal file-sharing," said John Kennedy, chairman of the federation. "They all thought they were unlikely to be caught, but teachers, postal workers, . . . scientists and people in a host of other occupations, as well as parents, have ended up having to dig deeply into their pockets.

"There is no excuse. People should understand that they can be caught whatever network they are using."

DOJ_NMG_0082649

Legal action was extended for the first time to Brazil, where the industry federation said more than 1 billion music tracks were illegally downloaded last year and where record company revenue fell to $395 million last year from $724.7 million in 2000. Lawsuits were also filed for the first time in Mexico and Poland.

The federation said more than 2,300 people have been fined or paid compensation averaging at nearly $3,100.

The countries included in the new wave of lawsuits include Argentina, Austria, Brazil, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hong Kong, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Mexico, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Singapore and Switzerland.

The federation said it targeted uploaders using major unauthorized services, including BitTorrent, eDonkey, DirectConnect, Gnutella, LimeWire, SoulSeek and WinMX.

The group added that it was heartened by court judgments around the world in recent months that it said establish the liability of such operators for copyright infringement that they facilitate or promote and from which they benefit.

Game Theories (WSJ)

By Paul Ingrassia

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Rick Wagoner, the CEO of General Motors, has to be corporate America's Comeback Kid. But after a dramatic week in the battle to reshape GM and the global auto industry, Las Vegas billionaire Kirk Kerkorian -- GM's largest individual shareholder and Mr. Wagoner's nemesis -- might still hold a winning hand.

Just six months ago, Mr. Wagoner seemed on the verge of being fired. Losing $10.6 billion in a single year, descending into junk-bond status and drawing six separate SEC investigations of prior years' earnings might put any man's job in jeopardy. Then last summer Mr. Kerkorian proposed putting GM into a global alliance with Nissan and Renault, both led by turnaround maven Carlos Ghosn. The brazen proposal gave GM's board the chance to trim Mr. Wagoner's wings without a messy firing.

But Mr. Wagoner gamely fought back. Over the past year he's gotten health-care concessions from the United Auto Workers union and has convinced 35,000 hourly workers, nearly one-third of GM's U.S. total, to take buyout offers. He has agreed to sell 51% of GMAC, the company's financing arm, to raise needed cash. GM posted operating profits in the first half, excluding special charges. "The pace of the turnaround has shocked people," Mr. Wagoner recently declared.

It also rallied support from the GM board, which last week rebuffed the Nissan-Renault alliance, leaving Mr. Wagoner clearly in charge. His victory was sweetened when Mr. Kerkorian's representative on the GM board, Jerome B. York, quit in disgust.

Mr. York's scathing resignation letter evoked memories of an earlier dissident GM director, H. Ross Perot, who famously dismissed his board colleagues 20 years ago as "pet rocks." Ironically, in 1992 the GM board ousted the CEO and other top executives in the face of huge losses, and ushered in an era of boardroom activism.

A new report from consulting firm Challenger, Gray and Christmas predicts 2006 will be "the biggest CEO turnover year on record," which makes Mr. Wagoner's comeback all the more remarkable. But there are no subtleties here. The stakes are huge, and everyone is playing for keeps. Including Mr. Kerkorian, at least for now. Unless the reclusive magnate folds his cards, he still can make a lot of money as the next chapters in GM's drama unfold.

Scenario No. 1 at GM, clearly the best for all concerned, is that Mr. Wagoner succeeds in producing a durable turnaround. Mr. Kerkorian would be proven wrong about Mr. Wagoner, but one suspects that doubling his $1.6 billion investment in General Motors would be ample balm for the billionaire's public wounds.

How realistic is this scenario? The case to support it is simple. Mr. Wagoner says he has cut $9 billion out of GM's annual structural costs, thanks to the deals with the UAW and other measures. Suppose half of that amount, allowing for taxes and for the loss of half ownership of GMAC, flows to GM's bottom line.

That amounts to about $8 per GM share. Using a conservative price-earnings ratio of eight (half that of the broad stock market), General Motors shares should be selling for $64 apiece -- more than double the average amount that Mr. Kerkorian paid for his GM shares. Thus if Mr. Wagoner is right, Mr. Kerkorian stands to make a killing, though not quite as much as the $3 billion profit he pocketed from his timely investment in Chrysler in the early 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0082650

Of course, General Motors shares aren't selling at anywhere near $64 apiece, which brings up Scenario No. 2. Simply put, GM's current turnaround is more apparent than real, and the inadequacy of the company's progress will become obvious within the next year. In that case, unless his interest wanes, Mr. Kerkorian can start banging at the door again -- renewing his quest to reshape and revolutionize GM.

Scenario No. 2 holds that the quality of GM's recent operating profits is suspect. A big factor was sales of the company's new full-size SUVs, the Chevy Tahoe and Suburban, which were especially strong given the high gasoline prices in the first half of the year. GM, like all car companies, books profits when it sells vehicles to dealers, instead of when consumers buy the cars from dealers. At the end of September, GM had a 125-day supply of unsold Tahoes sitting on dealer lots, and a 150-days supply of unsold Suburbans. Those inventories are at least double the desirable level.

So GM overstuffed its dealer pipeline in the first half, which boost short-term profits but has necessitated production cuts -- which the company has announced -- in the second half. Now the company is launching a new line of full-size pickup trucks, creating a new pipeline to be filled. Or overfilled.

Meanwhile, the pending sale of a controlling stake in GMAC will raise cash but will impair GM's future earnings power. So this victory is really a strategic retreat, sort of like Dunkirk. And looming ahead is a settlement for the final restructuring of Delphi, GM's bankrupt former components unit, which GM says could cost it between $5 billion and $12 billion. This could eat up most of the profits from selling the GMAC stake.

Whether Mr. Kerkorian waits around for either scenario to unfold is unclear. The billionaire doesn't have to rush to judgment -- except that he happens to be 89 years old. If he chooses to sell part of his 9.9% stake in GM, he'd be positioned to profit if the stock goes up, or to repurchase the shares at a lower price if their price falls.

Meanwhile, shuttling between Paris and Tokyo is Mr. Ghosn, whose name rhymes, aptly, with "alone." The CEO of both France's Renault and Japan's Nissan has been left at the altar. Mr. Ghosn says he wants a North American partner in his alliance to enhance purchasing clout and to share common component costs -- including the hefty bills for developing new "green" engine technology. With Chrysler part of DaimlerChrysler and GM unwilling, Mr. Ghosn's only other chance is Ford. It just hired a new CEO, Alan Mulally of Boeing, but prior to that Chairman William C. Ford Jr. tried to lure Mr. Ghosn to run Ford.

Mr. Ghosn said no thanks, but the two men remain in touch. It's likely that Mr. Mulally will get time to formulate his own game plan for Ford. But he is 61 years old and isn't a Ford lifer, so he mightn't have the same instinctive hostility to an alliance with Nissan and Renault that Mr. Wagoner harbors. Thus Mr. Ghosn might yet find his North American partner, though it's too early to tell.

This is a high-stakes poker game among rich and powerful men to control and shape one of the world's largest and most visible industries -- and one that tugs at emotions ranging from national pride to consumers' desires. Mr. Wagoner has just won a big hand. But the best bet is that the game will continue.

Mr. Ingrassia, a former Detroit bureau chief at The Wall Street Journal, is vice president for news strategy for Dow Jones.

ENVIRONMENT:

Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules For Nuclear Plant Guards (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Two years ago, the Energy Department announced plans for creating "a special elite federal force" to protect high-priority nuclear plants. The department's nuclear weapons stockpile, "simply put, must not be allowed to fall into the wrong hands," then-Secretary Spencer Abraham said.

After 18 months of study, the department came up with a policy to create combat teams, much like the military's Delta Force or Navy SEALs, that could engage adversaries outside a nuclear weapons plant rather than wait for attackers from inside plant gates.

These elite combat units, however, are not made up of government employees. They work for companies that operate Energy Department plants or for contractors that provide guards and security officers.

DOJ_NMG_0082651

And according to union officials, the contract officers are increasingly concerned about their employment status and would like the option to shift to the federal workforce.

Energy Department plants and facilities that use nuclear weapons material, especially plutonium and highly enriched uranium, are expanding the number of security jobs covered by rigorous physical fitness standards, and many officers are concerned they will lose their jobs. Officers are also uneasy about an Energy Department proposal that they think could reduce their pension and health-care benefits, the union representatives said.

A department official said contractors should be able to reassign into less demanding jobs those officers who do not meet the fitness standards for "offensive combative" positions. Any pension and health-care changes would affect only new hires, and the policy that would have triggered those changes has been suspended, pending further review, the official said.

The Energy Department also is not interested in exploring whether the officers should be "federalized." The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said the option was debated in 2004 and discarded in 2005.

Bryan Wilkes , spokesman for the department's National Nuclear Security Administration, said no compelling reason was found that justified converting the officers into federal employees. "What we have is working great," he said.

But the National Council of Security Police, a union group representing officers at nuclear facilities, thinks the department's plans will undercut the goal of enhanced security in the post-Sept. 11 world.

In the past, nuclear weapons plants have assigned officers to offensive and defensive positions. The Energy Department's policy shift is prompting plants to realign their security posture and convert more positions to the offense, union officials said.

For the offensive positions, a security officer must run a mile in 8 minutes and 30 seconds and complete a 40-yard dash in no more than 8 seconds. Defensive positions require a half-mile run in 4 minutes, 40 seconds, and a 40-yard dash in 8.5 seconds.

The union group said the physical fitness standards do not take into account a person's age or sex, placing officers in their 40s at a disadvantage. Hundreds of officers will not meet the standards for offensive positions and will be forced to take lower-paying jobs at the Energy Department plants or will be let go, union officials said.

"We're asking to be treated fairly," said Mike Stumbo , the council's president.

Stumbo said the department's policy will accelerate turnover among younger officers who see little chance of completing a career at the plants.

BWXT Pantex LLC, the Energy Department contractor with the largest guard force, said the company thinks many older officers and female officers "are fully capable" of meeting the physical standards.

BWXT Pantex also said jobs are being identified for officers who do not meet the fitness standards. The company also said it will seek to negotiate a new contract with the guards union "that includes a competitive benefits package."

The company reported a turnover rate of 6.7 percent for security officers in fiscal 2006, but Robert J. Lynch , president of the Pantex Guards Union, said his tally shows that about 10 percent of the guard force has left the Pantex plant this year.

Lynch said the company has not told the union what it plans for older officers who cannot meet the fitness standards.

Many union members would like to see the Bush administration reopen debate on whether they should be converted to federal employees, Stumbo said. That status would give them a greater chance at stable careers and retirement benefits, he said.

"For our guys, the fundamental argument is, if we are asked to die or kill for our country, we should have the full measure and involvement of the government's support," Stumbo said.

Benefits Of Fish Exceed Risks, Studies Find (WP)

By Sally Squires, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Experts Advise 2 Servings a Week

DOJ_NMG_0082652

The health benefits of eating fish regularly outweigh the danger from mercury and other contaminants even for pregnant women and children, two major reports concluded yesterday as scientists tried to resolve a slippery question that has long vexed consumers.

The findings, which were reached by independent teams of scientists, pointed to significant benefits for both young and old. In adults, the death rate from heart disease was 36 percent lower among those who ate fish twice a week compared with those who ate little or no seafood, according to a study being published today in the Journal of the American Medical Association. Overall mortality was 17 percent lower, the study by Harvard School of Public Health researchers found.

A second, federally funded report released by the Institute of Medicine (IOM) echoed the conclusion that the heart benefits of eating seafood outweigh the risks and said infants also benefit from the healthy fats found in seafood.

Omega-3 fatty acids found in fish promote healthy vision and brain development in infants whose mothers consume fish or seafood during pregnancy or while nursing, the report said. These healthy fats also appear to decrease the risk of delivering a preterm, low-birth-weight baby.

Even so, because of methyl mercury concerns, the IOM report stuck with the current federal guidelines that advise women who are nursing, pregnant or plan to become pregnant, as well as children age 12 and younger, to refrain from eating swordfish, shark, tilefish and king mackerel. These two groups can safely consume up to 12 ounces of other fish per week, the report said, but they should also limit white (albacore) tuna to six ounces a week because of its high levels of methyl mercury, which can be toxic to the brain and hearing.

The new findings are expected to help put to rest a hotly debated nutritional debate that often left perplexed consumers asking, "What do I do about fish?"

"Having this report will be really good," said Walter Willett, a professor of epidemiology and nutrition at the Harvard School of Public Health, who was not a co-author of either study.

Environmental groups echoed that assessment.

"Overall, they are reasonable recommendations," said Rebecca Goldburg, a senior scientist with the nonprofit advocacy group Environmental Defense who reviewed the IOM report before its release.

But Goldburg and others also raised concerns about the impact the findings could have on marine life if people worldwide try to dine on seafood twice a week, because there isn't enough to go around. Goldburg, who regularly serves her own family seafood, urged consumers to make smart choices "that are good for their health as well as for the oceans. If we want fish to be abundant, choose seafood that is farmed or fished in an environmentally responsible manner."

Although the new findings may help to settle the question of the risks of eating seafood, there is still disagreement about the extent of the health benefits. A study published earlier this year in the British Medical Journal found no overall reduction in mortality, no decrease in heart disease risk and no reduction in cancer from consuming omega-3 fatty acids.

Goldburg said, "I feel quite comfortable with the evidence that seafood is good for you but am a little taken aback by the conclusion that the benefits are as sweeping as in the JAMA study."

Other recent studies have hinted that omega-3 fatty acids may also help protect against diabetes and cancer, slow the progression of early Alzheimer's disease, and perhaps ameliorate depression and other mental disorders, including attention-deficit disorder in children. But the IOM report found that the evidence of those benefits is unclear, and the Harvard study did not address those questions.

Both reports found little evidence to fuel concerns that eating fish exposes people to large amounts of dioxins, polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) and other harmful organic chemicals that have been linked to seafood consumption.

Experts hope that the findings will end the confusion that often occurs at seafood counters and in restaurants.

"Consumers need better guidance on making seafood choices," said Malden C. Nesheim, chair of the committee that wrote the IOM report, which was sponsored by the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

The findings of both reports are consistent with current recommendations of the U.S. Dietary Guidelines and the American Heart Association, which advise eating two meals -- roughly three ounces per serving -- of seafood per week.

DOJ_NMG_0082653

By simply substituting broiled, steamed or baked seafood -- especially fatty species such as salmon -- for meat or poultry a couple of times per week, consumers can increase their intake of omega-3s and help reduce the amount of unhealthful saturated and trans fat they eat.

People need "a quarter-gram per day on average [of omega 3s], so one to two servings of cod per week will not get you there," said Dariush Mozaffarian, a Harvard cardiologist and co-author of the JAMA study. "On the other hand, one to two servings per day of farm-raised salmon will."

Large, federally funded nutritional surveys suggest that most people do not get enough omega 3s.

"About 75 percent of women of childbearing age and about 85 percent of pregnant women consume less than six ounces of seafood per week," noted Mozaffarian. Omega 3s cross the placenta and help build developing brains in fetuses and in infants during the first months of life.

"That certainly is one of the benefits," said David C. Bellinger, a professor of neurology at the Harvard School of Public Health and a member of the IOM committee.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Faults FBI Sentinel Staffing Process (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, October 18, 2006

The FBI is moving quickly to staff its six-year, $425 million Sentinel program, which will replace the agency's failed Virtual Case File project and antiquated intelligence analysis and investigative case management systems, according to a new Government Accountability Office report prepared for the House Judiciary Committee.

But the report states that the Sentinel staffing process is focusing only on the program office's immediate staffing needs and not on the "kind of strategic human capital management that GAO's research and evaluations have shown to be essential to the success of any organizational entity."

Specifically, GAO found that the FBI staffing plan "was not derived using a documented data-driven methodology and does not provide for inventorying the knowledge and skills of existing staff."

Sentinel has not looked ahead to future staffing needs, analyzed gaps between current employees and future workforce needs, or formulated a strategy for filling those expected gaps, the report states.

GAO warned that "unless the FBI adopts a more strategic approach to managing human capital for the Sentinel program and treats human capital as a program risk, the chances of delivering required intelligence and investigative support capabilities in a timely and cost-effective manner are reduced."

GAO has recommended that the FBI establish policies and procedures for strategically managing IT programs' workforce needs and treating and managing the Sentinel vacancies as a program risk.

According to the report, the FBI has agreed with the recommendations and is taking steps to correct the program.

Awards recognize N.Y., Texas info-sharing programs

The Texas Department of State Health Services won for a system aimed at preventing drug abuse, and New York won for a system that enables statewide distribution of information on potential hazards.

Florida county chooses Oracle ERP system

Polk Oracle Web Enabled Resources automates business processes such as financial management, procurement and payroll management.

Agencies struggle to defend IT spending

Most departments and agencies justify a majority of their IT investments, but DHS, the VA and the Army Corps of Engineers could defend less than half of theirs, according to a report.

Agencies struggle to defend IT spending

Most departments and agencies justify a majority of their IT investments, but DHS, the VA and the Army Corps of Engineers could defend less than half of theirs, according to a report.

DISPENSARY DIRECTOR GRANTED RELEASE ON $1 MILLION BOND (BCNW)

Bay City News Wire, October 17, 2006

A medical marijuana dispensary director who is accused of marijuana cultivation and money laundering was granted release on $1 million bond by a federal magistrate in San Francisco today.

Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative in San Francisco, is one of 15 people arrested in a sweep by federal agents on Oct. 3.

The agents also seized nearly 13,000 plants, a Porsche car belonging to Rose and $125,000 in raids of the dispensary, related offices in Oakland and San Francisco and two San Francisco warehouses where marijuana was allegedly cultivated.

All 15 defendants are charged in a federal criminal complaint with marijuana manufacture and distribution and Rose is additionally charged with money laundering.

U.S. Magistrate Nandor Vadas granted the bail release for Rose after prosecution and defense lawyers told him they had agreed on the $1 million amount.

The bond will be made up of $200,000 in equity from the Maryland house of Rose's mother and stepfather, plus individual surety bonds signed by Rose's ex-wife and two friends.

Defense attorney Nanci Clarence said it would take a day or two to complete the arrangements for the bond.

Clarence told the magistrate that prosecutors have informed her that an indictment in the case is expected to come from a federal grand jury in Los Angeles rather than San Francisco.

Through his attorney, Rose agreed to delay further proceedings until next month while the indictment is awaited. Vadas scheduled a status conference before a magistrate in San Francisco on Nov. 14.

Clarence said outside of court that Rose operated the medical marijuana dispensary "in a very businesslike way" and that Rose "exemplifies the notion of a responsible dispensary."

The cooperative was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers Inc. and at one time operated dispensaries in Oakland, Los Angeles and several other cities.

Although a California law approved by voters in 1996, the Compassionate Use Act, allows seriously ill patients to use medical marijuana, federal drug laws make no exception for the state law.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration regional chief Frederico Pena said after the Oct. 3 arrests that anyone who breaks the federal laws to run an allegedly lucrative drug trade "is not compassionate, they're criminal."

An affidavit filed in the case by a DEA agent alleges that cash deposits to a New Remedies Cooperative bank account in Hercules amounted to more than $2.3 million between December 2005 and July 2006.

The affidavit said the money was used to pay employees of the cooperative, including $331,000 paid directly to Rose during that period.

Marijuana Club Director Released On Bail (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 17, 2006

(10-17) 15:03 PDT -- A federal magistrate today approved a $1 million bail release for the head of a Bay Area medical marijuana club that was raided two weeks ago by federal agents. Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative, was one of 15 people arrested during the Oct. 3 sweep of eight sites and the only one still in jail. He is charged with conspiracy to grow and distribute marijuana and with money laundering.

Today, Rose was granted bail by U.S. Magistrate Nandor Vardas with the approval of federal prosecutors.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents seized nearly 13,000 marijuana plants, $125,000 and four vehicles, including Rose's leased Porsche, at a dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District and other sites in San Francisco and Oakland.

The raid was one of a recent series of enforcement actions by federal authorities against medical marijuana clubs and suppliers in California, where voters passed an initiative in 1996 allowing patients to use the drug with a doctor's recommendation. Federal drug law prohibits marijuana possession and cultivation, classifies it with the most dangerous drugs and recognizes no legitimate use.

DOJ_NMG_0082655

The case originated in the Los Angeles area, where a related organization, Compassionate Caregivers, was raided last year by federal agents, prosecutors said in court filings.

Rose worked for years in Web site design and marketing, fell victim to a downturn in the Internet business and took a job with Compassionate Caregivers in San Francisco in 2003, his lawyer, Nanci Clarence, said in court papers. The local organization was renamed New Remedies last year.

Clarence disputed an Oct. 3 assertion by Javier Pena, regional director of the DEA, that Rose and his fellow defendants were "using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars" under the guise of serving medical patients.

"This was not a sham," Clarence said today. "This was run in a transparent way. He filed tax returns, he paid estimated quarterly taxes, he paid workers' comp and health insurance and he ran it like a business, just the way local authorities and state authorities have asked him to.

"This is a clash between state and federal governments, and on some level a culture war."

Drug Probe Nets Eighth Guilty Plea (SSJR)

Springfield State Journal Register, October 17, 2006

A man federal prosecutors say was at the center of a high-profile drug investigation last fall pleaded guilty Monday to drug charges and agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties in Springfield and Taylorville.

Danny J. Sidener Jr., 27, of the 900 block of West Waco Street in Taylorville pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Jeanne Scott to conspiracy to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine, distribution of 500 grams or more of cocaine, use of a telephone to facilitate a drug offense and possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug-trafficking crime.

He faces a minimum of 15 years in prison when sentenced Feb. 26.

Sidener, represented by Springfield attorney Jeff Page, also agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties he bought with proceeds from the crimes at 905 W. Waco St. and 816 W. Franklin St., both in Taylorville; and 610 S. Illinois St., 2307 S. 12th St. and 2315, 2319 and 2323 S. Sixth St., all in Springfield.

Scott said she understood that a third party may have a claim on the South 12th Street property and could object to the forfeiture.

Sidener is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with the case, which began with indictments last fall.

The mandatory minimum sentence for the drug conspiracy count is 10 years to life in prison. Being in possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug crime is a minimum five-year sentence that must be served consecutively to any other sentence he receives.

Assistant U.S. attorney John Childress said that between Jan. 4, 2004, and Oct. 28, 2005, Sidener conspired with Michael Mohan, Peter Sidener, Earl Sidener and others to distribute powder cocaine in central Illinois.

Childress said Danny Sidener obtained more than five kilograms of cocaine and "fronted" it to the others, who then could resell it or front it (advance on credit) to other resellers.

Sidener also admitted that on Oct. 28 he used a cell phone to set up a delivery to Mohan at the latter's home in the 1200 block of Leland Avenue, then delivered 1,500 grams of cocaine.

Law enforcement officers obtained a search warrant and found the cocaine, Childress said. They also searched Sidener's car and found a 9mm Ruger and 16 rounds of ammunition. Sidener allegedly told officers he carried the gun to protect himself from other drug dealers.

On Oct. 28, agents were watching Danny Sidener as he drove up to Mohan's home to make the cocaine delivery.

Someone overheard on a police scanner mention of Mohan's address and alerted Sidener, who fled.

He crashed his car into an Illinois state trooper's, police said, and prosecutors are seeking $2,945 in restitution for the collision damage. Sidener disputed that claim in court Monday, and the issue probably will be taken up at sentencing.

The government, in a separate civil forfeiture action, also is seeking to confiscate about $52,500 in alleged drug money from one of Sidener's bank accounts and almost $9,000 from another.

Court documents filed last month indicate that Springfield police were first notified in mid-1999 that Sidener was delivering large amounts of marijuana and cocaine in the Springfield area.

Between 2000 and 2004, agents learned Sidener allegedly received large amounts of cocaine from a supplier in Chicago and would then redistribute it to other dealers in the Springfield area. He received between five and 10 kilos of the drug each time, the documents say.

They also indicate that on Oct. 28, the day Sidener was taken into custody, he told police he had retrieved $42,000 from a storage unit and purchased two kilos of cocaine from his source.

Sidener allegedly told authorities that he began to buy cocaine in Chicago in 1999 or 2000, and that in 2003, he stepped up his purchasing to two or three times a month and bought another 60 pounds of marijuana every other month from a Chicago source.

Sidener asked Scott how far back his relevant conduct - uncharged misconduct that the government must sufficiently link to the current charges - might count against him at sentencing.

Scott said conduct "a couple of years" in the past might be considered "if the government links it up properly."

The court documents said Sidener told police he had not had a job for several years, but that he bought houses, fixed them up and resold them. He also said he owns rental property.

One of Sidener's alleged co-conspirators told authorities he'd known Sidener nearly all his life and that Sidener's last legitimate job was in high school, when he worked at Domino's Pizza.

Since last October, eight others have been charged in related cases with conspiring to distribute cocaine in Springfield and central Illinois.

Seven who previously pleaded guilty are scheduled for sentencing on the following dates: Adam Martin, 28, of the 2200 block of Lindbergh Drive, Nov. 27; Dondi D. McIntosh, 33, of the 2100 block of Peoria Road, Dec. 11; William W. Thomas, 28, of the 1200 block of West Edwards Street, Nov. 6; Michael D. Mohan, 28, of the 1200 block of Leland Avenue, Nov. 20; Gerald M. Vondebur 41, of the 2100 block of Fairway Drive, Dec. 11; Jerrad A. Pruitt, 27, of the 4000 block of Hazelcrest Road, Dec. 18; and Earl V. Sidener, 27, of the 1100 block of North Virginia Street, Jan. 8.

Peter Sidener, 39, of the 300 block of Cranmer Drive is scheduled for a final pretrial conference Nov. 20 and a trial Dec. 5.

The charges are the result of an Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Springfield Police Department, Illinois State Police and the Central Illinois Enforcement Group.

Federal authorities announced in August that the cocaine investigation was complete after nine indictments. However, federal officials also forwarded the names of six other people to the Sangamon County state's attorney's office for possible prosecution. Because five of the six have connections to county government or law enforcement, the state's attorney's office then referred the cases to the state appellate prosecutor's office to determine whether charges should be filed.

The six are Sangamon County Clerk Joe Aiello, former assistant state's attorneys John "Jake" Kelley and Dan Mills, former public defender John A. Maurer, former federal probation officer Kevin Kelly and former bank loan officer Blair Fein.

Nevadans To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana (AP)

By Sandra Chereb

AP, October 18, 2006

RENO, Nev. - Gambling, prostitution, and now pot? Organizers of a Nevada ballot measure hope voters in a state where almost everything goes will go one better and legalize marijuana.

If it passes Nov. 7, Nevada will be the first state to allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops.

The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, which has pushed medical marijuana and decriminalization laws around the country, thinks Nevada - with its embrace of certain vices and its streak of Western independence - is a perfect venue.

In an editorial last spring, the rural Lahontan Valley News argued that gambling, Nevada's most powerful industry, caters to "visceral pleasures," and that it would hypocritical to oppose the legalization of marijuana on moral grounds.

Proponents of the measure also argue that the legal system wastes time and money on low-level marijuana offenses, and that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement to focus on violent crime and more dangerous drugs such as methamphetamine.

DOJ_NMG_0082657

"Put it into a tightly controlled and regulated environment. We think that makes a lot of sense," Neal Levine, executive director of the committee.

Opponents, including law enforcement, the nation's drug czar, and civic and business groups, argue the measure would encourage the use of other drugs, and they question whether it will even prove to be a good source of tax revenue.

"The fact is, growing, distributing and warehousing marijuana will still be a federal offense," said Todd Raybuck, a Las Vegas police officer and spokesman for the Committee to Keep Nevada Respectable, which opposes the measure.

Question 7 allows people 21 and older to possess an ounce of marijuana in their homes - the same amount allowed under Nevada's medical marijuana law. Currently, possession of an ounce or less is a misdemeanor punishable by a $600 fine.

Twelve states have decriminalized small amounts of marijuana - that is, possession is punishable by a ticket and a fine - and 11 allow its use for medical purposes. Possession of up to an ounce at home is legal in Alaska under a court ruling there, but the case is under appeal.

Colorado residents will vote next month on whether to legalize possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by those 21 and older, similar to an ordinance Denver voters approved last year.

But the Nevada measure goes further. It directs Nevada's Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate marijuana growers, distributors and retailers. At the same time, it doubles penalties for selling or giving pot to minors and for vehicular manslaughter while under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

The legislation also imposes a $45-per-ounce excise tax, with some of the proceeds going toward the budget and alcohol, tobacco and drug abuse programs. An ounce of pot on the street costs upwards of $300, depending on the quality.

A 2002 study by researchers at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas estimated taxing and regulating marijuana would generate $28.6 million in revenue.

The Justice Department in Washington did not respond to calls and e-mails seeking comment. In June, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled people who smoke marijuana for medical reasons can be prosecuted under federal drug laws, and Raybuck said it is doubtful federal agents would tolerate commercial pot ventures in Nevada.

In 2002, Nevada voters overwhelmingly rejected a move to legalize up to three ounces of marijuana. The latest measure got onto the ballot after 86,000 people signed petitions.

A poll conducted in September for the Las Vegas Review-Journal found 51 percent of voters opposed Question 7, while 42 percent supported it and 7 percent were undecided.

The measure has found some surprising allies.

"Make no mistake, I don't think using marijuana is a wise choice for anyone," said the Rev. William C. Webb, a Baptist minister who joined dozens of other religious leaders in announcing their backing. But "if there has to be a market in marijuana, I'd rather it be regulated with sensible safeguards than run by violent gangs and dangerous drug dealers."

U.S. Official Says Rise In Afghan Opium Production Leading To Purer Heroin In Europe (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

MADRID, Spain Skyrocketing opium production in Afghanistan has led to increasingly pure heroin being sold in Europe and prices could fall if the trend continues, a senior U.S. anti-narcotics official said Tuesday.

Thomas Schweich, principal U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics, issued the warning after the United Nations reported last month that Afghanistan's opium production for 2006 increased 49 percent from last year, exceeding the demands of the world's heroin users by a third.

"We're already noticing on the streets of Europe much more pure opium and that's going to lead to more deaths and more health problems," Schweich said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"The other thing is for the price to go down, which hasn't happened yet," Schweich said, noting that an increase in supply often drives prices down.

Afghanistan produces more than 90 percent of the world's opium and heroin, and the drug trade has had a corrosive effect on President Hamid Karzai's struggling post-Taliban government.

DOJ_NMG_0082658

The booming trade accounts for at least 35 percent of Afghanistan's economy, financing warlords and Taliban insurgents alike.

Despite the strong increase in Afghanistan's opium production for 2006, the Afghan and U.S. governments have no plans to change counter-narcotics strategy in the region, Schweich said.

"When the U.N. came out with those statistics, that's for planting that occurred the previous fall," said Schweich, who met with Afghan government officials in Kabul last month. "They really reflect the relatively ineffective delivery of the program in its very first year."

In the coming year, the two governments will continue a public information campaign that presents farmers with alternatives to growing opium, Schweich said.

Such alternatives, which include growing wheat or fruit trees or raising livestock, are substantially less lucrative and can be unattractive to farmers struggling to survive in a country where more than half of the population lives below the poverty line and 40 percent is unemployed.

In addition to the public information campaign, the Afghan government is to step up opium crop eradication efforts and the prosecution of drug growers and traders, Schweich said.

"With serious drug problems it does take time," he said. "I'm hoping we don't have to wait 10 years to see improvement."

Afghanistan's Opium Production Soaring 'out Of Control,' U.N. Agency Warns (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

VIENNA, Austria Afghanistan's opium production has soared "out of control," the U.N. drugs and crime agency warned Tuesday, adding that proceeds from the opium harvest were being used to fund the resurgent Taliban.

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime is calling on NATO and Afghan troops to attack heroin labs, opium bazzars and convoys transporting the narcotic, said Preeta Bannerjee, a spokeswoman for the agency.

Opium production in Afghanistan rose 59 percent in 2006 to a record 165,000 hectares (408,000 acres) — representing 92 percent of the world's opium, according to U.N. figures.

"You can say that Afghanistan is pretty much out of control," Bannerjee said.

In contrast, opium poppy cultivation in Southeast Asia's 'Golden Triangle' — Laos, Myanmar, and Thailand — declined by 29 percent this year 24,160 hectares (59,700 acres) Bannerjee said. She credited combined efforts by U.N. organizations and aid agencies for helping farmers find alternative crops for reducing production levels by 85 percent since 1998.

"Afghanistan is practically ... supplying the world's opium," Bannerjee said. "There's also evidence that the country is increasingly hooked on its own opium."

The agency has said that about 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than US$3 billion (€2.4 billion).

Local farmers sell their crops to the Taliban, who resell them and use the revenues to fund themselves, Banerjee said. Since producers are subsistence farmers, it remains a question of giving the farmer a sustainable alternative, she said.

Opium Production Down In Golden Triangle (UPI)

UPI, October 17, 2006

VIENNA, (UPI) -- Opium poppy cultivation in Laos, Myanmar and Thailand, the Golden Triangle, dropped 29 percent last year, the U.N. drug agency reported Monday.

The region is the world's second-largest source of opium, although it is now dwarfed by Afghanistan, the Office on Drugs and Crime report said. Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa said Afghanistan will soon be the only source if the trend continues.

"This is a remarkable success in the reduction of illicit crops, which is so far unmatched anywhere in the world," Costa said. "It represents an important step towards the goal of eliminating the cultivation of illicit crops worldwide."

The number of acres devoted to poppy cultivation in Thailand and Laos actually increased slightly but starting from a very low base. That increase was more than outweighed by a sharp drop in poppy cultivation in Myanmar, the country formerly known a Burma.

DOJ_NMG_0082659

In 1998, about 33 percent of the world's opium came from the Golden Triangle, a figure that has dipped to less than 5 percent.

UN Drug Agency Reports Sharp Fall In Golden Triangle Opium Production (VOA)

Voice of America, October 18, 2006

The United Nations' drug agency says there has been another sharp fall in opium cultivation in the area of Southeast Asia known as the Golden Triangle, where Burma, Thailand and Laos meet. But, U.N. officials are now concerned about the increased use of methamphetamine-type stimulants across the region.

Photo: Scott Bobb (VOA)The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime - the UNODC - says its annual survey of opium production in the Golden Triangle region shows poppy cultivation there fell by 29 percent this year.

Burma, the main poppy growing country of the region, reported a more than 30 percent decline in areas under cultivation from the previous year.

Burma is the second largest opium grower globally after Afghanistan, which accounts for more than 90 percent of the world's supply of heroin.

Burma's northern Shan State produces 90 percent of the country's opium. The ethnic Wa community there declared a total ban on opium cultivation and trade last year.

The decrease in Burmese production means that a plan to eradicate opium in the Golden Triangle by 2014 remains on target. The region's share of world poppy cultivation dropped from 66 percent in 1998 to 12 percent last year.

But Leik Boonwaat, the UNODC Representative in Laos, said recently there is still a need for international support for development programs to assist opium growers to move toward alternative crops.

He said, "There is a need to provide the relief to former opium farmers, in order to enable them to adapt to new alternative livelihoods or new ways of life, and it's also important to enable the national poverty reduction programs to be able to incorporate all these areas."

The UNODC report says the two other countries in the Golden Triangle, Thailand and Laos, are almost opium free.

But the gains from the decrease in opium cultivation are being offset by a rise in methamphetamine and ecstasy abuse in Southeast Asia. A recent report by the UNODC found that methamphetamine is a concern across the region.

The UNODC's Leik says, in Laos, methamphetamine is a particular problem among young people.

"For methamphetamine in Laos, it's mostly targeting the youth - school children. We have children as young as 12 that are addicted, and this is causing great concern. We see it in the schools, we're seeing it in urban areas, we're seeing it in rural areas," he said.

Factories producing methamphetamine-type stimulants are found along the Burma-Thailand border, with millions of tablets finding their way onto the Thai market each year.

Drugs Group In Afghan Exit Order (BBC)

BBC News, October 18, 2006

Poppies grow in most Afghan provinces The Afghan government has ordered the closure of all offices of a group that wants to promote new ways of dealing with the global drugs problem.

The Interior Ministry said the Senlis Council, had been "confusing farmers" and had been a factor in the increase in poppy cultivation.

Senlis has suggested the legal use of Afghan opium for medical purposes.

A spokesman for Senlis said it had not received any formal notification that its offices were to be closed.

He denied its activities had increased poppy cultivation.

Correspondents say there has been tension over a recent council report blaming the government for a failure to stop farmers growing poppies.

Afghanistan is building a new counter-narcotics police force but reports say the force only has personnel in nine of 34 provinces.

Only six provinces are reported to be opium-free.

DOJ_NMG_0082660

Review: Prisoner Flights Are Expensive (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

Pricey contracts and empty seats plague government flights that move U.S. prisoners to new jails and deport illegal immigrants, a Justice Department review concluded Tuesday.

Additionally, the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transport System does not always have large enough crews to subdue onboard security threats, Justice Department Inspector General Glen A. Fine found.

"Given the variety of transportation needs and the nature of the individuals being transported, inherent risks exist in managing a transportation system like JPATS," Fine concluded, using the acronym for the air transit system.

The U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement use and pay for the flights. More than 305,000 prisoners and illegal aliens flew on them last year, costing an estimated $87 million.

The program makes sure prisoners and illegal immigrants make their court appointments, are transferred efficiently and are deported quickly.

But the review found several flaws, including that:

_The government pays far more to lease large jets under multiple-year contracts than it would by buying the aircraft outright. For example, the 30-year cost of leasing a used Boeing 737 jet would come to $840 million, compared to buying a new one for $540 million.

_Poor planning led to empty seats on the flights, some of which were only half-full during an audit between 2004 and the last three months of 2005.

_Only 13 percent of 1,028 flights audited had a larger security crew aboard than required. The review did not disclose the required crew-to-passenger ratio, but inspectors said the shortage exposes the flights "to potential security threats when transporting prisoners or aliens."

The flights program is managed by the U.S. Marshals Service. In a Sept. 6 letter responding to a draft of the review, Marshals Director John F. Clark agreed with all 15 of Fine's recommendations for improvement.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department Office of Inspector General: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/index.html

Audit Faults 'Con Air' On Safety (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

A government-operated service that transports prisoners and aliens in federal custody throughout the United States, Central America and the Caribbean does not have the means to ensure that safety procedures are being followed and lacks the ability to predict long-term capacity needs, according to a report released yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS), run by the U.S. Marshals Service and known to many as "Con Air," also needs to reduce costs by maximizing the number of passengers scheduled for each flight.

"The overall demand for prisoner and alien transportation has grown over the past six years, but our audit found that JPATS has not yet developed a planning tool that allows it to project prisoner and alien movements more than one year into the future," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said.

"This lack of capacity planning has led to underutilization of available seats on JPATS aircraft because JPATS has not amended its flight schedules to maintain a more optimal use of its resources," Mr. Fine said.

JPATS uses three government-owned and six leased aircraft to move prisoners and aliens for the Marshals Service, the Federal Bureau of Prisons and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. In addition, it transports prisoners for military, state and local law-enforcement agencies as needed.

DOJ_NMG_0082661

In fiscal 2005, JPATS transported 305,649 prisoners for a wide array of judicial proceedings, such as the removal of deportable aliens -- including those who committed crimes in the United States. Many of its planes were acquired through government surplus programs or asset forfeiture. They represent the only government-operated, regularly scheduled passenger airline in the nation.

The inspector general's audit said a review of data on 1,034 flights from fiscal 2004 to the first quarter of fiscal 2006 found that although 74 percent of the seats were filled on flights originating from one of the three hubs reviewed, fewer than half of the seats were filled on flights originating from the remaining hubs.

The report also said JPATS has been using short-term leases for its large aircraft since early 2005, despite studies by the Government Accountability Office and the Office of the Federal Detention Trustee that said purchasing the aircraft or entering into long-term leases could cut costs.

Although the audit said JPATS had developed adequate internal policies to ensure that it conducts its air transportation in a safe and secure manner, it added that JPATS "generally does not have the necessary systems in place to ensure that it adheres to its own standards on safety and security."

The audit listed 15 recommendations to help manage the JPATS program. Officials at JPATS agreed with the recommendations and are in the process of implementing them.

Activists' Passion Turns To Violence (SEAPI)

By Phuong Cat Le, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 18, 2006

One worked with the nation's top atmospheric scientists; the other was an aspiring journalist. Now they both face years in prison for the ELF arson fire at a UW research facility

Jennifer Kolar and Lacey Phillabaum seem unlikely criminals.

Well-educated young women passionate about environmental causes, they share a love of the outdoors and similar backgrounds. Both grew up in Spokane and attended the same public high school.

Those who know Phillabaum call her bright, outspoken, sometimes in-your-face but never dull. She was a skilled debater in high school and college and once worked for a well-regarded non-profit that promotes sustainable agriculture.

Kolar

Kolar studied under one of the nation's top atmospheric scientists while pursuing a doctoral degree and had the makings of a good scientist, her adviser said, but her heart seemed elsewhere.

The women were concerned about what was going on around them -- the logging of old-growth forests, the slaughter of animals for sport. Like many Northwest activists, they pushed for change.

Phillabaum

But their activism morphed into something more dangerous -- and now both are headed to prison.

Before dawn on May 21, 2001, Kolar cut the glass that allowed fellow Earth Liberation Front members to sneak into the University of Washington office of professor Toby Bradshaw, who was studying the genetics of fast-growing hybrid poplar trees. Phillabaum's role is still unclear, but she was also on the scene, court documents show.

Bradshaw and other researchers at the UW Center for Urban Horticulture would be arriving within hours, so the ELF squad must have worked quickly to plant the firebombs -- plastic buckets of fuel rigged with cheap digital timers, assembled in someone's garage. Their goal: destroy the research on genetic engineering of poplars to avert an "ecological nightmare" for native forests.

The fire ignited in Bradshaw's office spread through the building and raged for hours. Rare books, endangered plants and decades of botanical research went up in flames, causing $7 million in damage.

By then, Kolar, Phillabaum and the three others involved in the arson had disappeared.

At the UW, researchers tried to salvage their work. A new facility was built. But the trail to the perpetrators seemed to peter out. For nearly five years, the crime went unsolved.

While investigators searched for clues, Kolar and Phillabaum didn't go into hiding.

DOJ_NMG_0082662

Kolar bought a two-story house in Wallingford, raced in local regattas and was active in a Seattle yacht club. Phillabaum pursued a career as a journalist, freelanced articles and sought mentoring from a professional journalism group. Others involved in the arsons also went on to do other things.

"The series of arsons stopped in 2001, and since then many of the people implicated in those have gone on to lead lives in the mainstream society," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman in Seattle.

But investigators eventually closed in.

In December, federal agents arrested many of those believed responsible for a series of arson attacks across five states, including an Oregon poplar farm that had been torched at the same time as the UW center.

Three people were indicted earlier this year: Justin Solondz, 27, formerly of Jefferson County, who is believed to have fled the country; William Rodgers, 40, who committed suicide in an Arizona jail cell weeks after his arrest; and Briana Waters, 30, a Berkeley, Calif., violin teacher who faces trial.

This month, federal prosecutors identified for the first time the two remaining suspects: Kolar, 33, and Phillabaum, 31.

Both women are cooperating with authorities and have admitted to belonging to ELF and participating in the UW firebombing. The FBI has branded ELF an underground radical group and a top domestic terrorism threat.

At their January sentencing in Seattle, Kolar faces between five and seven years in prison; Phillabaum faces three to five. Defense attorney Gilbert Levy declined a request to interview his client, Phillabaum. Kolar declined comment through her attorney, Michael Martin.

"Paradoxes and ironies abound here, and they're all wedded to a tragedy," said David Frank, a University of Oregon professor who knew Phillabaum when she was in his debate program.

"How could such bright, articulate, well-meaning people ... how could they have been tempted by violence?"

From sit-ins to firebombs

Phillabaum was socially conscious even as a teenager at Shadle Park High School, former school officials say. She grew up in Deer Park, and her parents were partners in a Spokane law firm. In high school, she was voted "Teacher's Pet" in her senior year and won debate contests.

"She had a strong mind of her own," said Emmett Arndt, a former assistant principal at Shadle Park.

At the University of Oregon, Phillabaum studied art history and graduated in three years. She continued to debate in college, partly "to learn more about the reasons why the environment was under threat," said Frank, who teaches rhetoric.

The program taught students to use reason, research and persuasion to affect change, but Phillabaum left after a year, feeling frustrated with the lack of action, he said.

Typical of many students, "she found her way into activist groups," he said. "She was surrounded by people who were equally frustrated, equally angry. Out of those conversations came a dedication to more violent actions to achieve their actions."

"She was probably feeling frustrated with the system, with the exploitation of the Earth and species, and not having immediate results with above-ground organizing," said an associate of Phillabaum's, who asked not to be identified.

In college, she worked on Insurgent, a left-leaning campus publication that critiqued foreign policy.

The mid-1990s was the height of protests against logging on public lands, and Phillabaum was in the thick of it. She protested timber harvests in Oregon's Umpqua National Forest and joined others in blocking a logging road to Warner Creek, according to news accounts.

"You couldn't call her commitment into question," said a Eugene, Ore., activist who has known her for a decade.

At a 1997 tree-sit in Eugene, Phillabaum and others tried to save 40 trees from being leveled for a downtown development. Police arrested her and others for criminal trespassing. She was fined $100 and sentenced to three days in jail, according to the Lane County District Attorney's Office.

In other aspects, Phillabaum led a relatively normal life. She had a lot of friends, was well-grounded and came from a loving family, those who know her say. She spent a lot of time in the outdoors -- rafting rivers and hiking mountains.

An aspiring journalist, she also edited Earth First! Journal, which calls itself the voice of the radical environmental movement. In February 2001, she landed a job at In Good Tilth, a newsletter sent out by Oregon Tilth, a non-profit promoting sustainable farming.

DOJ_NMG_0082663

"She was an exemplary employee," said Chris Schreiner, Oregon Tilth's quality-control manager. "She brought a new level of quality and content to the newsletter."

She worked at the newsletter for four years. She also joined the Society of Environmental Journalists and sought mentoring help from veteran reporters, said the group's executive director, Beth Parke.

In 2005, Phillabaum moved to Charlottesville, Va., to take a writing job at the C-VILLE Weekly. The alternative paper fired her after three months, said editor Cathy Harding, who declined to say why.

Phillabaum's double life was quickly catching up to her.

In December 2005, federal agents arrested Stanislas Meyerhoff, 29, of Charlottesville, who they accused of masterminding the UW and Oregon tree farm firebombings. At the time, Meyerhoff was Phillabaum's boyfriend, a Charlottesville newspaper reported. Meyerhoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy and arson charges in July.

Phillabaum's role in the UW arson would soon be revealed, as would Kolar's.

'It's a puzzle'

It's not clear whether Phillabaum and Kolar knew each other at Shadle Park, but they overlapped at the school, located in a middle-class neighborhood of north Spokane.

Kolar graduated two years before Phillabaum and went on to the University of Colorado in Boulder. She majored in applied mathematics and later earned a master's degree in astrophysical, planetary and atmospheric sciences, according to the school.

"I never thought that atmospheric sciences was her passion, or something that was her lifelong ambition," said Merritt Deeter, an atmospheric scientist who shared an office with Kolar when both were grad students. "She kind of prided herself on her activist nature."

Kolar was bright and skilled but distracted, said her doctoral adviser, Peter Webster, now a professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

"If she had applied her passions to science, she would have been a good scientist, but she had other things that were much more important to her," Webster said.

She was passionate about animal rights and often protested against animals being hunted for sport, Webster said. "It's not the least bit surprising to me that she carried her passions that far."

In grad school, Kolar volunteered for such groups as Rocky Mountain Animal Defense. She tried to stop the Denver Zoo from allegedly sending surplus animals to hunting ranches, said David Crawford, the group's founder.

He stressed that his group doesn't condone violence and that she left in 1996.

In July 1997, Kolar allegedly took part in an arson that destroyed a horse slaughterhouse in Redmond, Ore.

She's expected to admit her role in that crime, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Peifer in Portland. She also has pleaded guilty to attempting to firebomb a Colorado gun club that organized turkey shoots in 1998.

Kolar settled in Seattle several years ago. She bought a house in Wallingford a year after the UW arson, joined the Corinthian Yacht Club in Seattle and competed in Puget Sound regattas. Her profile on that club's Web site noted that she loved the outdoors and co-owned the Manta Ray, a 30-foot performance sailboat.

Kolar was a crew member on a boat that recently won at the Swiftsure Lightship Classic, said the skipper, Alex Wigley.

"It's a puzzle. It just blindsided me," said Wigley, who described Kolar as capable, funny and intelligent.

"This whole event has made me wonder how well I know anyone."

P-I reporter Phuong Cat Le can be reached at 206-448-8390 or phuongle@seattlepi.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Border-fence Bill Awaits Signing (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082664

The White House is pleading with Congress to send over the bill authorizing 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border so the president can sign it immediately, but Republican leaders on Capitol Hill want to wait until closer to the election and to have a public signing ceremony.

"Send us the damn bill. We'd like to autograph it," said a senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to allow for more freedom to discuss politics and policy.

"Our object was to sign it last week so we can have port security and border security together and herald an effort to control all of the borders of the United States. We even had ways to talk about what we were doing at the airports," the official said.

Congressional Republicans, though, are convinced the issue is a political winner and want to hold onto the bill so it will be signed closer to next month's congressional elections. Once the bill is sent to the president, he has a limited amount of time to sign it before it dies as a pocket veto.

"It's a timing issue: We want it signed closer to the election when folks are paying attention and those who want to take advantage of the messaging opportunity can do so, and the White House is aware of this," said an aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. House Republican leadership aides confirmed that strategy.

Mr. Bush has already signed a spending bill with money for some fencing, but has yet to sign the bill actually authorizing the double-wall fence along nearly 700 miles of the border. Congress passed both bills in the waning days of the legislative session last month.

Many blogs from across the political spectrum have speculated he is trying to scuttle the bill with a pocket veto, but Mr. Bush has said he will sign it, though in private, without a signing ceremony.

Congressional Republicans said that is a bad move at a critical political time.

"A public signing ceremony with the maximum amount of fanfare in a high-profile place would be the best thing the president could do to help out Republicans who are having trouble in their re-elections," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, adding that such a ceremony would go a long way to counteract cynicism from voters who question the White House's commitment to border security.

"People think we're not going to get it done," he said.

The bill's actual status is somewhat murky. Calls to the House clerk's office were referred to the House Administration Committee, and a spokeswoman was not able to say where the bill was.

Mr. King said he has assigned his staff to track down the bill because he, too, wants to know where it stands.

The Bush administration official said the bill's status has been explained several times, but "I for the life of me could not explain it to you."

The official rejected a signing ceremony, and said the White House doesn't want voters to expect too much out of the wall.

"We've got to be careful," the official said. "We are doing a lot on the border, and we cannot raise expectations that this bill of 700 miles of fence is going to happen immediately."

The official said the Department of Homeland Security doubts the value of 700 miles of fencing, instead saying that between 316 miles and 377 miles makes the most sense.

"You talk to the members of Congress about the 700 miles, and there's not a single member who can give you a plausible explanation of how they arrived at 700 miles," the official said. "We'll build every mile of fence that is useful and necessary to build, and if they tell us to build 700, we'll find a way to build 700 miles of fence, but let's not kid ourselves."

The official also said those members of Congress who want to tout their support for the fence are already doing it.

"Every place where they voted for it, they're out there talking about it. Anybody who thinks a one-day signing ceremony is the end-all, be-all, ought to be up talking to the congressional leadership telling them to send us the damn bill so we can sign it," the official said.

Part of the White House's aversion to fanfare may be the context of the broader immigration debate.

Mr. Bush had fought for a bill that would include a guest-worker program for future foreign workers and citizenship rights for most of the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens already in the country.

But House Republicans insisted on passing border-enforcement legislation first, and, after initially supporting a broader bill, Mr. Frist agreed to bring the bill up on the Senate floor, where it passed overwhelmingly.

DOJ_NMG_0082665

Mr. King said that if Mr. Bush doesn't have a public ceremony for the bill, "there's something substituting at the White House for good political judgment."

There has been a marked difference in how Republicans have handled the issue during this year's campaign. While Mr. Bush never mentions the issue on the campaign trail, Republican candidates use it in districts and states across the nation.

"When the border-fence bill is finally signed by President Bush, I hope that it is given the pomp and circumstance that it deserves," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, who has helped several Republican candidates campaign on the immigration issue.

He pointed to a report released yesterday by the House Homeland Security Committee that he said showed the Southwest border has become "the entryway for Middle Eastern terrorists, Mexican drug cartels and human smugglers."

Several lobby groups have asked Mr. Bush to veto the bill, including the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Council of La Raza and the Mexican government.

But at a press conference last week, Mr. Bush said he is committed to building the 700 miles of fencing, though he said the Department of Homeland Security will decide where and that he wants sensors and cameras to watch the border.

"We're going to do both," he said. "We're just going to make sure that we build it in a spot where it works."

Smugglers Seen Getting 'Sophisticated, Organized' (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Law-enforcement authorities along the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned and outmanned by drug smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems, a congressional report said yesterday.

"While the United States has taken positive steps to secure its borders, much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, organized and violent criminal network, which seeks to move illegal contraband ... into our country for profit," said the House Homeland Security management, integration and oversight subcommittee report.

The 39-page report said drug-trafficking organizations and alien-smuggling networks are "proliferating and strengthening their control" of key corridors along the nation's Southwest; that Mexican drug cartels wield "substantial control" over the U.S.-Mexico border; and that criminal organizations and networks are "highly sophisticated and organized."

It also found that drug-trafficking cartels, alien-smuggling networks and U.S.-based street gangs, including MS-13, are increasingly coordinating with one another to achieve their objectives, and that federal, state and local law-enforcement report "new and ever-increasing levels of ruthlessness and violence" associated with the gangs.

The report echoes complaints from the Texas Border Sheriffs Coalition, which repeatedly has said the federal government's inability to secure the Southwest border has resulted in a dramatic rise in violence against U.S. authorities and made it easier for terrorists to enter the country.

Texas' Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr. told Congress in March the cartels "have the money, equipment and stamina" to bring increased violence to the border, much of it aimed at law-enforcement authorities.

Sheriff Gonzalez told The Washington Times at the time that the coalition -- which includes all 16 border sheriffs -- was concerned about terrorists using Mexican drug and alien smugglers as cover to cross the border.

Each year, hundreds of illegal aliens from countries known to harbor terrorists or promote terrorism are routinely encountered and apprehended while attempting to enter the U.S. illegally, the House report said.

"The federal government has taken positive steps to secure its borders, but much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, and violent criminal network, which has been successful in smuggling illegal contraband, human or otherwise, into our country," the report said.

"The growth of these criminal groups, along the Southwest border, and the potential for terrorists to exploit the vulnerabilities which they create, represents a real threat to America's national security," it said. "It is imperative that immediate action be taken to enhance security along our nation's Southwest border."

DOJ_NMG_0082666

The report recommended enhancing Border Patrol resources, constructing physical barriers in vulnerable and high-threat areas, and implementing state-of-the-art technology, cameras, sensors, radar, satellites and unmanned aerial vehicles to ensure maximum coverage of the nation's Southwest border.

President Bush on Oct. 4 signed into law a bill that calls for the hiring of 1,500 more Border Patrol agents and an increase in the number of detention beds for apprehended illegal aliens by 6,700. Congress has approved a bill authorizing the construction of 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, which Mr. Bush has promised to sign when it gets to his desk.

Mr. Bush also has called for improving border security with high-tech equipment.

Yesterday's House report also noted that federal law-enforcement authorities estimate that 10 percent to 30 percent of the migrants seeking to illegally enter the United States are apprehended and 10 percent to 20 percent of the drugs bound for this country are seized. It said that in 2005, as many as 4 million to 10 million illegal aliens crossed into the United States; and as much as 5.6 million to 11.2 million pounds of cocaine and 34.3 million to 68.6 million pounds of marijuana entered the United States.

The report also called for an expanded use of the expedited-removal policy; building a secure communications network for Border Patrol and state and local law enforcement; and mandating a comprehensive risk assessment of all Southwest border ports of entry and international land borders to prevent the entry of terrorists and their weapons.

During his testimony before a House Judiciary subcommittee, Sheriff Gonzalez said law-enforcement officers have found many items along the banks of the Rio Grande indicating ties to terrorist organizations. He said Border Patrol agents found a jacket near the border with Arabic military badges, one with an airplane flying over a building and heading toward a tower.

TAX:

Feds Indict Actor Wesley Snipes For Tax Fraud (LAT)

By Lorenza Munoz And Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Wesley Snipes, whose flash and dash style of acting carried him from the streets of the South Bronx to movie stardom, has been indicted on charges of conspiracy and tax fraud, federal officials announced today.

Snipes, 44, was also charged with six counts of failing to file income tax returns. If convicted of all of the charges, he could be sentenced to as much as 16 years in prison.

Snipes' whereabouts could not be determined, said Steve Cole, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office for the Middle District of Florida.

"We made an attempt to contact him through his attorneys and now with the news conference," Cole said in a telephone interview. "Maybe he'll find out from the media and turn himself in."

The indictment is the latest reversal for the star whose diverse career starring in action, comedic and dramatic roles dazzled fans for more than 20 years.

From his success in the 1986 football film "Wildcats" to a drug lord in "New Jack City" to a sports hustler in "White Men Can't Jump" to his superhero turn in the "Blade" movies, Snipes has been a stellar fixture on the screen.

But Snipes' off-screen personal and financial difficulties have mounted in recent years. His Florida mansion was in foreclosure, his former agency sued to collect an overdue debt and an admitted former crack addict took him to court in a paternity case that the star eventually won after reams of bad publicity.

Today's indictment accuses Snipes, formerly of Windermere, Fla., Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., with conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service and presenting a fraudulent claim for payment to the IRS.

According to the indictment released by the Justice Department, Kahn was the founder and leader of American Rights Litigators and its successor, Guiding Light of God Ministries. The businesses sold fraudulent tax schemes, authorities said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0082667

Rosile was identified as a former accountant who continued to work after his CPA licenses were revoked in Ohio and Florida. He allegedly prepared fraudulent tax returns for American Rights Litigators, which charged its members a fee, half of which it allegedly paid to Rosile. In addition, ARL would collect 20% of any refund and half of that went to Rosile.

Snipes, Kahn and Rosile are accused of making it appear that Snipes had no liability for federal income taxes.

According to authorities, the claim is known as an "861 argument," which asserts that U.S. citizens and residents can be taxed only on income derived from certain foreign-based activities and not on income earned within the United States — a position that has been rejected by the courts.

The defendants filed two amended federal income tax returns for Snipes, claiming almost $12 million in refunds from 1996 and 1997 income taxes. The indictment also accuses Snipes of failing to file his 1999 through 2004 federal income tax returns.

"Our system of government depends on citizens paying their fair share of taxes," U.S. Atty. Paul I. Perez of the Middle District of Florida, said in a statement. "Those who intentionally and unlawfully harass the IRS through deceit, trickery and fraud undermine the collection of revenue that is vital to every aspect of the operation of our government."

According to spokesman Cole, the indictments were handed up last week. Authorities contacted Snipes' lawyers on Friday and asked that the actor surrender for arraignment today. The lawyers said that they no longer represented Snipes, Cole said.

Rosile surrendered today, but Kahn was believed to be in Panama, Cole said..

Success came quickly for Snipes. He was a presence as a street thug in Michael Jackson's 1987 "Bad" video and within two years distinguished himself as Willie Mays Hayes in the film "Major League."

The 1991 Spike Lee film "Jungle Fever" made Snipes a star. The story of a doomed interracial romance caught the nation's attention. He was featured in Ebony and landed on the covers of Jet and Newsweek. The Washington Post dubbed him "the most celebrated actor of the season."

By 1993, he was commanding $10 million a picture and a cut of 10% of the project's gross profits.

But his fame did not help him in spring 1991 when LAPD officers, responding to a stolen vehicle report, stopped Snipes and forced him to lie spread-eagle on the pavement with a gun to his head. Snipes was driving a rental car from the set of "The Waterdance," an independent movie he was filming. Someone on the set had mistakenly reported the car stolen.

In August 1993, Snipes was arrested in Hollywood after he got into an accident and paramedics found a concealed 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol on him. He pleaded no contest.

In May 1994, a woman named Loretta Marshall filed suit against Snipes alleging that a year earlier at the Glam Slam Nightclub, Prince's old club in downtown L.A., the actor had spilled a drink on her and then told her, "Smile or I will seduce you and make you smile." He then grabbed Marshall's crotch, according to the suit. The case was settled confidentially.

Two months after that suit was filed, Snipes pleaded no contest to reckless driving in a Florida court after leading police on a 120-mph, 30-mile motorcycle chase before crashing. He was ordered to perform 80 hours of community service, fined $500 and placed on six months' probation.

In 2002, the William Morris Agency took the rare step of filing a claim against the actor, a onetime client, over a $500,000 loan before it was finally repaid. The agency has declined to comment other than to say the matter had been settled.

Actor Snipes Faces Indictment On Tax Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 18, 2006

This is one “bad guy” role that Wesley Snipes doesn't want. In a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday, prosecutors hit Snipes, the prolific actor and movie producer, with eight counts of tax fraud.

According to the indictment, Snipes allegedly not only avoided paying millions in income taxes from 1999 through 2004, but he fraudulently tried to get an $11 million refund for taxes paid in the 1990s.

Prosecutors also filed charges against two Florida men who acted as tax advisers to Snipes, Eddie Ray Kahn and Douglas Rosile.

Snipes, who used to have a residence near Orlando, has starred in nearly 50 movies including White Men Can't Jump, New Jack City and the highly successful Blade series. But he reportedly also has run into a series of financial and legal difficulties. In this case, prosecutors allege that Kahn and Rosile convinced Snipes that under an unusual interpretation of federal law, known as the "861 argument," only income derived from foreign-based activities was taxable. A U.S. court has never supported the argument.

DOJ_NMG_0082668

Kahn founded a group known as American Rights Litigators and Guiding Light of God Ministries. Although GLGM described itself as a "Christian ministry and organization established to assist men and women in their pursuit of truth and freedom as Americans," the government alleges GLGM is a for-profit operation that sells fraudulent tax schemes. According to the indictment, Snipes paid Kahn a consulting fee and paid to become a member of his American Rights Litigators group.

Rosile, an accountant whose CPA licenses to practice in Ohio and Florida were revoked, worked with Kahn to file tax returns for GLGM clients to claim refunds based on the "861 argument." According to the indictment, if the government refunded money based on the "861" theory, Kahn would take 20% of the refund and pay half to Rosile.

Despite warnings from previous tax advisers that his movie-related income was taxable and the "861" scheme was bogus, Snipes apparently sided with Kahn and Rosile in 2000 and stopped paying income taxes, the indictment says. Using the "861 argument," Snipes tried to recover $4 million in taxes paid for 1996 and $7 million for 1997. The government also claims that Snipes tried to pay some of his income taxes from 2000 to 2002 by sending $14 million in bogus checks to the U.S. Treasury.

Paul Perez, the U.S. Attorney in Tampa who filed the charges, said in a statement: "Those who intentionally and unlawfully harass the IRS through deceit, trickery and fraud undermine the collection of revenue that is vital to every aspect of the operation of our government." The Associated Press reported that Perez said Snipes has not been arrested because authorities don't know his whereabouts. Two of the charges that Snipes faces each carry a maximum sentence of five years. The remaining six charges carry up to one year each.

A spokesman for Snipes could not be reached for comment. Kahn and Rosile also could not be reached.

U.S. Indicts Actor Snipes In Tax-Avoidance Case (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Action star Wesley Snipes, who once played a Treasury agent in the film "Boiling Point," was indicted for trying to cheat the government with false tax-refund claims and failing to file personal returns for six years.

The charges stem from a well-known but illegal scheme that asserts that U.S. citizens only have to pay taxes on income earned from foreign sources. The scheme purports that wages and other income earned in the U.S. aren't taxable. The Internal Revenue Service and various courts have ruled that the argument is a misreading of the tax code.

If convicted on all eight counts handed up against him, Mr. Snipes could be sentenced to a maximum of 16 years in prison.

Along with Mr. Snipes, Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., were also indicted for allegedly defrauding the IRS and presenting a fraudulent claim. Mr. Kahn is the alleged head of a commercial business that promoted and sold the fraudulent tax scheme to Mr. Snipes. Mr. Rosile was the accountant who prepared Mr. Snipes's tax returns.

According to the indictment, the Justice Department is charging that Messrs. Snipes, Kahn and Rosile attempted to make it appear as if Mr. Snipes had no liability for federal income taxes. As part of the scheme, the defendants allegedly prepared and filed two amended federal income-tax returns for Mr. Snipes, fraudulently claiming refunds for 1996 and 1997 income taxes previously paid, totaling almost $12 million. The indictment also alleges that Mr. Snipes didn't file his 1999 through 2004 federal income-tax returns.

Mr. Snipes is one of the more than 200 mostly high-wealth individuals who were part of Mr. Rosile's and Mr. Kahn's attempts to "help" American taxpayers argue that the tax system itself is a hoax, and that they didn't have to pay taxes on income earned within the U.S. The Justice Department sued Mr. Rosile in 2002 and forced him to turn over a list of most of his clients.

Mr. Rosile's clients would typically pay him $100 for preparing their tax returns, and if there was a refund, 20% would go to Mr. Kahn's group, called American Rights Litigators, or its successor, Guiding Light of God Ministries. The Justice Department alleges that the groups helped defraud government coffers of at least $36 million.

Mr. Snipes couldn't be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0082669

Wesley Snipes Is Indicted On 8 Counts Of Tax Fraud, Accused Of Seeking $12M In False Refunds (AP)

By Phil Davis

AP, October 18, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. — Actor Wesley Snipes was indicted Tuesday on eight counts of tax fraud, accused of trying to cheat the government out of nearly $12 million in false refund claims and not filing returns for six years.

Prosecutors said Snipes fraudulently claimed refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the "Blade" trilogy and other films including "Jungle Fever" and "White Men Can't Jump" was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

"It's a conspiracy against the IRS, basically to harass the IRS, from doing its lawful job in term of collection of taxes," U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez said at a news conference.

If convicted of all the charges, Snipes could face 16 years in prison — five years each on two conspiracy counts and one year each on six counts of failure to file income tax returns.

Snipes, 44, who had a home in Windermere near Orlando, has not been arrested because authorities don't know where he is, Perez said. Snipes' manager and attorney did not return phone messages from The Associated Press.

"We've spoken to his former attorneys over the weekend," Perez said. "We presume that he knows, and of course after this press conference he will definitely know."

The indictment said Snipes conspired with American Rights Litigators' founder Eddie Ray Kahn and tax preparer Douglas P. Rosile Sr. to file false refund claims based on a bogus argument that only income from foreign sources was subject to taxation.

That included a claim for a $7.3 million refund for 1997, in which an amended tax return reported Snipes' adjusted income as zero.

The Justice Department sued Rosile in 2002 for allegedly filing bogus tax refund claims totaling more than $36 million on behalf of clients in 32 states. The suit is still pending.

Snipes was not named as a defendant in that case, but the lawsuit said the preparer's largest claim was an amended income tax return filed on behalf of the actor and dated April 14, 2001.

Rosile is in custody in Ocala, Perez said, and the third defendant named in the indictment, Kahn, is believed to be out of the country.

A call to an attorney who is representing Rosile in the 2002 lawsuit was not returned. It wasn't clear if he had any other legal representation. Federal court records indicate that he filed for bankruptcy on June 29.

Perez said the IRS considers the tax preparation business founded by Kahn as a "tax protest organization."

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington contributed to this report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs $532.8B Defense Spending Bill (AP-Y)

AP, October 18, 2006

With a long list of caveats, President Bush signed a bill Tuesday authorizing $532.8 billion in defense spending, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for members of the military.

The measure, for the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1, authorizes $70 billion in supplemental funding to support the war on terror's operation costs, personnel expenses, equipment needs and other costs.

DOJ_NMG_0082670

The White House released two pages of administration disagreements and reservations about provisions that lawmakers put in the bill.

Bush took issue with a provision that would require the Navy to keep its current number of 12 aircraft carriers. The administration is seeking permission to retire the USS John F. Kennedy.

The statement singled out about a dozen provisions that would require the White House to provide Congress with information on various subjects. Bush reminded lawmakers of "the president's constitutional authority to withhold information, the disclosure of which could impair foreign relations, the national security, the deliberative processes of the executive or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties."

Among other disputed areas, the statement said sections of the bill purported to make consultations with certain lawmakers a precondition to carrying out the law. The statement said it would regard that requirement "as calling for but not mandating such consultation."

Law Caps Interest On 'payday Advances' To Servicemembers (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, October 18, 2006

Consumer loans to servicemembers will be limited to 36% annual interest next year under a law President Bush signed Tuesday that is aimed at store-front lenders clustered around military bases.

The law is a response to "payday advance" stores that market short-term loans, typically charging $15 or $20 per $100 loan for periods of up to two weeks or a borrowers' next payday. Borrowers generally renew loans several times before paying them off, and the fees result in effective annual interest rates of 400% or more, a Defense Department study concluded.

Congress approved the limits before adjournment this month. Bush signed it into law as part of a larger defense bill.

Military officers pushed for the law, saying the loans saddled low-paid enlisted men and women with debts that ruined their finances, jeopardized security clearances and left them unable to deploy to Iraq or other assignments.

"What we're hoping is a lot of payday lenders will pack up and go elsewhere because they can't bilk the military for the exorbitant interest rates," says John Irons, a retired Navy captain and director of the Navy-Marine Corps Relief Society in San Diego, which counsels and aids sailors and Marines.

"This will be a great help," says Capt. Mark Patton, commanding officer of Naval Base Point Loma. "It is a great statement by Congress on the importance of the financial health of our military, especially right now when our readiness is so strained by the demands of war."

The Defense Department report said the average borrower pays $827 on a $339 loan and called the lending predatory. The 36% rate cap means lenders can charge no more than $1.38 on a $100 loan for two weeks — an amount lenders say is too low to be profitable.

"That's why the 36% rate cap means we're getting out of the military business," said Steven Schlein, spokesman for the Consumer Financial Services of America, a trade group whose members operate half the 22,000 short-term lending stores across the USA.

Darrin Andersen, president of the group, said the industry will still offer loans to civilians. "While this will only have a slight impact on our industry's bottom line, it will have a large impact on individuals in the military who will have to look elsewhere when they are in need of a short-term loan," he said.

The limit was added to the defense bill in a House-Senate conference after passing the Senate overwhelmingly. The House of Representatives did not initially approve it, but opposition melted in the face of the Pentagon report and media attention, said Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., a sponsor of the limit.

"It means that we're going to protect our servicemen and women from this kind of abuse," he said.

Michael Calhoun, president of the Center for Responsible Lending, said Congress should "extend these protections to all of America's working families."

Bush Sets Defense As Space Priority (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

DOJ_NMG_0082671

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

President Bush has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone "hostile to U.S. interests."

The document, the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy largely in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy.

"Freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power," the policy asserts in its introduction.

National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said in written comments that an update was needed to "reflect the fact that space has become an even more important component of U.S. economic, national and homeland security." The military has become increasingly dependent on satellite communication and navigation, as have providers of cellphones, personal navigation devices and even ATMs.

The administration said the policy revisions are not a prelude to introducing weapons systems into Earth orbit. "This policy is not about developing or deploying weapons in space. Period," said a senior administration official who was not authorized to speak on the record.

Nevertheless, Michael Krepon, co-founder of the Henry L. Stimson Center, a nonpartisan think tank that follows the space-weaponry issue, said the policy changes will reinforce international suspicions that the United States may seek to develop, test and deploy space weapons. The concerns are amplified, he said, by the administration's refusal to enter negotiations or even less formal discussions on the subject.

"The Clinton policy opened the door to developing space weapons, but that administration never did anything about it," Krepon said. "The Bush policy now goes further."

Theresa Hitchens, director of the nonpartisan Center for Defense Information in Washington, said that the new policy "kicks the door a little more open to a space-war fighting strategy" and has a "very unilateral tone to it."

The administration official strongly disagreed with that characterization, saying the policy encourages international diplomacy and cooperation. But he said the document also makes clear the U.S. position: that no new arms-control agreements are needed because there is no space arms race.

The official also said the administration has briefed members of Congress as well as a number of governments, including Russia, on the new policy. The public, however, has not learned much about it: The policy was released at 5 p.m. on the Friday before Columbus Day, with no public announcement.

The National Space Policy follows other administration statements that appeared to advocate greater military use of space.

In 2004, the Air Force published a Counterspace Operations Doctrine that called for a more active military posture in space and said that protecting U.S. satellites and spacecraft may require "deception, disruption, denial, degradation and destruction." Four years earlier, a congressionally chartered panel led by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld recommended developing space weapons to protect military and civilian satellites.

Because of the political sensitivities, several analysts said, the Pentagon probably will not move forward quickly with space weapons but rather will work on dual-use technology that can serve military and civilian interests. But because many space initiatives are classified, Krepon and others said, it is difficult to know what is being developed and deployed.

Some of the potential space weapons most frequently discussed are lasers that can "blind" or shut down adversary satellites and small, maneuverable satellites that could ram another satellite.

The new Bush policy calls on the defense secretary to provide "space capabilities" to support missile-warning systems as well as "multi-layered and integrated missile defenses," an apparent nod toward placing some components of the system in space.

The new document grew out of Bush's 2002 order to the National Security Council, with support from the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, to assess the nation's military and civilian space policies. The review has already led to a major shift in emphasis at NASA, away from research and unmanned exploration to returning Americans to the moon and then sending them on to Mars.

DOJ_NMG_0082672

Some sections of the 1996 Clinton policy and the Bush revision are classified. There are many similarities in the unclassified portions, and the NSC and the Defense Department emphasized that continuity. But there is a significant divergence apparent in the first two goals of each document.

Bush's top goals are to "strengthen the nation's space leadership and ensure that space capabilities are available in time to further U.S. national security, homeland security, and foreign policy objectives" and to "enable unhindered U.S. operations in and through space to defend our interests there."

Clinton's top goals were to "enhance knowledge of the Earth, the solar system and the universe through human and robotic exploration" and to "strengthen and maintain the national security of the United States."

The Clinton policy also said that the United States would develop and operate "space control capabilities to ensure freedom of action in space" only when such steps would be "consistent with treaty obligations." The Bush policy accepts current international agreements but states: "The United States will oppose the development of new legal regimes or other restrictions that seek to prohibit or limit U.S. access to or use of space."

A number of nations have pushed for talks to ban space weapons, and the United States has long been one of a handful of nations opposed to the idea. Although it had abstained in the past when proposals to ban space weapons came up in the United Nations, last October the United States voted for the first time against a call for negotiations -- the only "no" against 160 "yes" votes.

The U.S. position flows in part from the fact that so many key weapons systems are now dependent on information and communications from orbiting satellites, analysts said. The U.S. military has developed and deployed far more space-based technology than any other nation, giving it great strategic advantages. But with the superior technology has come a perceived vulnerability to attacks on essential satellites.

The new policy was applauded by defense analyst Baker Spring of the conservative Heritage Foundation. He said that he supported the policy's rejection of international agreements or treaties, as well as its emphasis on protecting military assets and placing missile defense components in space. He also said that he liked the policy's promotion of commercial enterprises in space and its apparent recognition that private satellites will need military protection as well.

The issue of possible hostilities in space became more real last month when National Reconnaissance Office Director Donald M. Kerr told reporters that a U.S. satellite had recently been "painted," or illuminated, by a laser in China. Gen. James E. Cartwright, the top U.S. military officer in charge of operations in space, told the newsletter Inside the Pentagon last week that it remained unclear whether China had tried to disrupt the satellite.

New U.S. Space Policy Emphasizes Security (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

President Bush has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone "hostile to U.S. interests."

The document, the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy.

New Space Policy 'Sets Up' Intel Turf War (UPI)

UPI, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 (UPI) -- The new U.S. policy on space exploration and exploitation sets the stage for a turf battle between intelligence and the military, says one expert.

Steven Aftergood, the government transparency campaigner at the Federation of American Scientists, says the new policy, released recently by the White House, "creates overlapping and possibly conflicting responsibilities" for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Aftergood noted that the section of the policy on national security was higher up in the document than in the 1996 policy it replaced, which "perhaps reflects a higher priority" for national security concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0082673

The national security section of the policy tasks the defense secretary to "establish specific intelligence requirements that can be met by tactical, operational, or national-level intelligence gathering capabilities." It also gives him responsibility for "space situational awareness," in which capacity he "shall support the space situational awareness requirements for the director of national intelligence."

For his part, Negroponte is instructed to "establish objectives, intelligence requirements, priorities and guidance for the intelligence community to ensure timely and effective collection, processing, analysis and dissemination of national intelligence." But he is also told to "support military planning and satisfy operational requirements as a major intelligence mission," and "provide intelligence collection and analysis of space-related capabilities to support space situational awareness for the U.S. government."

Neither the Pentagon nor Negroponte's office immediately responded to a request for comment.

Sealed Filings Increase At High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 18, 2006

When the Supreme Court debates the constitutionality of the federal "partial birth abortion" law next month, it will have some sensitive information in its hands that no member of the public can see.

Specifically, the justices will have the full transcript of a 2004 deposition by an Oregon doctor who apparently mentioned the names of colleagues in the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists who may have performed abortions.

It was part of the file in the case of Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, but when it made its way to the Supreme Court this summer, the organization and Planned Parenthood requested that the parts of the doctor's deposition that name doctors be filed with the Court under seal.

Solicitor General Paul Clement concurred and filed a motion, and on Oct. 2, the Court said yes -- one of six cases that day in which the Court granted motions to file petitions under seal. It was, according to a database search, the largest number of unrelated cases in which the Court granted such motions in a single day.

In the Planned Parenthood case, the Court's action means an extra measure of privacy for a handful of physicians. As Daniel Edelman, a lawyer for the physician who was deposed, put it, "The last thing we'd need is for some lunatic to get names from the deposition and go and attack one of the doctors."

But in some of the other cases, the justification for secrecy is less obvious. And to some, the day's actions symbolize a little-noticed trend over the past decade toward allowing secret filings at the Supreme Court. Whereas decades ago such motions were discouraged and often denied at the Supreme Court, now they are routinely granted. No motion to file under seal has been denied since 2003. The Court itself votes on the motions without any hearing at which opposition can be heard. Typically, when the Court grants a motion to seal, a redacted version is made part of the public record.

The number of filings under seal is still tiny -- only 12 in this calendar year out of more than 7,000 petitions filed. And Court insiders assert that the spike in motions granted is a fluke, not a reflection of any change in policy. "This may just be an outlier year," says Thomas Goldstein, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld who has studied the numbers. [Editor's note: Goldstein writes a column for Legal Times.]

But the number of cases filed under seal was significantly lower in the 1990s and 1980s, and sealing files was rarely done before then, reflecting the Court's historical preference for conducting its business in public.

Stephen Shapiro, co-author of "Supreme Court Practice," says that especially with the current mix of business and intellectual property cases, as well as post-9/11 disputes, the conservative Court, under both William Rehnquist and now John Roberts Jr., may be more sympathetic than it once was to sealing Court files. "Conservative justices might believe that a seal was proper to protect trade secrets and real government secrets, bearing on national security," says Shapiro, a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

But Shapiro sees the trend permeating all federal courts, not just the Supreme Court, and he is concerned. "Filings under seal are attempted in cases where the seal is not necessary or proper, and the Court should be watchful to prevent abuses of this kind," Shapiro says.

DOJ_NMG_0082674

At the Supreme Court level, he says, it is often a matter of convenience for lawyers on both sides of a case to leave under seal a filing or opinion that was sealed by a judge at an earlier stage.

IN THE SHADOWS

That appears to be the explanation in at least one of the motions for filing under seal granted on Oct. 2. In Cooperativa de Seguros de Vida v. FAC, a dispute over Medicare reimbursement claims, the district judge sealed his own opinion to protect the terms of a settlement that was reached between the parties.

Alan Horowitz of D.C.-based Miller & Chevalier, who wrote the petition for COSVI, says, "Why the district court ordered it sealed is not clear to me." He adds that almost everything that was sealed in the district court opinion was detailed in the public opinion of the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Horowitz asked the high court clerk's office if he could omit the district court opinion from his petition, hoping to avoid the need to seek permission to submit it under seal. But the answer was no, so the motion to file a sealed appendix was the only option.

The petition itself is public, with the appeals court decision attached. If the Court grants review in the case, Horowitz says, he'll likely ask the district court to unseal the original opinion. "This case is not really emblematic of anything," says Horowitz. "It's just an oddball situation."

But private petitioners are not the only ones that seek to file papers under seal. The state of Maine did so in Rowe v. New Hampshire Motor Transport Association, and the motion was granted Oct. 2. At issue is whether Maine's law prohibiting the sale by mail of tobacco products to minors is pre-empted by a federal law that bars states from regulating air and land delivery services.

United Parcel Service, one of the carriers affected by the case, requested that certain information in the record about how it tracks deliveries be kept confidential. Both parties tried to narrow the amount of text to be redacted, but some remained, according to Maine Deputy Attorney General Paul Stern.

"I sent it over to UPS, and there were only a couple of small things they wanted redacted, and we said fine," says Stern. "I didn't care. We didn't particularly want to ask for sealing."

The brief as filed with the high court contains several blackened lines of type masking sentences that appear to refer to UPS procedures. Stern adds, "You can get an excellent understanding of the case without these facts."

Other cases in which the Court allowed redacted filings on Oct. 2 include Jane Doe v. United States, a Pennsylvania case in which the petitioner sought to protect "sensitive grand jury proceedings."

SEND IN THE CLOUDS

The Court's preference for keeping its files public goes back decades. One milestone was the landmark Pentagon Papers case of 1971, in which Solicitor General Erwin Griswold asked the Court to allow it to file secret briefs and even to hear the case in camera. Over the objection of three justices in New York Times v. United States, the Court rejected the proposal for a closed oral argument, but it did permit some filings under seal.

The Court even enshrined the public interest in open court records in a 1978 case, in which it said, "It is clear that the courts of this country recognize a general right to inspect and copy public records and documents, including judicial records and documents."

That case was invoked in the 2003 litigation over the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The Court still granted a dozen motions to seal different parts of the massive briefing in the case, including records of Federal Election Commission investigations in which witnesses had been promised confidentiality.

Most of the time, motions to seal records are made without objection, but in a post-9/11 case, M.K.B. v. United States, media organizations sought to intervene. At both the district court and 11th Circuit levels, the case and filings were secret. It was only through an error at the appeals court clerk's office that a reporter for the Miami Daily Business Review, a sister paper to Legal Times, was able to determine what the case was about: a habeas proceeding brought by Mohamed Kamel Bellahouel, an Algerian native who had been held in federal prison in part because as a waiter, he had served meals to two of the 9/11 hijackers.

When the petition reached the Supreme Court, several media organizations -- including ALM, which publishes Legal Times -- sought to intervene to open the record. The motion was denied.

DOJ_NMG_0082675

Bush Triad Visit On Tap (WXII)

WXII-TV Winston-Salem, North Carolina, October 17, 2006

President George W. Bush is visiting North Carolina for the third time in 2006 and appearing in the Piedmont-Triad for the first time in more than 10 months.

Bush on Wednesday will visit Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School in Guilford County, followed by a closed lunch with community leaders in Randleman. He'll also visit the Victory Junction Gang Camp in Randolph County, which serves children with chronic medical conditions or serious illnesses.

At the elementary school, Bush will speak about the No Child Left Behind Act.

Officials at The White House said Bush will end his visit with a private Republican National Committee dinner at a home in Greensboro.

Bush hasn't appeared in the Piedmont-Triad since December, when he visited Kernersville to talk about the economy and tax relief, among other items. He visited the Deere-Hitachi plant and spoke to about 500 employees and invited guests.

Democrats are speaking out against some of Bush's policies during the president's Wednesday visit.

Rep. Brad Miller called the No Child Left Behind Act one of Bush's "most well-known policy failures." Miller claimed the Bush administration has underfunded the initiative by $40 billion over the last four years, "leaving states with new mandates, but not enough funding."

"I'm pleased President Bush is able to squeeze a visit to a school into his fundraising visit to North Carolina," Miller said in a prepared statement. "But if President Bush really listened to parents and teachers he would know already that without funding to close achievement gaps, No Child Left Behind is just one more mandatory test. His failure to provide the promised funding for education is leaving every child behind."

In July, Bush praised service members in a speech at North Carolina's Fort Bragg. The president told a cheering crowd that U.S. troops will overcome persistent violence in Iraq.

In April, Bush defended his war strategy during a speech at a community college in Charlotte, saying Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism.

Stay with WXII 12 News and WXII12.com for more on this story.

Bush To Visit N.C., Shotwell To Attend (REIDRVW NC)

By Jennifer Williams

The Reidsville Review (NC), October 18, 2006

Rockingham County Schools Superintendent Rodney Shotwell has plans to attend the presidential address Wednesday at Falkener Elementary in neighboring Guilford County.

"Any time you can see the president of the United States you should," Shotwell said. He said he received an invitation and accepted. Shotwell said the last president he had an opportunity to see was during his college years, when he saw Reagan.

The presidential visit will highlight the success of an at-risk school under the No Child Left Behind legislation. The No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 was one of the first bills President George W. Bush signed into law after coming into office in 2000. Shotwell said the law holds educators accountable for each student.

NCLB tests students and groups their scores by race, gender, socioeconomic status, and special needs. This has exposed some vulnerable areas of public education in Rockingham County Schools. Twelve of Rockingham County's 25 Schools, or 48 percent, met Adequate Yearly Progress during the 2002-2003 school year. Scores improved during the 2003-2004 school year with 20 of 25 schools, or 80 percent, of Rockingham County Schools meeting AYP goals. Scores dipped again in 2005 when 12 of 25, or 48 percent, made AYP. Preliminary scores for the 2005-2006 school year show that 17 of 24 schools, 70.8 percent, met AYP standards. Reading scores for all grades were released in July. High school math scores were released Oct. 5, and remaining math scores will be released early next month. Final AYP results for the county will be available next month after math scores are finalized.

Shotwell said there are positives and negatives to the NCLB legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0082676

"I think it has been effective for what it's trying to do. It forces us to look at all of a school's subgroups," Shotwell said Tuesday. Shotwell and other school board members were pleased with the 2006 increases in AYP scores compared to 2005, but scores also revealed problematic trends. Historically Black students, students with disabilities, and students of low socioeconomic status have performed poorly on AYP examinations in Rockingham County. Under NCLB, if one subgroup does not meet AYP standards it could jeopardize a school meeting the standards. The amount of federal funding a school receives and how it is allocated is dependent upon AYP scores.

"We are addressing all these areas along with total school improvement and this is in great part due to the outcomes in NCLB. Under the North Carolina model we look for growth as a school in each grade level," the superintendent said.

The legislation has posed some funding problems for county schools that are already pressed financially by rising costs of operation and denied funding increases from the county. Shotwell said he would like to see a change in the funding formula under NCLB so that schools would not suffer.

There was a statewide dip in AYP scores. Civics and writing sections were added to end of grade tests and a growth formula was implemented for the first time. The new formula also caused a delay in scores being released.

Staff writer Jennifer Williams can be reached at jwilliams@reidsvillereview.com or (336) 349-4331.

Liking Math Subtracts From Scores, Study Finds (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 18, 2006

Washington - Kids who are turned off by math often say they don't enjoy it, they aren't good at it and they see little point in it. Who knew that could be a formula for success? The nations with the best scores have the least happy, least confident math students, says a study by the Brookings Institution's Brown Center on Education Policy.

Countries reporting higher levels of enjoyment and confidence among math students don't do as well in the subject, the study suggests. The results for the United States hover around the middle of the pack, both in terms of enjoyment and in test scores.

In essence, happiness is overrated, says study author Tom Loveless.

"We might want to focus on the math that kids are learning and just be a little less obsessed with the fact that they have to enjoy every minute of it," said Loveless, who directs the Brown center and serves on a presidential advisory panel on math.

Other countries do better than the United States because they seem to expect more from students, he said. That could also explain why high performers in other nations express less confidence and enjoyment in math. They consider their peer group to be star achievers.

Even efforts to make math relevant may be irrelevant, says the study, released Wednesday.

Nations that try to teach math in terms of daily life have the lowest test scores.

Loveless says pleasing kids comes at the expense of mastering skills.

His findings come from the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, a test of fourth-graders and eighth-graders across the globe. Along with math questions, students were asked whether they enjoyed math and whether they usually did well in it.

The eighth-grade results reflected a common pattern: The 10 nations whose students enjoyed math the most all scored below average. The bottom 10 nations on the scale all excelled.

Japan, Hong Kong and the Netherlands were among those with high scores and lower enjoyment or confidence among students.

Within a given nation, the high-confidence kids did better than their peers.

Enjoying Math Not Always A Plus (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, October 18, 2006

All you need is love … unless you're doing algebra. Then you need to work it on out.

DOJ_NMG_0082677

That's the take-away message from a new study with an unusual finding: The more kids like math and say they do well in it, the less likely they are to do well.

The study, being released today by the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, finds the starkest difference among eighth-graders around the world who were asked if they enjoy math.

The 10 "happiest" nations all performed below the international average. The 10 "unhappiest" all scored above average, including Sweden, England, Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and the Netherlands.

U.S. eighth-graders fell somewhere in the middle and followed the same pattern. They were slightly unhappier in math than the average 13-year-old, but they performed a bit better than average.

The happiness factor plays a minimal role in math achievement for millions of children, says study author Tom Loveless, who calls the difference in scores "huge" between the happiest and unhappiest nations.

The data suggest simply making math relevant and enjoyable isn't enough, he says. "If we want the United States to be high-achieving and among the world's best nations, obviously we have to do something beyond that."

The findings come as educators fret about math and science skills and five weeks after the National Council of Teachers of Mathematics urged elementary and middle schools to take a more back-to-basics approach.

Such changes have been long sought by traditionalists but criticized by those who say kids must learn creative problem-solving as well as nuts-and-bolts arithmetic, algebra and calculus.

Frank Wang, former chairman of Saxon, an Oklahoma publisher of popular back-to-basics math textbooks, says you can have both.

"You can have fulfillment. You can have satisfaction and esteem building. But it can't be at the price of the fundamentals."

Wang, who is starting an Internet company to bring advanced math to urban students, says mastery takes years of drill and practice. "Whichever way you cut it, there's a certain amount of tedium to the math."

It's odd that many parents frown upon academic drills, but not athletic drills, he says. "No one questions a football coach when he says we have to have two-a-day practices in 100-degree heat. People don't question it because they feel it's a necessary price to win."

The Brookings study, based on the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, a sample of math and science achievement by fourth- and eighth-graders worldwide, found U.S. fourth-graders vary from the global pattern in that they liked math just a bit more than most and performed a bit better.

In general, though, even kids' own conceptions of how well they do in math are a bad indicator of whether their country scores well.

Fourth- and eighth-graders in nations where more kids said, "I usually do well" in math tended to have lower scores. The less likely a kid was to say he or she usually did well, the higher the nation's scores.

What's perhaps most startling: Kids in Singapore, a math powerhouse, didn't regard themselves nearly as highly as those in the USA: 39% of U.S. students said they "usually do well" in math. Only 18% in Singapore said the same.

But the Singapore kids knew much more math than the U.S. kids. In fact, the least confident Singapore students scored higher than the most confident in the USA.

A former sixth-grade teacher, Loveless is renowned for taking a contrarian point of view and backing it up with data.

In 2003, he made headlines by mining recent research and concluding that most U.S. kids do less than one hour a day of homework. At the same time, the media were writing about how homework was overtaking many families' lives.

For Math Students, Self-Esteem Might Not Equal High Scores (WP)

By Jay Mathews

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

U.S. Lags Behind Countries That Don't Emphasize Self-Regard

It is difficult to get through a day in an American school without hearing maxims such as these: "To succeed, you must believe in yourself," and "To teach, you must relate the subject to the lives of students."

DOJ_NMG_0082678

But the Brookings Institution is reporting today that countries such as the United States that embrace self-esteem, joy and real-world relevance in learning mathematics are lagging behind others that don't promote all that self-regard.

Consider Korea and Japan.

According to the Washington think tank's annual Brown Center report on education, 6 percent of Korean eighth-graders surveyed expressed confidence in their math skills, compared with 39 percent of U.S. eighth-graders. But a respected international math assessment showed Koreans scoring far ahead of their peers in the United States, raising questions about the importance of self-esteem.

In Japan, the report found, 14 percent of math teachers surveyed said they aim to connect lessons to students' lives, compared with 66 percent of U.S. math teachers. Yet the U.S. scores in eighth-grade math trail those of the Japanese, raising similar questions about the importance of practical relevance.

Tom Loveless, the report's author, said that the findings do not mean that student happiness causes low achievement. But he wrote that his analysis of the international math assessment, the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, shows that U.S. schools should not be too quick to assume that happiness is what matters in the classroom.

"It is interesting that people grasp this notion in other areas of self-improvement -- eating healthy foods, getting exercise, saving for retirement -- but when it comes to education, for some reason, the limitations of happiness are forgotten," Loveless wrote.

Several countries in Asia and some in Europe tend to beat the United States in math scores, even though their students show less satisfaction with performance and less love of math, and even though the lessons they receive are less "relevant," the report found.

The report is likely to stoke a debate over teaching math and other subjects that has divided the United States for at least a century. Progressives say that what students choose to study and how they feel about education should matter as much, or more, in the classroom than test results; traditionalists say that gain requires some pain and that tests matter.

Alfie Kohn, a progressive author and lecturer, questioned the findings. "Let me get this straight," Kohn said. "Kids who get higher scores on standardized tests are unhappy and self-doubting, so that means we should question the importance of happiness and self-confidence, rather than the importance of these tests?"

Gerald W. Bracey, an educational psychologist and columnist for the education journal Phi Delta Kappan, said the report overlooked countervailing trends in Japan, Singapore and other countries that do better than the United States on eighth-grade math tests. Officials in those countries say their education systems are not yielding graduates who have the same level of creativity as American graduates. Some Asian nations have begun to copy aspects of U.S. education, including the emphasis on letting students search for answers rather than memorize them.

The Brookings report notes that in most countries, including Korea and the United States, students who like math and think they are good at it have higher math scores than those who don't. Perspective matters, Loveless wrote: Japanese students who would be considered good at the subject if they were in the United States think that they are not so good when compared with their peers in Japan.

The international test results from 2003 and related surveys from 46 countries show that the world's most confident eighth-grade math students are found in the Middle East, Africa and the United States. Of the 10 countries with the highest levels of student confidence, only Israel and the United States scored higher than average on the international test, and their scores were far below those of the much less confident students in Japan, Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan.

The surveys asked teachers in each country whether they relate math lessons to daily life at least half of the time. In Chile, 87 percent of teachers answered affirmatively, the highest mark on the relevance scale. Japan was at the bottom of the list.

"The more relevant the math, the lower-scoring the nation," Loveless wrote.

Chester E. Finn Jr., president of the D.C.-based Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, said the report shows that schools need not be fun to be effective. "Schools should work on academics, not feelings," Finn said. "True self-esteem, self-confidence and happiness are born of true achievement."

Reid Faces FEC Complaint (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0082679

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Conservative group Citizens United yesterday announced plans to file a complaint with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) about Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) use of campaign funds to contribute to the Christmas fund in his condominium.

Reid, taking heat for his failure to report on annual financial disclosures that he had transferred ownership of land in suburban Las Vegas to a limited liability corporation, said Monday he would reimburse his campaign committee for $3,300 in annual donations to the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund to stave off any allegations of ethical impropriety.

Citizens United President David Bossie, not satisfied by this, said he would dispute the issue with the FEC.

"Senator Reid knows better than to use political contributions for personal services," Bossie said in a statement. He made waves in conservative circles for his recent call that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) resign in the wake of the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) congressional page scandal.

One Democratic leadership aide, firing back at GOP attempts to impugn Reid's record, pointed to a 1992 FEC complaint filed against Bossie by former President George H.W. Bush. That complaint stemmed from a Citizens United ad asking voters to call a phone number that played fake conversations between former President Clinton and alleged mistress Gennifer Flowers.

Reid's office referred requests for comment to Reid's Monday statement on his reimbursement.

Legal Fees Are Drain On Lewis' War Chest (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the House Appropriations Committee chairman whose ties to lobbyists have come under scrutiny, has spent more than $750,000 from his campaign fund for defense lawyers, according to his latest spending report.

Federal investigators are examining Lewis' association with lobbyists who have secured millions of dollars in congressional earmarks for their clients. Lobbyists and their clients have contributed heavily to Lewis' political war chests, records show.

Lewis has denied any wrongdoing. But the investigation is taking a toll on his campaign treasury.

Legal fees were his single biggest expense for the most recent period: More than $550,000 was paid to the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher between July 1 and Sept. 30.

And he paid the firm a $200,000 retainer in June.

"Congressman Lewis has availed himself of excellent legal representation so that this matter may be resolved expeditiously while he focuses his efforts on doing the work of the people of the 41st District of California," his spokeswoman, Barbara J. Comstock, said.

"We are confident that Congressman Lewis has honorably served his constituents and that he will be fully exonerated once this investigation is completed," Comstock said, adding that Lewis had cleared the use of campaign funds to pay legal fees with the House Ethics Committee.

His lead lawyers are Robert Bonner, who once headed the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles as well as U.S. Customs and Border Protection, and Joseph Warin, a onetime federal prosecutor.

In a twist, U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang of Los Angeles, whose office has been investigating Lewis, announced Tuesday that she was resigning her federal job to join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. She could not be reached for comment, but a spokeswoman for the law firm said Yang would have "no involvement whatsoever" with Lewis.

Even with the legal fees, Lewis — whose challenger is so little-known and -funded that the congressman hasn't hired a campaign manager or opened a campaign office — entered the home stretch of the campaign with more than $1 million cash on hand, according to his report.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group that posted Lewis' legal fees on its website, said some of the congressman's donors "work at some of the most prolific lobby shops specializing in federal earmarks."

DOJ_NMG_0082680

Earmarking is the largely secret process that committee chairs and other powerful members of the House and Senate use to insert spending directives into pending legislation without going through the normal budget review process.

The use of earmarks has soared in recent years.

Lewis isn't the only member of Congress who is spending campaign funds for legal fees.

Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville), whose ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff have become an issue in his reelection bid, used more than $38,000 from his campaign funds to pay an attorney to deal with the Justice Department on his behalf.

Doolittle's office said in a statement that the attorney, David Barger, contacted the agency to express "the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman had done nothing wrong."

Textile Makers Tap Political Opportunity (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

As lawmakers hit the home stretch of tight races, textile makers are leveraging voters' economic anxieties to win industry protections and derail free-trade initiatives.

Before Congress left Washington for final campaigning, anxious lawmakers shelved several items that the Bush administration had pushed as part of its trade agenda, but which the textile industry opposed. Now the question for the White House is how to get those efforts back on track -- especially if Democrats, who are traditionally less friendly to free trade, take control of one or both houses of Congress in November's voting.

The textile industry's maneuvering shows how Republican vulnerabilities in midterm elections have created opportunities for some special-interest groups.

Economic unease among voters -- fueled by foreign competition, especially from China, and the loss of U.S. manufacturing jobs -- figures in nearly a dozen close House races in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Iowa. Similar forces are roiling important Senate races, especially those for Republican-held seats in Pennsylvania, Missouri and Ohio.

Democrats must pick up six seats to win control of the Senate and 15 for a majority in the House. Amid such thin margins and with economic issues prominent in voters' minds, textile-industry officials and their congressional allies have seized the opportunity to push their own agenda.

"We look for our strategic spots," says Augustine Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition, a textile trade group.

So when Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill Sept. 21 that would give trade preferences to Africa and Haiti, lobbyists for Amtac and the National Council of Textile Organizations, another textile group, swung into action. They were especially worried about provisions in the bill that would allow Haiti to use more foreign-made fabric, such as cheap cloth from China, to make clothes, while still qualifying for duty-free access to the U.S. market.

The groups appealed to Rep. Robin Hayes, a North Carolina Republican, for help. A schoolteacher and former textile worker is running on the Democratic ticket in a closely watched race against Mr. Hayes, who agreed to lead the opposition against the Haiti bill. Mr. Hayes spoke to party leaders, then wrote a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert arguing that the legislation could expose U.S. workers to "devastating" new competition.

The day before the Sept. 26 vote, lobbyists for the two textile groups took Mr. Hayes's letter and headed to Capitol Hill to rally support among other textile-district lawmakers. Ultimately, 16 Southern Republicans signed on, including Mr. Hayes's North Carolina colleague, Rep. Charles Taylor.

Mr. Taylor has come under criticism from constituents for allegedly failing to record his vote during the 2005 House debate on Mr. Bush's signature free-trade initiative: the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Taylor said that his voting card malfunctioned and that he should have been listed in opposition. But his Democratic challenger has seized on the mix-up during the campaign.

Mr. Hayes also has come under scrutiny for his vote on Cafta. The congressman initially voted against the pact, but switched under pressure from Speaker Hastert.

DOJ_NMG_0082681

Cafta squeaked through the House by two votes, including one cast by Mr. Hayes. So when he sent Republican leaders the letter opposing the Haiti bill, they pulled the measure from the floor, congressional aides and lobbyists said.

Hayes spokeswoman Carolyn Hern said the congressman viewed this as an important chance to help a local industry: "You have to capitalize on every opportunity you get."

Textile groups also tapped nervous Republicans to fend off competition from Vietnam. The fight began in May, when the White House backed a plan for the Southeast Asian nation to join the World Trade Organization, the body that oversees the global trading system.

Led by the National Council of Textile Organizations, industry officials raised concerns on Capitol Hill about the potential threat posed by Vietnam. Vietnamese textile imports are tightly controlled, but any import limits would be removed once the country joins the WTO, sparking fears among U.S. producers of a surge in Vietnamese textile imports.

The industry made two important Republican allies in the fight: Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Sen. Lindsey Graham, of South Carolina. Neither is up for re-election this year. But Ms. Dole is leader of her party's bid to retain control of the Senate, and both she and Sen. Graham are mindful of the importance of the Vietnam issue to the textile industry in their states.

The pair pledged to block legislation needed to clear the way for Vietnam to join the WTO, until the Bush administration addressed industry concerns. Tensions heated up after Labor Day, when the White House began pressing for action before Mr. Bush's trip to Hanoi in November. Bush aides held negotiations with Sens. Graham and Dole, along with industry officials, in mid-September, in a bid to end the face-off.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez ultimately committed to "systematically monitor" Vietnam imports and initiate enforcement actions if required. Specifically, the government could initiate antidumping duties on imported goods found to have been shipped to the U.S. at below-market prices and to have caused injury to the domestic industry. The U.S. and other countries have moved to check Chinese textile imports following the end of a global textile quota system.

Republican leaders now hope to vote on the Vietnam legislation in a lame-duck congressional session before Mr. Bush departs for Hanoi.

Laura Jones, executive director of the U.S. Association of Importers of Textiles and Apparel, a group representing J.C. Penney Co. and other large retailers, has decried what she describes as the "secret deal" between the industry and the administration.

"This is much bigger than Vietnam," she said, adding that the administration's eagerness to bargain will encourage only more political gamesmanship. "Anyone can be held hostage," she said.

Textile makers and lawmakers agree the administration commitment has wider implications -- but for different reasons.

"In South Carolina and North Carolina, this is just a huge deal," said Greg Gross, Sen. Dole's chief of staff. He suggested she had an eye on the larger significance of the case. "The textile issue resonates more broadly, as a sign of problems occurring in [other] parts of the country," Mr. Gross said.

OTHER NEWS:

Wholesale Prices Fell Last Month (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Wholesale prices fell in September at the fastest pace in more than three years as energy costs plunged, the government said Tuesday in a report that offered some assurances that inflation is easing.

The producer price index, which measures prices paid to factories, farmers and other producers, fell 1.3% in September. That was the first drop since February and the biggest decline since April 2003, the Labor Department said.

The falloff in September was led by a dramatic drop in energy costs. Gasoline prices fell a record 22.2% last month, while costs for heating oil and natural gas also declined.

DOJ_NMG_0082682

Excluding food and energy costs, which are often volatile, wholesale prices rose 0.6% in September, the biggest increase since January 2005. The gain was largely attributed to a sharp increase in prices for cars and trucks as automakers were cutting sales incentives, which are factored into vehicle prices at the wholesale level. Such a gain is unlikely to be repeated, says William Hummer, chief economist at Wayne Hummer Investments.

"I don't think we have to worry about the automotive industry being a source of inflation," he says. "It's a blip."

Investors reacted negatively. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 30.58 points to 11,950.02.

The inflation numbers came out a week before Federal Reserve policymakers are scheduled to discuss interest rates. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues are expected to leave their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, at 5.25% at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Oct. 25.

With the economy slowing and inflation showing signs of moderating, the Fed will be sitting on the sidelines for some time, predicts Keitaro Matsuda, senior economist at Union Bank of California.

"The Fed can keep rates stable and watch what is happening," says Matsuda, who expects the Fed's next move will be a cut in the second half of 2007.

Data on inflation at the consumer level will be released today. In other economic news Tuesday, the Fed said industrial production fell 0.6% in September as a drop in output at factories and utilities more than offset a rise in production at mines. The drop was the steepest in a year.

Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

A sharp drop in the price of gasoline helped push wholesale prices down in September at the fastest pace in three years, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

The Producer Price Index, a measure of what businesses charge one another for finished goods, fell 1.3 percent in September. It has risen in all but two month so far this year.

That bit of good news in the government report masked some unexpected signs of higher inflation. When the volatile prices of energy and food are omitted, the core index of producer prices — an inflation measure watched by economists and the Federal Reserve — increased more than expected in September, pushed up mainly by higher automobile prices.

The 0.6 percent rise in the core index, which was the largest month-to-month jump in nearly two years, helped sour what was shaping up to be a record-setting day yesterday on Wall Street. On Monday, the Dow Jones industrial average flirted with 12,000. But yesterday, stocks fell as the mixed report on producer prices overshadowed strong corporate profits from Merrill Lynch, Johnson & Johnson and others. [Page C12.]

The bond market, however, had the opposite reaction. Bond prices rose yesterday while yields fell, a sign that traders did not think the rise in core producer prices would be a concern in the months ahead.

Wall Street had not expected the Labor Department report to show such elevated core prices. Economists had forecast a 0.2 percent increase in the core index for September. By contrast, the overall index, including food and energy, fell 1.3 percent last month, more than in any month since mid-2003.

Despite that decline, the core-index figures raised a question of whether inflation has started to moderate, as some other statistics had suggested. It may also dampen expectations that the Fed will lower interest rates any time soon.

"This is a warning for economic forecasters not too get too sanguine," said Gregory L. Miller, chief economist of SunTrust Banks. "Sometimes we get these indicators that remind us we're not in control."

On Wednesday, the Labor Department will release another barometer of inflation, the Consumer Price Index. Economists expect September's data will show a 0.2 percent rise in the core rate, according to a survey by Bloomberg News. That would mean that inflation is running well above a level that Fed members have said they consider healthy.

In the last two months, the Fed has stopped tightening monetary policy and has held its benchmark short-term federal funds rate at 5.25 percent. With the economy slowing, many economists and investors have been betting that the Fed may cut rates in the foreseeable future.

DOJ_NMG_0082683

A fresh sign that the economy is cooling came yesterday, when the Commerce Department reported that industrial production unexpectedly fell 0.6 percent in September.

Still, members of the Federal Reserve's policy-setting Open Markets Committee, including the Fed's chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have said they remain concerned about rising prices. And minutes from their Sept. 20 meeting, released last week, show that uncertainty over inflation was a subject of much discussion at the Fed.

Economists noted that the September jump in the core index of producer prices was largely a result of rising auto prices and was probably not a major concern. Reversing a recent downward trend, auto prices rose in September at the fastest rate in 15 years. That added more volatility to the index, whose fits and starts from month to month can make reading the broader trend difficult.

"Once you sort through the noise, there's very little inflation," said Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR. "Just as last month's numbers didn't tell you we're having significant deflation at the core producer level, this month's number doesn't tell you the opposite."

Data Revive Fears Of US Hard Landing (FT)

By Jamie Chisholm In London

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

Fears that the US economy may yet experience a hard landing were revived on Tuesday after a report showed industrial production in September fell by much more than expected.

Stocks tumbled after traders digested the news that output in the manufacturing, mining and utilities sector contracted by 0.6 per cent against forecasts for a decline of 0.1 per cent.

"One soft month does not make a trend – it could be a seasonal fluke – but this is a surprise," said Ian Shepherdson at High-Frequency Economics.

The Federal Reserve said utility company output fell 4.4 per cent, a drop that partly reflected reduced demand for air conditioners. Manufacturing output fell 0.3 per cent, while mining expanded by 0.7 per cent.

However, with the industrial sector accounting for only about 15 per cent of US GDP, and the monthly numbers considered erratic, some commentators were more sanguine.

John Silvia of Wachovia said that while industrial production had risen by 3.6 per cent in the past three months, compared to a gain of 5.2 per cent on a year-on-year: "There is very little evidence to support talk of recession but our case for moderation remains."

Nevertheless, treasury yields fell as Wall Street calculated that the disappointing data increased the likelihood of the Fed delivering a cut in interest rates.

Bonds also received a boost from a report that showed producer prices fell by 1.3 per cent in September, the biggest decline in more than three years as gasoline prices dropped sharply.

This was a far greater fall than forecast but optimism was tempered by the news that factory gate inflation, which excludes energy and food prices, recorded an above forecast increase of 0.6 per cent.

Output, Pricing Data Indicate A Cooling Economy (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A drop in the nation's factory output last month and lower wholesale prices suggest a cooling U.S. economy in which inflationary pressures are easing, a combination that could keep the Federal Reserve from changing interest rates anytime soon.

Output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities fell 0.6% in September after a flat performance in August, the Federal Reserve reported. The decline was particularly sharp at utilities, which produced less power than usual because of mild weather. Many manufacturing industries also ramped down production because of weaker demand for cars and houses.

The Labor Department, meanwhile, said a big drop in oil prices pushed wholesale prices down 1.3% in September, the first time producers of food, energy and materials have seen prices fall since February. Prices excluding food and energy -- so-called core producer prices -- rose 0.6% in September after falling the two previous months, largely because of volatility in the auto sector as summer incentives expired. Nonetheless, core prices fell at an annual rate of 0.3% in the third quarter after rising in the previous two quarters at 2.3% and 3.9% rates, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0082684

The two reports point to relief on the inflation front. That is the outcome Fed policy makers hoped to achieve when they stopped their two-year campaign of interest-rate increases in August, and many economists say policy makers will leave the federal-funds rate at 5.25% for the rest of the year.

"It would be absurd to think the Fed would tighten monetary policy after a number such as [this]" on industrial production, said Roger Kubarych, senior economic adviser for HVB America. "Unless there is a quick turnaround in the next couple months, it is more likely than before that the first easing move will come in early 2007," he said.

On Monday, San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen said it makes sense to keep rates steady "for a time" as the impact from past rate increases fully sinks in.

Economists had expected an oil-induced decline in producer prices last month, and many expect the Labor Department today to report that consumer prices also fell last month. A report on new-home construction today may also provide a telling indication of the economy's strength.

With the nation's housing-market slumping, home builders have scaled back construction to reduce excess inventory. Auto makers are in a similar situation, cutting production schedules and reducing their work forces. The struggles in both sectors contributed to the weaker reading on industrial production last month.

"Housing and motor-vehicle activity is clearly declining and these industries will have very poor fourth-quarter performances," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI. He said weaker demand for cars, houses and other big-ticket items, coupled with excessive inventory levels, is "a recipe for a period of slow industrial growth."

Separately, the National Association of Home Builders said its index of home-builder sentiment rose slightly to 31 in October from 30 in September. Readings on current conditions remained bleak, but assessments of future sales conditions improved somewhat.

NAHB President David Pressly, a home builder in Statesville, N.C., said that more than 75% of the association's builders are offering "substantial" sales incentives to limit cancellations but said conditions may soon improve. "The market correction appears to be approaching the bottom in terms of sales volume, and we expect the supply-demand balance to improve considerably before long," he said.

Dow Industrials Retreat In Their 12000 Quest (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

After edging toward a new milestone early in the week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back as investors took pause and grappled with mixed inflation news.

The Dow, which closed Monday less than 20 points from the 12000 mark, fell more than 90 points early yesterday, then recouped some of the losses in the afternoon. It ended down 30.58 points, or 0.26%, at 11950.02 -- still up 11.5% this year.

The Labor Department said its producer-price index, which tracks wholesale-goods prices, declined 1.3% in September, more than economists had estimated. But higher car prices caused the "core" price index, which excludes volatile food and energy items, to rise 0.6%, more than expected. "The numbers were neither good nor bad, but they left the feeling that inflation is still an issue," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment officer at Wells Capital Management.

The market will get another reading on inflation today: the consumer-price index. It could behave in a similar fashion, with the headline being pushed down by lower energy prices and higher prices showing up elsewhere.

Treasury bonds rallied early in the day, then gave up most of the gains when stocks rebounded.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.37%, or five points, to 1364.05 and is up 9.3% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.8%, or 18.89 points, to 2344.95.

"Stocks have had a very strong run and were probably a little overbought" heading into Tuesday, said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist at M.S. Howells. "Inflation is not a problem fundamentally, but psychologically, it's caused some huge whipsaws in the mind-sets of stock traders."

DOJ_NMG_0082685

Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings and Chicago Board of Trade parent CBOT Holdings jumped 2.6% and 13%, respectively, after the exchanges said they would merge.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 3/32, or 93.8 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.774%.

The dollar weakened, to 118.86 yen from 119.12 yen. The euro rose against it to $1.2548 from $1.2532.

Elder Bush Calls Economy Strong But Consumers Unsure (DMN)

By Karen Robinson-jacobs

The Dallas Morning News, October 18, 2006

Former President George Bush said Tuesday that although he believes the U.S. economy is strong, he's worried that the average citizen might not be getting that message.

Speaking at a restaurant industry conference in Dallas, Mr. Bush pointed to third-quarter earnings gains, robust growth in the gross domestic product and "unemployment that has fallen to good levels."

"The unmistakable picture that those statistics mean to me is that the economy is strong," the 41st president told attendees of the Multi-Unit Foodservice Operators conference, who gave him a standing ovation when he entered the room.

"There is a concerted effort to make it appear that the economy is bad," said Mr. Bush, the father of President George W. Bush.

The economy is a key concern to the restaurant industry, especially the casual-dining segment, which includes Dallas-based Brinker International Inc. and Carlson Restaurants Worldwide, which owns the T.G.I. Friday's brand.

That segment, more so than the fast-food sector, has suffered as consumers cut back due to higher energy costs and rising interest rates.

The former president, a Republican who lost his bid for re-election in 1992 to Democrat Bill Clinton, was mindful of the impact of economic perceptions .

"The economy had gotten a lot better," he said of the period during his final campaign. "I wasn't a good enough communicator.

"The perception of the economy is what controls the election," he said. "The economy will ultimately determine the outcome of the election."

Mr. Bush joked that for eight years after leaving office, he avoided publicly criticizing the next presidential administration.

"I've obviously extended that same courtesy to the current president," he said.

Although Mr. Bush's speech touched briefly on food themes – mostly to joke about his wife cooking fish – it was his comments about a partnership with Mr. Clinton that seemed to connect with many audience members.

Speaking of the work the two are doing to raise money for victims of floods, hurricanes and other natural disasters, Mr. Bush compared Mr. Clinton's energy level to that of the Energizer bunny, adding, "It's been a joy working with him."

Talk Of Raising Gas Tax Is Just That (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

There might be a simple way to trim U.S. oil imports, reduce greenhouse-gas emissions, encourage alternatives to petroleum and ease world energy shortages.

The method: raising taxes on gasoline or crude oil. Economists and policy experts across the political spectrum think it's a good idea. And with gasoline prices falling, now might be the perfect time to do it without eliciting cries of pain from U.S. drivers who have become somewhat accustomed to high fuel prices.

But on the long road to a new energy policy, the idea of a higher gasoline or crude-oil tax is just another bit of roadkill.

Because of the thorny politics of raising taxes, the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal gas levy hasn't changed since Oct. 1, 1993. And few policy experts expect a higher tax soon.

DOJ_NMG_0082686

"We know the broad contours of some things that have to happen," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former director of the Congressional Budget Office who is now at the Council on Foreign Relations. "You have to price oil on a permanent basis to provide incentives to shift away from it. It's the key issue -- and the hardest one to make progress on."

Leon E. Panetta, a former congressman and President Bill Clinton's first budget director, sees things the same way.

"I don't think there's any question that as a matter of policy it makes a lot of sense to move in that direction," he said. "But politically it's a very high hurdle to get over."

Panetta knows from experience. When Clinton took office, Vice President Al Gore argued for a big gas-tax increase to promote conservation, and many administration members agreed, Panetta recalled. But, he said, "there were also those like Treasury Secretary [Lloyd] Bentsen who said, 'Are you out of your mind?' "

By the time Congress was done, what started out as a 50-cent-a-gallon proposal ended up as a 4.3-cent-a-gallon increase. Since then, just to keep up with inflation, the tax would have had to rise 6 cents, but it hasn't budged.

Many economists support oil taxes because otherwise the prices paid by consumers do not include costs -- such as pollution -- that society pays separately. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) has estimated that the U.S. military cost of protecting Middle East oil supplies runs around $50 billion a year.

Such hidden costs were called "externalities" by the British economist Arthur Pigou. N. Gregory Mankiw, an economics professor at Harvard University and former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has created his own Pigou Club, which he describes as "an elite group of economists and pundits with the good sense to have publicly advocated higher Pigovian taxes, such as gasoline taxes or carbon taxes." But the club exists only on his Web site.

One member is Kenneth S. Rogoff, a Harvard economics professor and former chief economist of the International Monetary Fund. "A sharp hike in energy taxes on gasoline and other fossil fuels would not only help improve the government's balance sheet, but it would also be a way to start addressing global warming," Rogoff wrote before the IMF and World Bank meetings in Singapore last month. "What better way for new U.S. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, a card-carrying environmentalist, to make a dramatic entrance onto the world policy stage?"

But for now, Paulson has left a gasoline tax increase waiting in the wings.

One illustration of political gridlock on the issue is a new Council on Foreign Relations task force report on how U.S. dependence on oil imports undermines U.S. foreign policy. The group agreed that there is a big problem but couldn't agree on how to curb gasoline consumption.

The report listed three approaches: raising gasoline taxes; setting tougher automobile fuel-economy standards; and imposing a nationwide ceiling on gasoline consumption, with people allowed to buy and sell rights to use more than their annual allotments.

"No strategy will be effective without higher prices for transportation fuels or regulatory incentives to use more-efficient vehicles," the report said. But the task force didn't say which of the three it favored and it didn't say how much a tax might be.

Holtz-Eakin, a member of the group, said new efficiency standards would have a delayed effect on consumption because it takes time for auto companies to retool and for people to buy new cars. A higher gasoline tax would have an immediate as well as a long-term effect.

But other members of the group, including Martin S. Feldstein, a Harvard economics professor who was chairman of President Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers, and Charles J. DiBona, former president of the American Petroleum Institute, vigorously oppose gasoline taxes.

"It was not possible to get a consensus," said James R. Schlesinger, a co-chairman of the task force.

Schlesinger, who favors a tax on imported oil, said, "I still have some black and blue marks from 30 years ago," when he was energy secretary for President Jimmy Carter, who proposed a 50-cent increase in federal gasoline taxes. "We were laughed out of the Senate," Schlesinger recalled.

A one-cent federal gas tax was first imposed in 1932. An increase to 9 cents a gallon from 4 cents a gallon was approved by Reagan on Jan. 6, 1983. On Nov. 5, 1990, a reluctant President George H. W. Bush signed a deficit-reduction compromise with the Democratic-controlled Congress that increased the federal gas tax by 5 cents. The budget bill of 1993, signed by Clinton, increased the tax to its current level.

DOJ_NMG_0082687

The politics of a gasoline tax involve two key issues: what to do with the money and how to address the fairness of the tax.

Most of the tax goes to a trust fund used to build highways, which advocacy groups say undermines conservation goals by encouraging more driving. Energy-policy experts say any extra tax money could be used to promote alternative energy or energy-efficiency programs. Because a gasoline tax, like a sales tax, disproportionately hurts low-income people, who pay a larger percentage of their earnings for basics such as fuel, other experts argue that the additional money should be used to give offsetting tax breaks to low-income families.

This year, some new proposals have emerged for limiting gasoline consumption. Lugar has proposed that the government set a $45-a-barrel price floor for crude oil, partly to encourage investment in alternatives such as ethanol.

Feldstein favors giving every adult credits on a debit card but capping the overall consumption level. People could sell spare credits or buy them as needed. Oil companies would be clearinghouses for the program.

Mankiw responded online: "Do we need to create a new administrative bureaucracy because politicians are afraid to use the word 'tax'? I hope not."

Curing The World's Oil Addiction (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

THE FIRST STEP TOWARD CURING an addiction is to admit its existence. So it was encouraging when President Bush admitted in January that "America is addicted to oil." But America hasn't been good about going to recovery meetings — which makes it harder for the U.S. to get the world's other oil addicts to go too.

For China, India, Japan and every other industrial nation, a steady supply of oil is essential to economic growth. And as competition for oil increases, so does the temptation to make it the focus of foreign policy. Bush has warned against the hazards of this approach, and U.S. history — especially in the Middle East — is a catalog of its dangers. But he'd be more convincing, to Americans and other world leaders, if his policy more closely matched his rhetoric.

Now other nations are beginning to do as the U.S. does, not as it says. China has an $8-billion investment in Sudan's oil sector, for example, which helps explain why it turns a blind eye while the thugs who run Sudan ravage Darfur. The argument used to be that as China's economy became more integrated with the world's, it would become a more responsible player in world affairs. This was half right. For the most part, ideology has given way to pragmatism in Chinese foreign policy. Beijing tries to avoid conflict with its biggest trading partner, the United States.

But this same pragmatism also leads China to pursue other policy goals at odds with the U.S. China professes to be genuinely worried about nuclear proliferation, for instance, yet U.S. diplomats have made no headway in persuading Beijing to back U.N. sanctions against Tehran. Perhaps not coincidentally, China imports 11.5% of its oil from Iran and is considering investing at least $70 billion to get more.

And it's not just China competing for oil. Energy-poor Japan is highly dependent on Middle East oil and so was cool toward Israel for decades (relations are better now, but still low-key). India, meanwhile, with 17% of the world's population and just 0.8% of known oil and gas reserves, is also racing to secure supplies. It hosted Venezuelan President (and Bush nemesis) Hugo Chavez last year and signed an oil deal with Venezuela. South Korea gets a third of its oil from Saudi Arabia and is trying to hedge its bets by investing in fields from Venezuela to Vietnam.

The rise of Asian powers — and their pursuit of policies designed to secure a steady supply of oil — is a geopolitical watershed, albeit a predictable one. Even if the U.S. were to reduce its oil dependency, its ability to act multilaterally could be constrained by the energy arrangements of other nations.

For these and other reasons, the development of alternative energy technologies that can reduce demand at home and be exported abroad is both an economic necessity and a national security priority. It's far too important to be left to the environmentalists — or the states, the lobbyists (for nuclear power or ethanol) or even to philanthropists such as Richard Branson. In our globalized economies, lasting peace is unlikely without energy security.

An Oil Habit America Cannot Break (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082688

"Americans can always be counted on to do the right thing . . . after they have exhausted all other possibilities."

-- widely attributed to

Winston Churchill

On energy, we're disproving even this cynical axiom. Our main energy problem is our huge dependence on imported oil.

For years, some remedies have been obvious: Tax oil heavily to spur Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to drive a bit less, raise sharply the government's fuel economy standards so those vehicles are available, and allow more oil and gas drilling. In recent years, we've done none of these things. It's doubtful we will anytime soon. "Other possibilities" seem inexhaustible.

Under present policies, U.S. oil demand will expand 34 percent by 2030, the Energy Department projects. There will be more people, cars, planes and travel. Imports would satisfy all of the increase. We should try to prevent or minimize that. With China and India's oil demand increasing, American restraint would relax pressure on prices and reduce oil's usefulness as a political weapon. Consuming 25 percent of world oil, we're hardly powerless. But instead of doing what we might, we're awash in delusions.

Item: As gasoline prices have receded from $3 a gallon, many Americans attribute the decline to politics. In one Gallup poll, 42 percent of respondents said the Bush administration had manipulated prices to improve Republican prospects in congressional elections. Gee, if the White House could fix prices so easily, why let them rise in the first place? (The drop reflects small shifts in supply and demand: an end to summer driving, high oil inventories and fading fears that Iran will cut supplies.) Item: We're still enthralled by energy "independence" even though -- as a new report from the Council on Foreign Relations makes clear -- it's impossible for "at least several decades." In 1973, President Richard Nixon announced Project Independence, which was to eliminate oil imports by 1980. In 1973, the United States had net oil imports of 6 million barrels a day, 35 percent of our consumption. In 2006, net imports average 12.4 million barrels a day, or 60 percent of use. Nixon's advisers warned him that his goal was unattainable. In the foreseeable future, it still is. Anyone suggesting otherwise is misinformed or dishonest.

No plausible combination of alternative fuels or "conservation" can soon substitute for all that imported oil. Even if that weren't true, many other countries -- most of the world economy to which we are tightly tied -- would remain dependent on oil imports. So we'd be hostage indirectly.

The problem is not that the world will soon run out of oil. Global oil use now totals 31 billion barrels annually. Proven oil reserves are about 1.3 trillion barrels, reports Oil & Gas Journal. That's 42 years of supply at present consumption rates. Yes, consumption is rising -- but more oil will be found. Even when it's all gone, other hydrocarbon deposits can be, at higher prices, converted into oil. John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil, claims that the oil shale in Colorado amounts to another 1 trillion barrels and that Canada's oil sands total 1.3 trillion barrels. Indeed, the oil sands are already producing.

The problem is not even imports. It is that most imports come from countries that are potentially insecure, unstable or hostile. More than 700 billion barrels of reserves, slightly more than half, lie in the Persian Gulf; 80 billion are in Venezuela, 76 billion in the former Soviet Union, 39 billion in Libya. New exploration in these countries is difficult; supply interruptions are an ever-present threat.

Unfortunately, the steps we should take involve immediate political costs -- they'd be unpopular -- while the benefits would emerge slowly and seem modest. Suppose, for example, we opened coastal areas and parts of Alaska, including the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, to drilling. U.S. oil and natural gas production would rise. But the increases would occur only after five or 10 years, and they might merely offset declines in existing U.S. fields. To a casual observer, the benefit would be barely visible.

Or imagine we raised the government's fuel economy standards for new vehicles -- say, from 27.5 miles per gallon for cars to 40 mpg. Because factories can't be converted instantly, the shift would be spread over 10 to 20 years. Replacing today's more than 225 million cars and light trucks would also be gradual and hardly perceptible. We'd also need a tax on fuel of at least $1 to $2 a gallon. Without mandated higher fuel prices, many Americans wouldn't buy more efficient vehicles. They'd recondition bigger sport-utility vehicles and sedans to keep them running. Or more driving would offset potential fuel savings. With low fuel prices in the 1990s, average annual driving per car rose about 1,500 miles, to almost 12,000.

So we probably won't do much about our oil habit. Any realistic proposal would ignite a firestorm of protest. Environmentalists would denounce more drilling. Auto companies would protest new fuel economy standards. Most important, the public would denounce a steep energy tax, even if it were introduced gradually with most proceeds rebated by lowering other taxes (as is desirable). And these unpleasant steps would merely reduce our dependence from what it would otherwise be. It's a hard case to make.

DOJ_NMG_0082689

Because Americans want painless salvation, our politicians proffer visions that promise just that: a shift to hydrogen fuel or a surge in ethanol. The first may be futuristic wishful thinking; the second is mainly a costly giveaway to farmers. Both are deceptions, new excuses not to do the "right thing."

Some Seeing Red Over Red-light Tickets (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, October 18, 2006

Cameras that snap photos of motorists running red lights have been upheld as constitutional by courts in five states and Washington, D.C., but some car owners refuse to concede defeat and are continuing to challenge them.

Red-light cameras — in use in more than 100 cities, according to the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety — have set off furious resistance in many of the cities where they have been installed.

Now it's the city of Chicago's turn. Three Chicago-area car owners are suing the city, which the trio claims ticketed each of them for running red lights even though none of them was at the wheel.

In a class-action lawsuit, Parveen Idris of Bloomingdale and two other plaintiffs say the city's ticketing program is unconstitutional because it cranks out $90 tickets to vehicle owners no matter who is driving the car.

“I have gotten a lot of calls,” says Robert Holstein, one of two attorneys who filed the suit. “People are irate. They weren't driving their vehicle, and they have no way to defend themselves.”

Idris says in the lawsuit she was traveling in Turkey at the time her car was photographed running a red light and she received the ticket in the mail.

Jennifer Hoyle, a spokeswoman for the city's Law Department, says the city expects to prevail in court because other city ordinances that are similarly enforced have survived court challenges.

Opponents in some cities have claimed they were denied their constitutionally protected right to due process because the red-light program presumes — as it does in Chicago— that the vehicle owner is the driver at the time the violation occurs.

State courts in Colorado, Oregon, North Carolina, Iowa and California, as well as the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals and the Superior Court in Washington, D.C., have rejected constitutional challenges to the cameras.

Hoyle compared the red-light tickets to parking tickets, which also are issued to vehicle owners even though the city doesn't know who parked the car.

“As a vehicle owner you have a responsibility to ensure you are not lending your car to someone who will use it illegally,” Hoyle says.

She added that red-light tickets, like parking tickets, are considered by the city to be “administrative tickets,” not moving violations, and can be paid by mail. “It's not something that you have to go to traffic court for. It doesn't count against your driving record as a moving violation,” she says.

Red-light cameras have been credited with reducing front and side crashes by 25%, according to a Federal Highway Administration study last year, but rear-end crashes were found to have increased 15%.

Richard Retting, a spokesman for the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, says some courts have required cities to revise how red-light programs are administered.

In Chicago, opponents also object to the way that the program is operated.

“It's not the camera,” Holstein says. “It's that the ordinance doesn't charge the driver and strips the owner of any defense.” Holstein says Chicago has collected more than $90 million in fines. The suit asks that the fines be refunded in cases in which the car owner was not driving when the offense occurred.

Yes On All Judges (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082690

TWO OF CALIFORNIA'S SEVEN Supreme Court justices are up for retention this year. Carol A. Corrigan was appointed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in January and is facing voters for the first time. Joyce L. Kennard was appointed by former Gov. George Deukmejian in 1989 and has weathered previous elections. Both of these excellent jurists should be retained.

Corrigan is a centrist former Democrat, now a Republican, who led an effort to turn standard legalese jury instructions into more understandable English. A former prosecutor and trial judge, she has written well-reasoned and carefully crafted judicial opinions, and her appointment has moved the court of six Republicans and one Democrat further to the center. Kennard had been a Los Angeles Superior Court judge and state Court of Appeal justice. Tough and probing in oral argument, she writes opinions that are both principled and pragmatic.

California's up-or-down vote on appellate justices is meant to balance judicial independence with public oversight. It doesn't always work out that way; justices tend to either be rubber-stamped at the ballot box or targeted for defeat by single-issue activists. In 1986, voters ousted Chief Justice Rose Bird and associate justices Joseph Grodin and Cruz Reynoso after a campaign focusing on their rulings to delay executions or overturn death sentences. No justices have been tossed out since, but not for lack of trying.

A more subtle danger to the courts' integrity is voters who fail to read up on the justices or, worse, flippantly vote no because of any one of a number of specious reasons. But judicial independence depends on citizens learning as much as possible about the courts and the justices.

California's Court of Appeal is an intermediate court divided into six geographic districts. Justices of the 2nd District hear appeals from trial courts in Los Angeles, Ventura, Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties. The following justices are on the ballot, have served with distinction and deserve a "yes" vote: Robert M. Mallano, Frances Rothschild, Roger W. Boren, Victoria M. Chavez, Patti S. Kitching, Richard D. Aldrich, Norman L. Epstein, Thomas L. Willhite, Nora M. Manella, Steve Suzukawa, Richard M. Mosk, Sandy R. Kriegler, Arthur Gilbert, Dennis M. Perluss, Fred Woods, Laurie D. Zelon, Candace D. Cooper and Madeleine Flier.

For Los Angeles Superior Court, four offices offer voters a choice. For Office No. 8, Bob Henry, a California deputy attorney general, has broad experience in criminal and civil law. For Office No. 18, Daviann Mitchell is a former police officer who now prosecutes gang crimes as a Los Angeles deputy district attorney. Two other current deputy district attorneys also deserve to be elected: Hayden Zacky for Office No. 102 and David W. Stuart for Office No. 144.

Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year (WT/AP)

By Lindsey Tanner, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO -- Harmful reactions to some of the most widely used medicines -- from insulin to a common antibiotic -- sent more than 700,000 Americans to emergency rooms each year, landmark government research shows.

Accidental overdoses and allergic reactions to prescription drugs were the most frequent cause of serious illnesses, according to the study, the first to reveal the nationwide scope of the problem. People older than 65 faced the greatest risks.

"This is an important study because it reinforces the really substantial risks that there are in everyday use of drugs," said patient-safety specialist Bruce Lambert, a professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's college of pharmacy.

Even so, the study authors and other experts agreed that the 700,000 estimate was conservative because severe drug reactions can often be misdiagnosed.

The study found that a small group of pharmaceutical mainstays was most commonly implicated, including insulin for diabetes; warfarin for clotting problems; and amoxicillin, a penicillinlike antibiotic used for all kinds of infections.

"These are old drugs, which are known to be extremely effective. We could not and would not want to live without them. But you've got to get the dose exactly right," Mr. Lambert said. He was not involved in the research.

Those 65 and older faced more than double the risk of requiring emergency-room treatment and were nearly seven times more likely to be admitted to the hospital than younger patients.

The results, from 2004 to '05, represent the first two years of data from a national surveillance project on outpatient drug safety. The project was developed by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the Food and Drug Administration and the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission. The study was published in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

DOJ_NMG_0082691

The database included 63 nationally representative hospitals that reported 21,298 severe drug reactions among U.S. adults and children treated in emergency rooms during the two-year period. The tally is based on what emergency-room doctors said were complications from using prescription drugs, over-the-counter medicines, dietary supplements or herbal treatments.

The researchers said that when those numbers are extrapolated, it brings the total to 701,547 complications nationwide each year.

"Experts had thought that severe outpatient drug events were common, but no one really had good numbers" until now, said lead author Dr. Daniel Budnitz, a CDC researcher.

Complications included diabetics on insulin passing out from low blood sugar, excessive bleeding in patients on warfarin, and severe skin rashes in patients taking amoxicillin. Drug reactions were severe enough to require hospitalization in about 17 percent of patients.

"The numbers are quite troubling," said Jim Conway, senior vice president at the Institute for Healthcare Improvement. The tally underscores that "there is a tremendous number of consumers in the United States taking medication."

Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits (LAT)

By Lisa Girion, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

The big insurer, accused of illegally canceling some policies, agrees to pay its ex-customers.

Facing the threat of punishment from regulators, Blue Cross of California has agreed to settle more than 70 lawsuits and claims filed by patients who accused the state's largest health insurer of illegally canceling their coverage after they got sick.

The settlements will allow the former policyholders to pay hefty medical bills that they were stuck with after losing their insurance.

Lawyers involved in the cases, who confirmed that they had been resolved, said the dollar amounts of the settlements were confidential.

In exchange for the money, the patients agreed to drop allegations that Blue Cross had terminated their coverage to avoid paying for treatment.

The accords could be part of an effort by Blue Cross to deflect public criticism, mollify regulators and avoid courtroom showdowns, although critics say the insurer still needs to reform its practices.

State regulators have fined Blue Cross in one case of canceled coverage, and more sanctions are expected.

Blue Cross, owned by Indianapolis-based WellPoint Inc., the nation's largest provider of health benefits, maintained that it was following the law. It declined to comment on the suits, saying talks to settle them were confidential.

William Shernoff, a Claremont lawyer representing many of the plaintiffs, said his clients wouldn't have to worry about medical bills ever again.

"Every one of our clients is pleased," he said. "But that's only half the story. The other half of the story is making sure it doesn't happen again and getting the right procedures in place."

The settlements follow a series of Times stories examining the cancellations and the hardships they caused for patients, their families, hospitals and physicians. Among those agreeing to settlements is a Riverside couple, described in a Sept. 17 article, who were forced to put their home up for sale after they were hit with a mountain of medical bills. Another settlement accord involves the family of a 6-year-old Murrieta girl, also described in the article, who was dropped by the insurer in the midst of treatment for a life-threatening tumor in her jaw.

At issue in the suits is individual health insurance, purchased by people who do not have group coverage through an employer or other organization. Unlike with group insurance, an insurer can deny coverage to a person it deems too risky based on the applicant's medical history and answers to a detailed health questionnaire.

The suits accuse Blue Cross of routinely violating state laws prohibiting insurers from canceling coverage unless a policyholder lied to obtain it. The suits allege that the application questionnaires were intentionally vague and confusing and were designed to trap applicants into making innocent mistakes that could later be used as excuses to cancel coverage. Blue Cross, according to the suits, scrutinized questionnaires only after it received a claim for a costly or potentially chronic condition.

DOJ_NMG_0082692

At least five other health insurers, including Blue Shield of California, face similar lawsuits filed by customers. In recent weeks, two state agencies that oversee the industry have expanded investigations into the alleged practice. Last month the Department of Managed Health Care issued its first fine — $200,000 against Blue Cross — after finding that the company improperly revoked a Southern California woman's policy. The amount of the fine was criticized by consumer advocates as insignificant for WellPoint.

It remains unclear whether the proposed settlements would lead to substantial changes in Blue Cross' business practices or state regulations. Some see the accords as a sign that the state's largest health insurer intends to reform its practices. Others view the settlements as a way for the company to sweep the matter under the rug and move on.

"This is a standard way to avoid setting any precedent for future accountability," said Bryan Liang, director of the Institute of Health Law Studies at California Western School of Law in San Diego. Blue Cross "can easily pay off individuals, and those individuals have to take it to move on with their lives and recover from the horrors of having their health insurance taken away."

Blue Cross, like other insurers, contends that it is allowed to drop policyholders regardless of whether medical history omissions are intentional. The industry says the power to revoke policies is necessary to combat fraud and hold down costs.

Regulators say a policy cannot be canceled for an unintended discrepancy between the policyholder's application and medical records.

Consumer advocates said they feared that unless regulators got tough on insurers, the practice would continue and the opportunity for meaningful reform could be lost.

"Regulators have to come in with a big stick, because otherwise Blue Cross and the other HMOs are going to buy off the individuals," said Jamie Court, president of the Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights, based in Santa Monica. "This has to be about more than money. It's got to be about forcing the companies to uphold the law, and that's the job of the regulators."

Amy Dobberteen, assistant deputy director of the Department of Managed Health Care, said the agency was taking the complaints seriously.

"Our investigations have begun on all major players on a systemic level and on a case-by-case basis," she said. "There's a lot to look into. We've certainly been looking into it diligently, and I don't think we've been moving slowly on this. We're acting."

California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi pledged last spring to investigate Blue Cross' cancellation practices but hasn't reported any findings. A spokesman said Garamendi had heightened scrutiny of Blue Cross.

"We are continuing our probe into retroactive rescissions," said spokesman Norman Williams. "We recently refocused our personnel to look more closely into this issue."

Shernoff, the plaintiffs' attorney, said he would continue to press Blue Cross for substantial changes, such as reviewing an applicant's medical records before issuing coverage and canceling only when the insurer finds evidence that a policyholder intended to defraud the company.

He gave Blue Cross credit for discussing reforms. The company outlined operational changes last month designed to ensure that policies were not revoked in error. It is in discussions with lawyers and regulators on whether those steps adequately address the concerns raised in the suits.

"All the other insurance carriers are in denial," Shernoff said. "Blue Cross at least is not in denial anymore. They are in rehab now."

*

lisa.girion@latimes.com

Pirro: He's A Novice. Cuomo: She's Involved In A 2nd Investigati (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082693

ROCHESTER, Oct. 17 — Jeanine F. Pirro and Andrew M. Cuomo used their second and final debate on Tuesday to exchange personal attacks, with Mr. Cuomo being labeled an untested novice and Ms. Pirro accused of being the target of a second criminal inquiry, adding a new element to a campaign that has come to resemble a soap opera.

Ms. Pirro, the former Westchester County district attorney, was by far the more aggressive, using every opportunity to attack Mr. Cuomo as an inexperienced prosecutor devoid of ethics or integrity.

"I understand what it means to be a top lawyer in this state," Ms. Pirro said at one point. "My opponent was a junior prosecutor 21 years ago."

The hourlong debate was held in the studios of WXXI-TV, a public broadcasting station here, and was cosponsored by the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. The program was taped in the morning and broadcast in the evening on public broadcasting stations in most of the state. In the New York City area, it was to be shown at 12:30 a.m. Wednesday, on a public broadcasting station.

For his part, Mr. Cuomo cast Ms. Pirro as a career politician with little experience outside criminal prosecution. He also offered a new attack against his Republican rival.

He cited an article in The New York Sun on Tuesday detailing a letter written by John Spencer, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate, when Mr. Spencer was mayor of Yonkers. The article stated that Mr. Spencer wrote a 15-page letter to Attorney General Eliot Spitzer accusing Ms. Pirro of using her position as district attorney to protect public officials from scandal and to punish political opponents.

"The office she's seeking is investigating her," Mr. Cuomo said.

Immediately after the debate, Cuomo campaign aides supplied copies of the article to reporters in the television studio, and Mr. Spitzer's office said it had an "open investigation" into the matter. Mr. Spencer's letter, which was written three years ago, said Ms. Pirro "protects the corrupt officials, punishes the weak people caught in the corrupt web and insures that they are not in a position to point fingers."

Ms. Pirro did not address the matter during the debate. Reporters asked her afterward about her reaction to Mr. Cuomo's charges about Mr. Spencer's letter.

"I don't know what he's talking about," Ms. Pirro said. "I guess Mr. Cuomo thinks John Spencer is someone he should endorse. If he's that credible."

In the debate, however, Ms. Pirro, who is trailing in the polls, was relentless in her criticism of Mr. Cuomo, using every question as a fresh opportunity to make an attack.

She hammered repeatedly at Mr. Cuomo's ethics, charging that while housing secretary, he pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials in an agreement signed by Mr. Cuomo's counsel. Years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign.

On several occasions, Ms. Pirro said Mr. Cuomo lacked the integrity needed to pursue major reforms in Albany.

"My opponent's reform agenda, which is to do what I say and not what I do, is the height of hypocrisy."

In response, Mr. Cuomo said: "My opponent is very good at making false, reckless charges. I've released 14 years of tax returns to show that."

Ms. Pirro shot back: "I've released 12 years of tax returns. In order to be a trial lawyer, you need to have your facts in order to convey them to a jury."

Mr. Cuomo steered away from the topic that has been consuming the Pirro campaign, that she is now the subject of a federal investigation into whether she planned to secretly tape her husband to determine if he was having an affair. Ms. Pirro has responded to the matter by disclosing their marital problems, and recently her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., has joined in, publicly chronicling their difficulties in often painful detail.

During the debate, Ms. Pirro touched on the topic only once, when asked by one questioner about the relevance of personal issues.

DOJ_NMG_0082694

"All families have problems," Ms. Pirro said. "And I think these issues are personal and they should not be the subject of federal inquiries. I deserve to be judged on my record as a strong woman who believes in reforming Albany and who not just talks about it." She then attacked Mr. Cuomo over his dealings with Mr. Farkas.

By relentlessly attacking Mr. Cuomo, Ms. Pirro appeared intent on raising questions about his capacity to be attorney general and on continuing her slight climb in the polls, where she continues to trail by double digit figures.

"My opponent is a self-described nonpracticing lawyer," Ms. Pirro said in her closing statement. "The choice can't be more clear," she said, adding that she wanted to be "the first woman attorney general of this state."

Mr. Cuomo sought to rise above the fray, appearing unruffled by the attacks. He seemed far more comfortable when he was discussing topics such as the need for an independent commission to end partisan legislative redistricting and the need to make financial information regarding lawmakers and lobbyists more accessible to the public.

In fact, some of Mr. Cuomo's supporters at the debate suggested that his aim was to remain positive and to limit his attacks on Ms. Pirro, reasoning that many viewers, particularly women, might react negatively.

Still, Mr. Cuomo responded to Ms. Pirro's attacks with some of his own, particularly on Mr. Spencer's letter to Mr. Spitzer. Mr. Cuomo said that Mr. Spencer "accused my opponent of using her prosecutorial office to play politics in Westchester. That, to me, is a serious issue."

As they did in their first debate, on Sunday in Manhattan, both candidates said they would prosecute Alan G. Hevesi, the state comptroller, for using a state worker to drive his ailing wife.

Elections May Leave Bush An Early Lame Duck (WP)

By Peter Baker And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

On desks around the West Wing sit digital clocks counting down the days and hours left in the Bush presidency, reminders to the White House staff to use the time left as effectively as possible. As of 8 a.m. today, those clocks will read 825 days, four hours. But if the elections go the way pollsters and pundits predict, they might as well read 20 days.

At least that would be the end of George W. Bush's presidency as he has known it. If Democrats win one or both houses of Congress on Nov. 7, the result will transform the remainder of Bush's time in office and dramatically shift the balance of power in Washington. Ending a dozen years basically passed in exile, congressional Democrats would have a chance to help steer the nation again -- following a campaign spent mostly assailing Bush's vision rather than detailing their own.

Around Washington, key figures in both parties have been trying to figure out what a Democratic victory would mean. Bush has been meeting privately with Cabinet secretaries in recent weeks to map out an agenda for his final two years in office. The White House says it is not making contingency plans for a Democratic win, but Bush advisers are bracing for what they privately recognize is the increasing likelihood. And Democratic leaders have been conferring about what they would do should voters return them to power.

Emboldened by victory, and bitter from grievance, Democrats could use their ascendance to block Bush's agenda, force him to respond to theirs and begin a new era of aggressive oversight and investigation. A Democratic victory, analysts in both parties said, could mean that some of Bush's tax cuts would not be renewed, attempts to revive his Social Security investment plan would be doomed and efforts to further broaden national security powers in the face of civil liberties concerns would be thwarted.

Most worrisome to the White House is the subpoena power that Democrats would gain with a majority in the House or Senate. For years, Republicans have been mostly deferential in scrutinizing the Bush administration, but Democrats are eager to reexamine an array of issues, such as Vice President Cheney's energy task force, the Jack Abramoff scandal and preparations for the Iraq war.

"It obviously affects things a lot," said Charles Black, a Republican lobbyist with ties to the White House. "History tells you that administrations have a hard time achieving things in their last two years. I think the president wants to be as aggressive as he can with a good menu of ideas.

"If he had to deal with a Democratic majority in one house or both," Black added, it makes it that much harder.

DOJ_NMG_0082695

Steve Elmendorf, a former House Democratic leadership aide, said of Bush, "He would lose control of his agenda. He would have to make a decision: Does he want to compromise and work cooperatively with the Democrats, or does he want to keep pushing what he's been pushing and lose all the time?"

The most salient analogy may be the last time Congress changed hands, after the 1994 elections. President Bill Clinton was left trying to assert that "the Constitution gives me relevance" even as new House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and his Republicans seized the initiative. Clinton ultimately recovered through a mixture of confrontation with Republicans, most notably in a government shutdown, and "triangulation" in which he embraced some of their priorities, such as overhauling the welfare system.

The difference is that Clinton's presidency was still young, while Bush is heading into the twilight of his administration -- and is stuck in an unpopular war. But some Republicans think that Bush could play off overreaching Democrats as Clinton did with Gingrich. Or he could pivot to the more bipartisan mode he promised to bring from Texas and seize opportunities for progress in areas such as immigration, where his proposed guest-worker program has been blocked by his own party.

"One of the lessons for President Bush if he loses one or both chambers is the California example," said Sergio Bendixen, a pollster for Democrats. "Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger at this time in 2005 was considered to be in deep trouble. But now he is a shoo-in for reelection. How did he turns things around? He has gone from a very partisan Republican to somebody who was working with the other party. I wouldn't be surprised if Bush does the same thing."

John Bridgeland, a former Bush domestic policy adviser consulted by the White House in recent planning, said that regardless of who wins the election, the president would benefit from cooperating across party lines. "Without doing so, it will be more difficult to get things done that will be lasting," he said. "You can do things by executive order, but they may not survive into other administrations."

Bipartisanship, though, has been in short supply since Bush became president. In his first term, he negotiated support from both sides for his No Child Left Behind education law even as Democrats took control of the Senate in June 2001 because of a party switch. But as a practical matter, Bush faced an opposition chamber in Congress for just 98 days before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, after which both parties rallied behind him for a time. Republicans won back the Senate in 2002.

Bush has had a difficult enough time winning support from a Republican Congress over the past two years, and some expect the party to turn on him even more if it loses, particularly because of the Iraq war, which has been an albatross for GOP candidates. When the voting is done, pressure may rise from within Bush's own ranks to rethink Iraq policy, as evidenced by comments by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who recently said that Bush should take a new course if the situation does not improve in 60 to 90 days.

But presidents have broad leeway to set foreign policy regardless of the legislative branch, and a Democratic Congress may exert more direct influence on domestic matters. Bush has been preparing his post-election agenda in a series of meetings, sitting down one-on-one with nine members of his Cabinet in the past month to review ideas. Bush insists that the sessions not consider a victory by Democrats, participants said. But the discussions have focused on items that could attract bipartisan interest, such as further efforts to rebuild the hurricane-torn Gulf Coast, reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and renewal of farm legislation.

"He's fired up for the last two years of his administration," Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said in an interview after meeting with Bush. Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said after his own session: "He's pushing all of us, pushing himself. I don't think there's going to be any letup."

Bush aides recognize that no matter who wins next month, the president has at best a year to push through any last major initiatives before the 2008 presidential race takes over the national political agenda. Portman, a former House member, said he hopes there will be "a timeout on partisanship" after next month's election that can be exploited in 2007. "It's a critical year," he said.

The agenda-planning meetings are the brainchild of White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, who handed out the countdown clocks to fellow Bush aides earlier this year. Bolten wants to use the process to develop new ideas and find ways to measure the success of old ones, colleagues said.

DOJ_NMG_0082696

"There's still plenty of time to get important things done if people on both sides of the aisle are willing to work together to do it," Deputy White House Chief of Staff Joel Kaplan said in an interview. "Two years is a long time." After the election, Kaplan said, Bush will "look for partners in Congress" to accomplish priorities, such as extending his tax cuts, developing alternative energy supplies and promoting American competitiveness.

The question in the White House is whether Democrats would be willing to be partners. While Democrats see Bush as relentlessly partisan, his aides think Democrats have been deliberately obstructionist even on issues of little dispute. Against that backdrop of mutual suspicion, the two sides may find it difficult to come together.

"The Democrats are so blinded by their hate of Bush, they'll have a hard time even having a bill-signing with him," Republican lobbyist Ed Rogers said. "That might make for some good political contrasts, but not much substance."

Ron Kaufman, who was White House political director for George H.W. Bush, said: "If they try to take down the president, if you will, it would be really stupid. It would play into the long-term interests of the Republican Party."

Leon E. Panetta, who became Clinton's White House chief of staff after the 1994 Republican victory, agreed: "My fear is that the Democrats after 12 years of trench warfare and a pretty rough time -- these people are pretty battle-scarred from that -- basically come out and seek vengeance for everything that's taken place. If they do that, I think they make a pretty big mistake because the public will say, 'These guys are no different than Tom DeLay and his crowd.' "

Others doubt the Democrats would make that mistake. Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.), who squared off against Panetta in that era, said Democrats would be in better shape to transition from opposition to governing than his Republicans were in 1994 because enough seasoned veterans are still around, such as Rep. John D. Dingell (Mich.).

"The best Democrats, people like Dingell, on oversight have a tendency to say, 'Let's get into the programs and see how they work and how they could be better,' " he said. "That's healthy oversight. . . . They may stay away from political oversight looking for scandals and stay with programmatic oversight. They do it well and they may want to play against expectations."

No Spoils For The Victors (NYT)

By Bruce Bartlett

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

GREAT FALLS, Va.

EVEN before the Mark Foley scandal broke, Democrats' chances of getting control of the House of Representatives were pretty good. Now, with the incompetence of the Republican leadership's handling of that affair, the odds of Democratic control are looking very good indeed.

With liberals like New York's Charlie Rangel in line to head important House committees like the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, some investors are starting to worry about tax increases on the rich and business bashing-legislation. Needless to say, Republicans are doing what they can to stoke such fears.

As a Republican, I have a message for those fearful of Democratic control: don't worry. Nothing dreadful is going to happen. Liberals have much less to gain than they believe.

I speak with some knowledge. In 1994, after Republicans took control of Congress, my fellow conservatives and I met to plan a legislative agenda. My colleagues were ecstatic. In one fell swoop we were going to do all the things that Democratic control of Congress had effectively blocked since 1954, when the last Republican Congress was defeated.

I didn't make myself very popular by reminding people that Bill Clinton was still going to be president for at least another two years. How were we going to get these measures enacted into law over his all-but-certain veto? Flush with victory and convinced that they had a mandate from the American people to pass a conservative legislative agenda, my friends simply dismissed my concerns as defeatist.

Well, Cassandra wasn't very popular, either, but she was right, and so was I. Within a year, the conservative revolution was all but over. When Republicans forced a showdown with Mr. Clinton over the budget, they ended up blinking. After that, Republicans in Congress lost their reformist zeal and settled into playing the political game pretty much the same way the Democrats had for the previous 40 years: using federal money to buy votes to hold on to power any way possible.

DOJ_NMG_0082697

My Democratic friends no doubt feel the way we Republicans did in those heady days of 1994 before political reality came knocking. Many probably think they will finally get the truth about what the White House knew about Iraq before the invasion. They may think they can use the power of the purse to force a withdrawal. Some may even imagine that articles of impeachment can be brought against President Bush, while others plan to enact national health insurance and other pet liberal schemes.

To all this I say: Ain't gonna happen. For starters, President Bush will still occupy the White House for the next two years. And although his veto pen may have been misplaced for most of the last six years, he found it again this summer.

For another thing, Democrats are unlikely to get more than a very thin majority in the House. If they get the Senate as well, it will not be with more than a one-vote margin. Consequently, effective control will be in the hands of moderates who often work with Republicans on specific issues. In a delicious bit of irony, Senator Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, lately excoriated by the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, may end up holding the balance of power in the Senate.

As for impeachment and cutting money for Iraq, such actions would be politically insane and the Democratic leadership knows it. They will make the White House pay a price for Iraq, but will ensure that they don't get blamed for any debacle resulting from failure to provide adequate money for our troops.

Democrats may have more success using Congressional committees to investigate accusations of wrongdoing by the Bush administration, but that will be much harder than they think. The Republicans cut thousands of committee staff positions when they took control, and it will take considerable time to find the money and staff to do any serious investigating.

Also, the Bush White House can simply use all the stalling techniques that the Clinton White House perfected to frustrate Congressional investigations by Republicans. The only thing left to worry about is expiration of the Bush tax cuts, which Democrats will certainly not want to extend. But most of them don't expire until 2010, so there is no urgency. Anyway, there is no certainty that continued Republican control of Congress would assure extension of the tax cuts. If party control were all that mattered, they would have been extended already.

In short, there is really no reason for conservatives, businessmen or investors to worry particularly about a Democratic victory in November. Congress will be on automatic pilot for the next two years regardless of which party is in control.

Which Way To Win? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

As we head toward Election Day 2006, political analysts are focusing on a few dozen tossup races that will determine whether the Democrats take the House and Senate. But there's a larger, overarching battle this year between two visions of America: testing whether it's a country defined by its political center or one defined by its political extremes.

This assessment of America's meta-politics is distilled in "The Way to Win," a new book by two of the media's best political observers, Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post. They see two basic strategic ideas at work in today's politics: the "synthesizer" approach of former president Bill Clinton, and the "clarifier" tactics of President Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove. Here's the way Halperin and Harris describe the two styles:

"Clinton Politics is the politics of the center. It holds that Americans for the most part, with the exception of irate groups at the edges, are less interested in ideology than in practical solutions to basic problems. People would prefer politics to be polite, civil, and compromise-minded."

"Bush Politics is the politics of the base," the authors continue. "A successful leader will stand forthrightly on one side of a grand argument. Then he or she will win that argument by sharpening the differences and rallying his most intense supporters to his side."

People from the Old Media, like me, instinctively prefer a centrist style of civilized debate. Of course we do, say Halperin and Harris. We are the gatekeepers of the old order. The shrill voices of the New Media -- the bloggers and talk-radio hosts and other partisan megaphones that Halperin and Harris describe as the "Freak Show" -- don't just threaten our beloved center. They might eventually put us out of business.

DOJ_NMG_0082698

So what's working this campaign season? As I read this year's races, the centrist approach seems to be making something of a comeback. I base that judgment on a sampling of several dozen campaign ads that have been gathered by washingtonpost.com (available at http://projects.washingtonpost.com/politicalads/). This survey shows that even in some of the key tossup races, many candidates are looking for that warm and fuzzy place in the middle of the political landscape.

Take Rep. Harold Ford, a candidate for the U.S. Senate in Tennessee. He's running even with Republican Bob Corker in part by holding the middle ground as a "values" Democrat. One ad shows him in church, with this endearingly honest opening line: "I started church the old-fashioned way: I was forced to." Corker's ads, out of the Rove playbook, take a sharper line, summed up in one spot with the phrase: "Who's he kidding?" Despite the attack ads, Ford is running far better than expected.

In Missouri, the Republican incumbent, Sen. Jim Talent, seems to be trying to find the center as well. One ad touts his nonpartisanship: "Most people don't care if you're Red or Blue, Republican or Democrat," says the ad, which boasts of legislation Talent has co-sponsored with Democratic colleagues such as Ron Wyden, Chris Dodd and Chuck Schumer.

Talent's move to the center is countered by his opponent, Claire McCaskill, who has highlighted Talent's opposition to stem cell research in poignant ads featuring Missourians with medical problems who might be helped by such research.

In Montana, Democrat Jon

Tester is running ahead of Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by presenting himself as the ultimate regular guy, a lumpy ex-farmer with a bad haircut. One of his spots, "Creating a Buzz," actually celebrates his crew cut. In Maryland, meanwhile, Republican Senate challenger Michael Steele may have the ultimate mindless, warm-and-fuzzy pitch, in which he rebuts a fake newspaper story, "Steele Hates Puppies," by holding a cute little mutt and saying: "For the record, I love puppies."

The great synthesizer himself, Bill Clinton, was out campaigning this week for Deval Patrick, a member of the Clinton Justice Department who is running for governor of Massachusetts. "Everyone knows that, somehow, the wheel has run off of our national discourse and our common life," Clinton said Monday. "And people don't want us to shout at each other any more. They want to be talked to, reasoned with, lifted up."

Is Clinton right about the country? Are Democrats doing well in this campaign season because Americans want to find their way back to the civilized center? Or are they profiting from the Democratic base's rage at George W. Bush? That's the troubling question that lingers after reading Halperin and Harris's book: If the Democrats win next month, will they be the heirs of Clinton's vision of politics or of Rove's? Are we heading for unity or even sharper division?

What Democrats Would Do (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Against their better judgment, the Democrats are starting to taste it. In the House, the number of Republican incumbents polling under 50 percent considerably exceeds the number of seats the Democrats need to pick up to make Nancy Pelosi speaker. Controlling the Senate depends on winning two of the contests in three Upper South states -- Missouri, Tennessee, Virginia -- that could go either way.

And then what? Putting a fleet of carts before a herd of horses, let's look at the legislation that the Democrats would push through the House and just maybe through the Senate. (Even if they win the upper house, of course, they'll still need the support of a number of Republicans to overcome a filibuster.)

In the House, the Democrats have made clear that there's a first tier of legislation they mean to bring to a vote almost immediately after the new Congress convenes. It includes raising the minimum wage, repealing the Medicare legislation that forbids the government from negotiating with drug companies for lower prices, replenishing student loan programs, funding stem cell research and implementing those recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that have thus far languished.

All these measures command massive popular support. The reason they've not been enacted is that House Republicans have passed rules making it impossible for the Democrats to offer amendments to any significant legislation, thereby sparing themselves the indignity of having to choose, say, between the interests of their financial backers in the drug industry and their constituents.

DOJ_NMG_0082699

Cognizant that they will owe their victory in part to the public's revulsion at the way Congress does (or avoids) business, the Democrats also plan to revise House rules to enable the opposition party to introduce amendments and to sit on conference committees, from which Republicans have routinely excluded them since Tom DeLay became majority leader. They also will ban members from accepting gifts and paid trips from lobbyists.

By bringing such measures to a vote in the House, and conceivably in the Senate as well, the Democrats will be in the enviable position of doing both good and well: promoting long-overdue policy shifts that the public supports and putting their Republican colleagues in a pickle. Confronted with an up-or-down vote on raising the minimum wage or making medication for seniors more affordable, many Republicans will side with the Democrats. Should the Democrats win the Senate, Republicans will have to calculate the risks of filibustering such mom-and-apple-pie measures. These bills will also pose a conundrum for conservatives such as John McCain, whose presidential aspirations have not been clouded by having to vote on these issues.

Should they make it through both houses, many of these measures will face a presidential veto. George W. Bush has already vetoed stem cell legislation, and he has staunchly opposed raising the minimum wage since the day he entered politics. What will congressional Republicans do if they're confronted with a series of vetoes of popular legislation? How large will the lame duck president loom in their calculations?

Not every issue that the Democrats will address if they control Congress will be so easy. The war in Iraq -- to which, if they win, they will owe their victory -- will surely prove the most nettlesome. If the Baker-Hamilton commission recommends a phased withdrawal, as some reports have speculated, the Democrats may be handed a relatively easy way out, whether or not the administration goes along with it. Should the administration persist in staying the course, Congress then could pass the kind of legislation it passed in the last years of the Vietnam War, stipulating the kinds of uses to which our military spending could -- and could not -- be put. At the same time, the ranking House Democrats in military matters -- Pennsylvania's John Murtha and Missouri's Ike Skelton -- might seek to increase the size of the Army, which the Iraq war has shown to be stretched to its limits.

In the course of this year's campaign, Democrats have been pleasantly surprised by the support their proposals for greater energy independence have won in all regions and sectors of the country. They will surely boost funding for alternative energy projects, which they see as a way not just to reduce greenhouse gases but to generate jobs as well. Many congressional Democrats also want to mandate stricter fuel efficiency standards, traditionally a cause that some auto-state Democrats have opposed, even though the Big Three's resistance to such standards is one reason their sales are plummeting.

"We're kidding around if we don't deal with that issue," says one leading Hill Democrat. "The time for that debate has arrived." It's part and parcel, he hopes, of life in the majority.

Rove Foresees GOP Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

White House political strategist Karl Rove yesterday confidently predicted that the Republican Party would hold the House and the Senate in next month's elections, dismissing fallout from the sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley.

At a luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times, Mr. Rove -- who is widely credited as the architect of the party's historic 2002 midterm election gains -- said Republicans are beginning to make significant headway in defining their party's differences from congressional Democrats, especially on national security.

"I'm confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House. The Foley matter has impact in some limited districts, but the research we have shows that people are differentiating between a vote for their congressman and a member from Florida," Mr. Rove said, referring to the Republican who resigned last month after his sexually explicit online messages to former congressional pages were discovered.

President Bush has begun to paint this year's election as a choice between strength and weakness on national security -- and the stark differences will show Americans the true nature of Democrats, Mr. Rove said.

"It is useful to remind people what [Democrats] said and what they do. I think they have given us here, especially in the last couple of weeks, a potent set of votes to talk about. You had 90 percent of House Democrats voting against the terrorist-surveillance program, nearly three-quarters of Senate Democrats and 80 percent of House Democrats voting against the terrorist-interrogation act. Something is fundamentally flawed."

DOJ_NMG_0082700

In the hourlong interview, Mr. Rove was upbeat, telling stories from the campaign trail and joking about skewed political coverage that disproportionately shows Democrats poised to take control of Congress

Mr. Rove's optimism is not shared by pollsters, many of whom predict a Republican loss in the House -- with some saying the party could lose as many as 40 seats. The mood in the White House has shifted in recent days, with some beginning to concede the threat to the Republican majority in the House of Representatives, which they won in 1994.

Yesterday, Vice President Dick Cheney acknowledged the risk to the House Republican majority.

"I really think we're going to do reasonably well. And I think we'll hold the Senate, and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," Mr. Cheney said on Rush Limbaugh's top-rated national radio program.

"I think the key will be who goes to the polls on Election Day. And certainly, it's always tough when you're in the midterm of your second presidential term in office."

But Mr. Rove said Republican candidates still hold a huge cash edge over Democrats, which will give them clout in the final three weeks of the campaign.

"This morning, I loved it: The [Associated Press] ran a story saying these Democrat congressional candidates outraised their Republican incumbents in the third quarter. Well, what they didn't say was that part of the reason that they did is that we raised the money earlier so that we'd be able to deploy it," he said.

Of the 52 races listed in the tossup and lean categories of a leading election analyst, Republican candidates have more cash on hand than their opponents do in at least 34 races, according to the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Although Mr. Rove had previously predicted a loss of eight to 10 House seats, he said he remains confident that Republicans will not lose more than 15 -- the magic number that would flip control of the chamber to Democrats.

Democrats have to pick up six seats to gain control of the Senate -- virtually impossible, Mr. Rove said.

There are 40 Republican senators who are not up for re-election this year, he pointed out, and at least seven who are running comfortably ahead. With just a few wins by incumbents -- such as Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Virginia Sen. George Allen -- Republicans would have 50 seats. With Mr. Cheney's tiebreaking vote, that would assure Republicans' continued control of the Senate.

Although Mr. Talent is locked in a tight race, Mr. Rove said the Missouri Republican "is one of the best candidates ... keen and smart and able ... a very disciplined candidate."

Although Missouri is "very competitive," Mr. Rove said, "There gets to be a point at which, though, it begins to lock in, and Talent appears to be moving that direction. ... I look at the Missouri data, and I can just smell that this race is edging toward a point where ... they're just getting ready to lock in."

The White House strategist is closely monitoring races across the country. He receives "68 polls a week for Senate, governor and House races," Mr. Rove said. "My head is about ready to explode."

Mr. Rove said history is on the Republican Party's side, noting that 97.5 percent of incumbents have been re-elected since 1996. This time, he said, there are "significantly" fewer open House seats than the Democrats had in 1994, when Republicans swept to power under then-Rep. Newt Gingrich's leadership.

Early in this campaign cycle, Mr. Rove said the White House compiled a list of 80 Republican incumbents who might face difficulty. From there, top strategists made sure "that they all had a campaign plan, that they all knew that they had a risk, that they all went out there and raised a bundle of money, and that they had a plan that was measurable."

"As a result, that's done a lot to get people prepared," he said.

And, in some ways, the campaign is just beginning, Mr. Rove added.

"For most Americans, particularly the marginal voters who are going to determine the outcome of the election, it started a couple weeks ago," he said. "Between now and the election, we will spend $100 million in target House and Senate races in the next 21 days."

Cheney Unsure Of GOP Control Of Congress (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0082701

AP, October 18, 2006

President Bush says flatly that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate in the November elections. Vice President Dick Cheney doesn't sound quite so certain.

"I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," the vice president said Tuesday in an interview with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh.

In the House, Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to gain control. In the Senate, they need six.

Cheney was asked if he felt frustrated that Republicans are speculating on how may House seats they might lose.

"Well, I think it's a natural, normal situation at this stage," Cheney said. "But I really think we're going to do reasonably well. ... I think the key will be who goes to the polls on Election Day."

The vice president said that "it's always tough when you're in the midterm of your second presidential term in office. Historically, those are the most difficult elections for the incumbents in the White House."

There Goes The GOP Base — And Probably Both Houses (HILL)

The Hill, October 18, 2006

The Republican base, that vaunted entity whose every mood swing has controlled the zigs and zags of the Bush administration policy, has moved out, according to the latest Gallup polling. Karl Rove's heroic efforts to preserve its fealty have failed to move Republican base voters. Karl cannot compensate for Bush's failure to project his issues as the midterm disaster for the Republican Party nears.

The Gallup poll of Oct. 6-8 shows that, in the wake of the Foley scandal, the number of "white frequent churchgoers" who are planning to vote Republican has dropped from 58 percent to 47 percent since last month. The margin of their support for Republicans over Democrats, 26 percentage points in September, has entirely disappeared and the parties are tied among this core element of the Republican base.

The Gallup poll also reveals that Democrats now win all eight major issues, including terrorism and morality. Asked which party would do more to enhance "moral standards in the country," Democrats now win 47 to 36! And on terrorism, Democrats now have a 47-to-42-percent advantage.

The Foley scandal has wrought extraordinary damage to the Republican Party and appears to have had a particularly negative impact on the base. No amount of blame shifting onto Democrats for breaking the story or for holding it until September is likely to compensate for the evidence that House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did not act promptly to expose it himself. According to the latest Fox News poll, 61 percent of voters believe that Hastert knew about the Foley affair early on and did nothing to stop it.

Churchgoing whites are the core of the Republican base. The fact that they are now breaking even in the approaching midterm elections foretells total disaster for the GOP. For this group to leave is, quite literally, the political equivalent of the last dog dying! It is now likely that they will lose both houses of Congress.

With this kind of defection, Republican Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio), Conrad Burns (Mont.), Rick Santorum (Pa.), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chaffee (R.I.) seem likely to be gone. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) seat seems likely to go to Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.). And Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) may also be on his way out. In New Jersey, after trailing Tom Kean Jr. for most of September, Sen. Robert Menendez (D) seems to have moved out to a small lead that will probably grow.

And all of this trend is before the final weeks when downscale Democrats, who have not yet focused on the elections, "come home" and vote their historic party loyalties.

The defection of the Republican base is likely to be felt even more keenly in the House races. The very gerrymandering that GOP leaders had hoped would leave their House margin invulnerable may now backfire as the Republican white churchgoers, whom the district lines had incorporated into swing Republican districts, now defect and vote Democrat or stay home in massive numbers. The gerrymandering designed to keep Democrats out may have the perverse effect of keeping disaffected Republicans in the swing districts, magnifying their effect on the election.

Can the Republican Party reunite with its base? It's hard to see how they can win it back until the 2008 election. A Hillary Clinton candidacy would obviously help them to regain the fierce loyalty of their base, but she would also bring in millions of single women voters who would support her candidacy by huge margins. The recent census data showing that half of all households are unmarried indicates how extensive a political force single women can become.

DOJ_NMG_0082702

In the long term, of course, Democratic policies on same-sex marriage and abortion are likely to bring the base back to its traditional bearings, but these issues seem to be having little impact on holding the Republican majorities in Congress.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including “Rewriting History,” a rebuttal to “Living History” by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Congressional Republicans Find Spending May Not Decide Races (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Just weeks before Election Day, most embattled Republican House incumbents have less campaign cash than they expected, despite raising more money than their Democratic challengers. Republicans had to spend heavily in recent weeks to buck an unfavorable national climate for the party.

In Connecticut, Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson spent $3.5 million on her re-election bid through Sept. 30 compared with Democratic challenger Christopher Murphy, who spent just $1.5 million, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission. Ms. Johnson ended the third quarter with $1 million in the bank compared with about $368,000 in Mr. Murphy's account. Even so, her race is still considered a "toss up" -- or one with no clear favorite -- by the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan group that tracks campaigns, because of voter discontent with President Bush and the Iraq war.

The third-quarter financial disclosure reports are important barometers of momentum and 11-hour strength since they are the final ones released before Nov. 7.

"In some ways, the major Republican opponent hasn't been the Democratic challenger as much as it's been the daily news cycle," says Anthony Corrado, a campaign finance expert at Colby College, in Waterville, Maine.

Meanwhile, most Democrats running for open House seats held by retiring Republicans have raised more cash than their opponents, giving their party a chance to make net gains in the race for control of that chamber.

Democrats also are showing strength in several close Senate races, by out-raising their opponents in the third quarter or maintaining a competitive position despite heavy spending by incumbents.

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen has raised $13 million for his re-election bid and spent $8.5 million. But he remains in a dead heat with Democratic newcomer Jim Webb, who has raised $4.6 million and spent just $1.8 million. Mr. Allen enters the final month with $5.6 million in the bank, but Mr. Webb can still compete statewide with his $2.7 million in cash.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee, said his party's candidates have enough cash to block a Democratic takeover. "Democrats can no longer fabricate momentum in long-shot races; candidates either have the cash to cross the finish line or they don't," he said.

Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic House campaign committee, says there never was much doubt that "Republicans and their special interest friends would out-raise their challengers." Amid polls indicating dissatisfaction with Congress and the White House, Ms. Feinberg says Democratic candidates don't need to match incumbents' fundraising to win.

Republican leaders this week reminded candidates to focus on local issues, such as money they have brought home to build roads and bridges or for libraries and schools. Meanwhile, the national party continues to supplement candidates' efforts, investing millions of dollars in advertising and distributing flyers that call Democrats soft on terrorism and inclined toward tax increases.

But Republicans' effort to change the subject is proving expensive and difficult. Despite investing in attacks on Democrats, the number of competitive races has increased. And, according to financial disclosure reports, incumbents have been forced to spend considerably more than challengers in a number of races that now look too close to call.

In Pennsylvania, for instance, Republican Rep. Curt Weldon has spent $1.5 million compared with his opponent Democrat Joseph Sestak's $750,907 and the race remains a toss-up. Worse still for the incumbent, at the close of the third quarter, Mr. Sestak had $1.5 million in the bank compared with Mr. Weldon's $1.1 million.

DOJ_NMG_0082703

Mr. Weldon's political fortunes grew complicated this week when it was disclosed that federal investigators are delving into the lobbying efforts of the congressman's daughter and one of his political supporters.

In Indiana, Republican Rep. John Hostettler's lackluster fundraising may have caught up with him. The six-term incumbent has raised $452,600 for his campaign compared with the $1.5 million collected by Democrat Brad Ellsworth, a former local sheriff. Mr. Hostettler has spent just $184,447 and ended the third quarter with $269,700 in the bank. Meanwhile, Mr. Ellsworth has spent $1 million in his campaign and still has $413,500.

There is some good news for Republicans.

In the race for the open seat of retiring Illinois House Rep. Henry Hyde, Democrat Tammy Duckworth looks to have miscalculated financially, and hampered her campaign's ability to compete in the final weeks.

Ms. Duckworth, an Iraq war veteran, has raised roughly $2.8 million. But she spent the bulk of it in September on television ads responding to negative commercials against her by the House Republican committee. Heading into the home stretch, she now reports having $206,000 in the bank while her Republican opponent, Peter Roskam, has $1.5 million.

Having Money Isn't Everything, But It Can Be Deciding Factor (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 18, 2006

For months, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), has said Republicans would keep their majority in the House because they have the advantages of "members, money and message."

House Republican incumbents have socked away more money than their Democratic challengers in 34 of 52 competitive districts and in some cases Republicans lead Democratic challengers by a ratio of seven to one, said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti in a statement.

But some of those figures are misleading because some candidates, such as Democrats Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and Joe Courtney (Conn.), have spent exorbitant sums on television advertising buys.

In seven competitive Senate races, state Treasurer Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) lead incumbent GOP Sens. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.). In Tennessee's open seat race, Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) holds a narrow lead over former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R). In Maryland and Minnesota, the candidates are within $500,000 of each other in cash on hand.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) holds a commanding lead over Democrat Jim Webb, but Webb raked in $3.4 million in the third quarter. And in Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) has a $4 million lead over challenger Claire McCaskill (D) largely because she has made a large media buy for the final weeks leading up to Election Day.

History shows that money has its limits. In 1994, the last time an anti-incumbent wave swept the country, Democratic incumbents out-raised Republican challengers but Republicans picked up 52 House seats and won a majority in the Senate, too.

With three weeks remaining until voters head to the polling booths, one question for Republicans and Democrats alike is whether a tipping point has been reached: can heaps of money overcome the negative sentiment directed toward Republicans because of the war in Iraq and the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)?

"The Republicans are fighting against constant news out of Washington that things are not going right," said Tony Corrado, a political scientist at Colby College. "The Democrats have the resources needed to respond to attacks and the Republicans [are] playing defense spending campaign money … to fight a wave of public opinion."

"If you haven't raised your money, you're not where you need to be," said a Democratic lobbyist. "Unless the RNC can come in with a tidal wave of cash, it won't matter if there's no message, I don't care how much money you throw at it."

If money is less a factor in tight races in a bad political environment, the looming question for both parties is whether the GOP's vaunted turnout operation can save their incumbent members.

Several strategists from both parties said the turnout operation should give the Republicans a three-point edge in most competitive races. Whether that edge dissipates amid the Foley sex scandal and the Iraq war is an open question.

DOJ_NMG_0082704

"I don't believe that's the case yet … money can buy intensity," said a senior White House official, adding that the RNC, NRCC and state parties had $56 million more than the Democratic Party and that since 1974, candidates who outspend their opponent by $200,000 won 97 percent of the time.

Republicans still hold an advantage because competitive House contests are fought in distinct districts, making them more insulated than Senate races from national trends. That means that when the House changes hands, it is a seminal event: both times the House has changed hands in the past 50 years, the Senate has flipped as well.

"We're not at that point, particularly not in congressional races," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.). "We work inside a very different universe. Outside a couple dozen seats most Republicans represent seats in which President Bush's approval rating is in the high 40s and low 50s. Bush is not going to hinder [a Republican candidate]."

And even if some candidates have reached a point where money does not matter, having enough money can create options. For example, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), who found herself in an unexpectedly tight race in 2004, bragged last week that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) had withdrawn a $600,000 television advertising buy. The DCCC's decision gave the NRCC a break because it will not have to counter the DCCC's advertising with its own.

But DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) told reporters on Monday that Musgrave shares a media market with Rep. John Salazar (D-Colo.), implying that the money was for Salazar. Now the DCCC can decide where to spend $600,000 that Salazar does not need. The DCCC can repurchase airtime in northern Colorado for Musgrave's opponent, Democrat Angie Paccione, redirect that money to protect vulnerable incumbents in Georgia, or spend on second-tier races in California.

"Money can't solve everything," said Cole. "But money can spare you strategic dilemmas."

GOP Bright Spots Few In Senate Races (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

National Republicans are dumping more than $1 million into Senate races in the Democratic strongholds of Maryland and New Jersey but are facing a bleak field elsewhere, strategists from both parties say.

"Every week, it gets better," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). "Every week we get closer to our goal of taking the Senate and I'd say right now we're on the edge. What looked like a distant possibility six months ago is a very, very real possibility right now."

Democrats this year, unlike past elections, are running on a strong national security agenda and have taken the upper hand in fundraising, he told reporters yesterday. Mr. Schumer played several ads paid for by the DSCC in conservative states such as Virginia and Tennessee attacking Republicans for their continued support of the Iraq war. In each ad, the Democrat says changes must be made without offering specifics.

"National security is a win for Democrats," said Mr. Schumer, adding that North Korea's recent nuclear test will help the party. "What happened in North Korea ... inures to our benefit."

In addition, he said the party will have poured "a minimum of $20 million" into the local efforts that make sure their voters show up at the polls, a tactic mastered by Republicans in recent years.

"We've been in the wilderness for a while," Mr. Schumer said.

While Republican strategists privately acknowledge that the races look tough for the GOP, they remain confident that they will keep Democrats from gaining the six seats they need to win control of the chamber.

Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said yesterday that Republicans have paid $650,000 for advertising in the reliably Democratic state of Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele hopes to beat Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for the seat being vacated by Democrat Paul S. Sarbanes. They are dumping another $500,000 in New Jersey, another Democratic state where Republican Tom Kean Jr. hopes to beat incumbent Sen. Robert Menendez.

"The Democrats have been forced to spend money in Michigan, Maryland, Washington and New Jersey because they are being pressed on holding these seats," Mr. Nick said. "This defies the national political climate and is money that is not going toward attacking our incumbents."

DOJ_NMG_0082705

Mr. Schumer said yesterday that Mr. Menendez was not his first choice for the seat but that he has been a "great candidate."

Republicans, meanwhile, appear increasingly pessimistic about their chances of keeping incumbent Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine of Ohio. Polls continue to show both men trailing.

In Pennsylvania, challenger Bob Casey Jr. has raised amounts of money on par with Mr. Santorum. In Ohio, Mr. DeWine maintains the cash advantage but national Republicans have dropped plans to continue spending heavily on advertising there.

"The bottom is sort of beginning to fall out in Ohio for them," Mr. Schumer said of the state that handed President Bush his re-election victory in 2004.

Funding Constrains Democrats (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Top Democrats said yesterday that they are planning to significantly expand the number of GOP House seats they will target during the final 20 days of the campaign but that financial disputes and fundraising problems are hindering the effort.

Democrats said private polls have convinced top party officials that they could pick up 40 or more seats -- nearly double their internal projections from a week ago -- if they spend enough money on television advertising for long-shot races. Strategists James Carville and Stan Greenberg are among those pleading with party leaders to go deep into debt to run ads in as many as 50 GOP-held districts.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has privately signed off on targeting a new group of GOP incumbents who were once considered safe for reelection, starting with Rep. Gil Gutknecht in rural Minnesota, officials said.

The number of seats Democrats could pick up "is expanding, no doubt about it," Emanuel said. "But you have to figure out what is smoke and what is fire."

Emanuel said he believes as many as 58 seats are now in play.

Still, several Democrats complained that the party is on the verge of blowing a once-in-a-decade political opportunity because of financial troubles.

The Democratic National Committee has no plans to help finance a last-minute push because it just took out a loan to spend up to $10 million more, primarily on Senate races, and particularly in Virginia and Tennessee, a top official said. "We are looking, but unfortunately there is not much more we can do," said DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney.

Harold Ickes -- a Democratic operative who recently created an independent political group called the September Fund with a goal of raising $10 million to $20 million for House and Senate campaigns -- said his group cannot afford to target races beyond those that Democrats have already identified as must-wins to capture control of the House for the first time since 1994.

"It has been more difficult raising money than I expected," said Ickes, noting that his group has raised between $5 million and $10 million, half its original goal. "My sense is there is more optimism than is probably warranted," he said about Democratic prospects.

If Ickes's statement is correct, most of his group's money has come in recent weeks. According to the latest Federal Election Commission filings, Ickes's group had raised slightly more than $1 million through Sept. 30.

Greenberg added: "I don't see the evidence the big donors are stepping up."

More broadly, Democrats are deeply divided over the smartest political strategy for profiting from a political environment that has deteriorated for Republicans in the aftermath of the Mark Foley page scandal.

Some Democratic officials and donors want their money concentrated to maximize the chances that the party captures the minimum number of seats necessary to gain majorities in the House and the Senate, rather than having resources spread too thin by spending on second-tier targets. The party needs to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to take power in the Senate.

But Carville, Greenberg, Emanuel and others are now arguing in private deliberations that Democrats have a historic chance to not only win the House but also capture enough seats to build an effective governing majority. They are telling donors that it is worth the risk to shoot for a 40-plus seat gain, which would give Democrats a large enough majority to guarantee that they could move legislation and carry out investigations of the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0082706

"You would be crazy not to get your donors to do whatever they can and borrow what you need" to run ads in every competitive race, Greenberg said. Based on his polling, Greenberg is telling party leaders that it is not unrealistic to envision a 41-seat gain, which would give Democrats the same governing majority Republicans had after their 1994 takeover.

"I am saying this is a twice-in-a-lifetime environment," Carville said. "You try to maximize it."

Republicans have tacitly acknowledged that Democrats are right about the expanding field of competitive races. In recent days, for instance, national GOP organizations have pumped money into a race for an open seat in Idaho and into other races that were previously regarded by both parties as out of reach for Democrats.

This is not an easy bet for Democrats. It would be virtually impossible to expand the number of House seats with fully competitive races without taking some money away from efforts to win back the Senate.

Democrats said big donors such as George Soros, a billionaire financier who has funded liberal causes, are refusing to help Democrats offset the GOP's edge in spending by outside political groups. A top official who often speaks with Soros and other major benefactors said they remain upset by the Democratic failure to win the White House and Congress in 2004 and have turned their attention to long-term efforts to build a network of think tanks and advocacy organizations to support liberal causes. The richest donors also see presidential elections as more glamorous and worthy of high-level support, the official said.

A spokesman for Soros was out of the country and unreachable.

Bob J. Perry, a Texas realtor and staunch Republican, is on pace to single-handedly outspend many of the Democratic political groups such as Ickes's. Perry has given more than $7 million to efforts targeting nearly a dozen Democratic candidates, including several that are considered long-shot bets.

Bill Buck, a founder of Majority Action, an independent organization hoping to elect a Democratic House majority, said his group is investing $500,000 in New York's 19th district against Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R) -- a race that was hardly on anyone's radar screen at the start of the election campaign. Kelly is being challenged by John Hall, best known for writing the lyrics to the 1970s hit "Still the One." But Democratic officials said any effort to target a new group of GOP House members will have to be financed by the DCCC.

The DCCC is likely to go deep into debt, perhaps topping the $11 million deficit it racked up in 2004. The committee can borrow as much as a bank is willing to lend. The other option is to take money out of Republican districts that the party is confident it is almost certain to win.

This approach carries a big risk, however. If the party pulls ads in districts such as the Indiana base of Rep. Chris Chocola, who is trailing by double digits in private Democratic polling, it might allow an established GOP incumbent to creep back up in the race.

Congressman Says Earmarks Could Cost GOP Power (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — A leading Republican critic of special-interest spending earmarks said Tuesday that the GOP risks its congressional majority by defending the practice.

Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., said a report Tuesday in USA TODAY was the latest in a series of revelations casting an ethical cloud on earmarks, a way lawmakers direct money in a spending bill to a specific item or program.

Flake's opposition to earmarks helped prompt a temporary House rule change requiring the disclosure of some sponsors of earmarks. He said he hoped that rule could be made permanent but faced opposition from Republican supporters of earmarks.

“Until we change that mindset, I don't know that we're going to curb the practice (of earmarking),” Flake said. “Maybe it'll take two years in the wilderness of being in the political minority. I hope that's not what it takes.”

DOJ_NMG_0082707

The newspaper found that lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write. Combined, they generated millions of dollars in fees for themselves or their firms.

News of two FBI investigations involving lobbyists with family ties to Congress surfaced in the past week. Authorities are investigating whether an aide to Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., broke the law by helping her husband get Pentagon earmarks for his firm's lobbying clients. Agents raided the home of Pennsylvania Republican Rep. Curt Weldon's lobbyist daughter, Karen Weldon, on Monday in a probe of whether Weldon gave favors to his daughter's clients.

Specter, Weldon and the lobbyists deny any wrongdoing.

Neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate have formal rules prohibiting contact between lawmakers and staff and the lobbyists related to them. Efforts for comprehensive ethics changes in Congress have stalled, including a Senate bill that would bar senators from "official contacts" with lobbyists who are close relatives.

Republicans killed those proposals, said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become House speaker if Democrats win control of the House next month. She said her party would tighten rules to require sponsors of earmarks to identify themselves.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said through a spokeswoman that senators should consider the need for office policies if they or someone on their staff is related to a lobbyist.

"Certainly, making sure there are no appearances of impropriety is an issue," Amy Call said.

Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists (USAT)

By Peter Eisler And Matt Kelley

USA Today, October 18, 2006

An overwhelming majority of Americans believe it's wrong for lawmakers and their staffs to have contact with relatives who are lobbyists regarding government matters. But a survey of lawmakers suggests they don't see a problem.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows that 80% of respondents believe such actions are inappropriate. By contrast, few members of the House and Senate appropriations committees say they have policies that prevent lobbying by relatives.

Four committee members who responded to a USA TODAY survey have policies that prevent relatives from lobbying them or their staffs. All are senators: Dick Durbin, D-Ill., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

None of the House members who responded reported having such a policy. The newspaper surveyed all 94 members of the appropriations committees; 37 answered the survey.

"We have clearly seen some potential problem areas in this Congress in terms of the role being played by spouses and relatives," says Fred Wertheimer, head of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21. "That really needs to be examined now to see what kind of rules are necessary to address it."

The USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken earlier this month, shows that 72% of respondents are concerned "a great deal" or "a fair amount" about such lobbyist contacts.

An investigation by the newspaper found 53 cases last year in which members of the appropriations committees or their top aides had relatives in the lobbying business. Of the relatives who sought money in appropriations bills for their clients, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for the relatives' clients.

"We handle (potential conflicts of interest) by hiring good, professional, ethical people," says John Scofield, spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee.

"If there's any instance in which there's some sort of inappropriate action being taken at the behest of whoever, that (staffer) would be shown the door." he said. "Everyone around here knows we won't tolerate that."

Dems Using Hourly Wage Issue Against GOP Rivals (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic challengers in more than two dozen House and Senate races are attacking Republicans in Congress for taking pay raises while voting against a minimum wage increase.

DOJ_NMG_0082708

The attacks are contained in television and radio ads running from Washington state to Virginia. In some races, such as House contests in Indiana and Connecticut, Democrats also link pay raises to Republican votes against combat bonuses for U.S. troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

While some of the ads may fudge the facts, political analysts say the message appeals to the pocketbook concerns of voters.

"It's a classic theme," says Michael Wolf, a political scientist at Indiana University-Purdue University in Fort Wayne, Ind. "It always plays well because of the perception that these are people sent to Washington, earning a lot of money and turning their backs" on voters.

Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee says, "Throwing the pay raise into congressional campaigns is an election-year stunt."

Most members of Congress currently earn $165,200 a year; top leaders earn more. That's $31,600 more than in 1997, when the federal minimum wage was raised to the current $5.15 an hour. Unless legislators act during a lame-duck session after Election Day, lawmakers who will be part of the Congress that convenes in January will get an automatic 2% raise to $168,504.

Democrats, led by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, have vowed to oppose any pay increase until Congress raises the minimum wage.

Among Democratic ads:

•In Missouri, challenger Claire McCaskill says in a TV ad that Sen. Jim Talent is the kind of person who "votes 11 times against increasing the minimum wage, but takes six congressional pay raises."

Rich Chrismer, Talent's spokesman, says the senator has "consistently voted against" pay raises and gives "the ones that pass the Congress to charity." He added that Talent has supported minimum wage increases when they are coupled with assistance for small businesses, which cannot absorb the higher costs as easily as big companies.

•In New Mexico, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee attacked Rep. Heather Wilson for voting against a $1,500 bonus for U.S. troops but noted she "voted 'yes' to a congressional pay raise for herself — not once, but six times."

Wilson's spokesman, Enrique Carlos Knell, denies the congresswoman has ever voted for a pay raise. He says Democrats are "trying to rewrite the truth." The troop bonus is a "gimmick," he says, noting Wilson later supported a broader military compensation package.

Ever since lawmakers voted in 1789 to pay themselves $6 a day while in session, congressional pay has been a sticky campaign issue. Lawmakers such as Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, and Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., donate their raises to charity to avoid voter backlash.

Congress thought it found a way to avoid direct votes on pay raises when it instituted annual cost-of- living increases in 1989. The change allows lawmakers to forgo a pay raise if they take several procedural moves to actively cancel it. Since then, Congress has blocked five increases, the last time in 1998.

Peter Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union, a group that opposes increases to both lawmakers' pay and the minimum wage, says some 30-second ads are deceptive because they say an incumbent "took" or "accepted" a pay raise, which implies that the member actively sought it.

"One or two words can be the difference between truth and fiction," he says. Sepp notes that Talent has a "clean record" with votes to block raises while Wilson voted against pay increases twice before voting for them six times.

Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic campaign committee, disagrees. She says the ads are "about the clearest case you can make about the Republican incumbents not being on the side of middle class families and our troops."

Collegio accuses Democrats of "political doublespeak at its worst." He notes that the 2003 vote on combat bonuses for troops came just weeks after Republicans voted to increase military pay and other benefits. Collegio notes that "by their own goofy standards," Pelosi and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland are just as guilty of raising their own pay.

Matheson has tried for the last six years to force a direct vote on the pay raise so members are clearly on the record about the issue. Each time his attempt has failed.

Members are "hesitant … to take a true up-or-down vote on whether to increase their pay," says Matheson, whose ads link congressional salaries to the spiraling federal deficit. "I think $165,000 is a lot of money."

DOJ_NMG_0082709

GOP Shifts Back To A Basic Issue: Taxes (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

In an election season where the Republicans can't seem to buy a break, the party's highest-profile campaigners have gone back to a bedrock GOP issue: taxes.

In an address to Republican donors in Topeka, Kan., last week, Vice President Cheney cited taxes first - before Iraq, before the war on terror - calling them "one of the most important issues on November 7th."

After a month of speeches focused on terrorism, President Bush has also moved taxes to the fore, speaking ominously of how if "they," the Democrats, "were to get in charge of the House of Representatives, they would raise your taxes and figure out new ways to spend your money," as he did at a campaign event in Chicago last week.

While the president tends to keep his remarks general, Mr. Cheney and Republican National Committee chair Ken Mehlman get personal. They target in particular Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York, who would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win control of the House. They assert as fact that Mr. Rangel favors "across-the-board tax increases," which Rangel and the Democrats vigorously deny. But the debate has been framed, and it is one that has resonated for decades in the back and forth of partisan politics.

"It plays to the basic party stereotypes, and of course most people, if you give them an unalloyed choice of paying more taxes or less taxes, they'll pick less taxes every time," says Larry Sabato, political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. Voter concerns

The problem for Republicans is that taxes don't rank high on surveys of voter concerns, in an election dominated by talk of Iraq, scandals, and uneasiness about the economy in general.

The latest Gallup poll shows likely voters saying that congressional Democrats would do a better job of handling every issue - from healthcare to Iraq to moral standards in the country - than congressional Republicans. Democrats also beat Republicans on handling terrorism, for the first time in the five years Gallup has asked that question.

"I'm not sure that any polls are going to show the Republicans beating the Democrats on anything in this environment," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres.

But he argues that focusing on taxes - and on the prospect of a Chairman Rangel - is still good politics, even though most voters don't pay much attention to the details of the House, such as who runs the committees.

"That doesn't mean that it's not a very effective issue to use with activist voters, and to persuade Republicans that they'd better turn out to vote or else," says Mr. Ayres.

Says Mr. Sabato: "It's red meat for the base, but I think it does extend to a lot of independents.... You look at the issues here, and what do they [the Republicans] have? This is a very tough year for Republicans, so they have to go to golden oldies." What's at stake on tax issue

At issue is not a proposal for major new tax cuts, but what will happen when temporary tax relief provisions are about to expire. A reduction in the marriage tax is set to expire Jan. 1, 2011, as is a boost in the child tax credit. The estate tax, which affects the wealthiest 2 percent of Americans, now applies only to inheritances exceeding $2 million, but that higher ceiling expires in 2008.

Rangel presents Republicans with the perfect foil. He is an unabashed liberal who has represented a poor district in Harlem since 1970, and he does not shy away from a good fight. In recent media interviews, he has stated that as chair of Ways and Means, he would work across the aisle and end the intense partisanship of the Bush years. But he has also held open the idea of not renewing any of Bush's temporary tax cuts, and thus has prompted an untold number of GOP press releases and attacks.

In an interview with Bloomberg news service Sept. 20, he said he "cannot think of one" of Bush's first-term tax cuts that should be renewed. According to a Rangel aide, the comment needs to be taken in context: The tax cuts don't expire for several years, and it's too soon to say for sure what should happen to them.

DOJ_NMG_0082710

Meanwhile, Rangel noted in the interview, a priority for the new Congress should be reforming the alternative minimum tax, a system designed originally to make sure wealthy people cannot avoid paying taxes but which has increasingly affected middle-class taxpayers. That will be an expensive reform, and Rangel wants to reinstate the "pay-as-you-go" system that requires new spending to be covered by revenue increases. Party leaders battle over taxes

Howard Dean, the Democratic national chair, said on CNN Sunday that Republican warnings that the Democrats will raise taxes are "nonsense."

But RNC chair Mr. Mehlman, when asked on CNN about Mr. Dean's comment, said, "That's what he says. But the guy that writes the tax laws, a guy named Charlie Rangel, the week they got out of town, said across-the-board tax increases."

Given that taxes are not a top concern for voters in this election, Republicans will have to work hard to put the issue on their radar screen, says Sabato.

"That's where their money comes in, that's where their ads come in," he says. "They know the news media aren't going to cover that extensively, so they're going to pay for it."

Tax Questions Abound On Ballots Across Nation (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Voters from South Carolina to South Dakota might be surprised to find a significant tax question, such as a property-tax cap, on the November ballot.

Nationwide, there are some 40 measures to increase or decrease taxes or to restrict spending, according to a University of Southern California survey. But many are gaining little publicity in an election year dominated by the possible change of control in Congress. Unlike many state tax measures in past years, this year's measures have sparked little taxpayer outcry.

"There's not a bunch of anger out there about a particular tax," says John G. Matsusaka, president of USC's Initiative & Referendum Institute.

One reason: State governments have had consistently strong revenue growth in the past two years, growth that "some would even say is bordering on the remarkable," says Harley Duncan, executive director of the Federation of Tax Administrators. Lack of severe financial problems "does tend to keep down the number of these sorts of proposals," Mr. Duncan says.

South Carolina Tax Assessments

One of the more significant property tax measures is in South Carolina, where voters will decide whether to limit increases in property tax assessments to no more than 15% every five years. Blease Graham Jr., a political science professor at University of South Carolina, says the measure has received some unfavorable newspaper editorials. While the proposal would cap appraisals, local governments under state law will be required to adjust property-tax rates to raise the same amount of money. The result would cap taxes for valuable waterfront properties while shifting the tax burden to less-valuable properties, he says.

South Dakota voters also are being asked to cap property-tax assessments, but that measure is getting little attention amid an intense campaign over another ballot measure to repeal a state abortion ban.

"To say it is being overshadowed is an understatement," says William D. Richardson, chairman of the University of South Dakota political science department. "I expect this one will come as a bit of a surprise to voters as they work their way through the ballot."

Georgia has a measure to exempt senior citizens from the state portion of the property tax, but there's little talk about it. "It's not getting much attention but I think it will overwhelmingly pass," says Alan Essig, executive director of the Georgia Budget and Policy Institute, a local think tank. Mr. Essig says while exempting seniors from a small state-level property tax is "an election-year gimmick," the idea has drawn little opposition. "It's not controversial at all," he says. The plan would reduce state revenues by about $6.8 million in the 2008 fiscal year, Mr. Essig says.

Washington Estate Tax

Another significant state ballot issue is a Washington state measure to repeal a state-level estate tax. Such a repeal would reduce state revenues by $184.5 million over the next two fiscal years. The estate tax, enacted in 2005, is directed to reduce school class sizes and fund education.

DOJ_NMG_0082711

The issue is significant in Washington because of the contested U.S. Senate re-election race for Democrat Maria Cantwell. She voted against estate-tax reductions in the Senate this year in the face of intense pressure from antitax advocates.

Support for the estate-tax repeal is lagging, however; a Sept. 21 poll by Washington pollster Stuart Elway showed it losing 38% to 45%. Opponents include William Gates Sr., father of Microsoft founder Bill Gates Jr.

"We haven't seen any kind of grassroots groundswell of support for repealing the state level estate tax," says Sandeep Kaushik, spokesman for the repeal opposition group.

Sen. Cantwell's opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, former chief executive officer of insurance company Safeco, highlighted his opposition to the federal estate tax during a campaign event earlier this month.

Dennis Falk, head of the estate-tax repeal effort, argues that the estate-tax burdens working family businesses that invest capital to create jobs in Washington and that repeal won't hurt educational funding, which traditionally comes from the state's general fund.

State Taxes on Cigarettes

Increases in cigarette taxes are on the ballot in Arizona, South Dakota and California, where voters in that state will be asked to back a $2.60-a-pack cigarette tax, up from 87 cents a pack. Californians also will decide two other possible tax increases: a new tax on oil pumped from state wells and a $50 property parcel tax for public schools. The estimated $4 billion in funds from the oil tax would be dedicated to alternative-energy programs.

USC's Mr. Matsusaka isn't optimistic about the outlook for any of these, noting that a 1980 proposition to tax state-produced oil also failed. While cigarette tax increases generally win approval, he says, "There is a sense in California that people are hesitant to impose taxes on really narrow groups." * * *

BRIEFS: Happy Anniversary: The Internal Revenue Service is throwing a party to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the landmark 1986 tax overhaul. IRS Chief Counsel Don Korb said the event, featuring important behind-the-scenes players such as former Treasury officials John "Buck" Chapoton and Ronald Pearlman, will help "create a sense of history in our office." Is this a way to get the IRS troops fired up for another major tax-reform effort? "Not at all," Mr. Korb says. ... The IRS has a new associate chief counsel to oversee partnerships and "special industries," William P. O'Shea, a 28-year veteran of the agency. The office provides legal advice on issues ranging from estate taxation to energy taxes and tax shelters.

Alarm Bells For G.O.P. In A Battleground State (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Megan Thee

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

The bellwether state of Ohio appears to have become hostile terrain for Republicans this year, with voters there overwhelmingly saying Democrats are more likely to help create jobs and concluding by a wide margin that Republicans in the state are more prone to political corruption than are Democrats, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

Home this year to closely watched races for governor, United States Senate and a growing roster of competitive House seats, Ohio is one of the most contested battlegrounds of 2006, and one in which voters at this point are strongly favoring Democrats on many issues.

The Democratic candidates for governor and Senate hold commanding double-digit leads over their Republican opponents in the poll, and respondents said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate for the House in their district by 50 percent to 32 percent.

The results contained alarm bells for President Bush and his party across the nation three weeks from Election Day.

The poll found a striking slippage in the president's standing among white evangelical Christians, a constituency that has provided a strong vote cushion for Republican candidates in recent elections. In November 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush. When asked in this poll whether they approved or disapproved of the job Mr. Bush was doing as president, 49 percent approved while 45 percent disapproved.

Ohio is a Republican-leaning but heavily contested state that twice voted to elect Mr. Bush and gave him his Electoral College margin of victory in 2004. But it is not a perfect microcosm of the country, and in particular has higher levels of economic anxiety, the poll found.

DOJ_NMG_0082712

Sixty-five percent of those surveyed rated the state's economy as bad; only 34 percent said it was good. In Ohio, 49 percent of respondents described the nation's economy as good, and 50 percent said it was bad. In a Times/CBS News poll conducted nationally this month, 60 percent said the economy was good, and 39 percent said it was bad.

A plurality, 46 percent of voters, said the economy and jobs were the most important issues facing Ohio, while 17 percent cited health care, 15 percent said terrorism and 12 percent said the war in Iraq. Seventy percent said that both Ohio and the nation were on the wrong track, a number that often spells doom for the party in power.

More than three-quarters of Ohioans in the poll said they strongly favored a ballot measure to raise the state minimum wage to $6.85 an hour from $5.15 an hour. The ballot measure is backed by labor unions and other Democratic interests and is intended in part to draw Democratic voters to the polls on Election Day, just as measures to outlaw same-sex marriage propelled Republicans to vote in several states two years ago.

Only a third of Ohio voters approve of the job Mr. Bush is doing as president or the way he is handling the economy, and they seem poised to take their discontent out on Republican candidates up and down the ballot. Republican officials at the national level said this week they had all but written off the Senate and governor's races in Ohio and were diverting resources to other states where they believed they had a better chance of winning.

"In Ohio we've seen nothing but our manufacturing jobs cease to exist," said one poll respondent, David Stuck, 59, of Miami Township, who said he had voted twice for Mr. Bush. Mr. Stuck, a Republican, blamed inaction at the federal level for the evaporation of jobs in Ohio and said he planned to vote for the Democratic candidate for United States Senate, Sherrod Brown, over the incumbent, Mike DeWine, a Republican.

"Call it a protest," Mr. Stuck said in a follow-up interview. "I haven't seen anything done in the last six years. To be honest, I'm truly thinking about voting Democratic across the board because I'm tired of Bush."

The statewide telephone poll was conducted Wednesday through Sunday with 1,164 adults, including 1,020 registered voters. The margin of sampling error for the entire group is plus or minus three percentage points, and it is the same for the registered voters.

More than half of the poll's respondents said they believed corruption was widespread in Ohio and said, by a three-to-one ratio, that the Republican Party had more corrupt politicians than the Democrats. Gov. Bob Taft, a Republican, pleaded no contest last year to ethics charges arising from dealings with a crooked investment manager. Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, pleaded guilty to corruption charges last week arising from his association with Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist at the center of the influence-selling scandal in Washington.

Doris Stucky, a 79-year-old retired nurse from New Philadelphia, said she thought all politicians were corrupt. "I think they're out to line their pocketbooks and get votes and they don't care what they do or say to get them," said Mrs. Stucky, a Republican, in a telephone interview after she participated in the poll.

"They came down on Bob Ney, and I don't think he's any more guilty than the rest of them," she said. "It's the same in Ohio. I think politicians are all the same. I wish we could find some good honest Christian politicians, but I don't think there are any." Mrs. Stucky said she was undecided about whom she would vote for.

By large margins, Ohio voters said they trusted Democrats over Republicans to handle government spending and create new jobs.

The sour mood in Ohio about the economy and the performance of incumbents at all levels appears to be a motivating factor for voters who identify themselves as Democrats. Fifty-five percent of Democrats said they were more enthusiastic about voting than in previous elections for Congress, while only 30 percent of Republicans said they were.

The tide of dissatisfaction appears ready to wash out Mr. DeWine, who is trailing Mr. Brown by 34 percent to 48 percent, the poll found. The Democratic candidate for governor, Representative Ted Strickland, is leading the Republican nominee, J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Ohio secretary of state, by 53 percent to 29 percent.

The omens in the poll were almost uniformly grim for the president and his party. Six out of 10 respondents disapprove of the way Mr. Bush is handling the economy and Iraq, and a plurality of Ohioans (by 40 percent to 36 percent) disapprove of the way he is managing the nuclear crisis on the Korean peninsula. The approval rating for the Republican-led Congress is a paltry 22 percent. Among adults nationwide, 27 percent approve of the way Congress is doing its job.

DOJ_NMG_0082713

One bright spot for the president and Republicans was that while about 60 percent said they had made up their minds about this year's elections, 4 in 10 said it was too early to say how they would vote.

Many Democrats in Ohio still harbor resentment about the 2004 presidential contest between Mr. Bush and Senator John Kerry, which Mr. Bush officially won by about 120,000 votes out of 5.6 million cast in Ohio. Only 30 percent of Democratic poll respondents said they believed the 2004 vote count was fair and accurate, while 64 percent said it was not. (Many conspiracy-minded Democratic activists accused Mr. Blackwell, who serves as statewide supervisor of elections, of manipulating voting technology to help Mr. Bush win.) Republicans, by 89 percent to 8 percent, said the voting was fair and balanced.

Twenty-eight percent of those polled said an adult in their household had been out of work and looking for a job in the past 12 months, and 44 percent of them said they were worried that someone in their family would be out of work in the coming year.

James Reed, 50, a self-described independent voter from Ashtabula, said in a follow-up interview that Mr. Taft, who is not running for re-election, "has sold us down the road as far as jobs are concerned." Mr. Reed, a disabled chemical plant worker, said trade restrictions were needed to prevent American jobs from being shipped overseas, a view shared by 69 percent of Ohioans surveyed.

Republicans Put $700G In TV Ads In Ohio (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

The Republican Party placed $700,000 in television ads in Ohio Tuesday, a scaled-back ad campaign amid growing doubts by party officials that GOP Sen. Mike DeWine can win re-election in the battleground state.

The ads by the party are smaller than recent million-dollar ad buys by the National Republican Senatorial Committee. But party officials touted the ads as evidence that they were not abandoning the state or giving up on DeWine.

Strategists from both parties were following the Republican steps closely because the GOP had chosen Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri as political fortifications against a Democratic takeover of the Senate. Democrats need a net gain of six seats to win control of the Senate.

Polls this week in Ohio show DeWine trailing his Democratic opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 7 to 12 percentage points.

Republican Party officials are turning their sights to Virginia to offer needed help to Sen. George Allen, who has been unable to stop a rapidly tightening race with Democrat Jim Webb. Virginia already is part of the party's aggressive voter turnout operation and party officials are said to be weighing a substantial ad campaign in the state as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee already is spending about $1.1 million on ads in Virginia against Allen.

Allen, once considered a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, holds a financial advantage in the campaign but has lost ground to Webb after a series of campaign mishaps. A recent Washington Post poll had Allen and Webb virtually tied, with Allen's lead within the poll's margin of error.

Republicans, looking to pick up a potential Democratic Senate seat, spent $500,000 to air ads in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, who is being closely challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, conceded Tuesday that New Jersey is the only Democratic-held seat where Democrats do not hold comfortable double-digit leads, but said the party can withstand a last-minute expenditure against a Democratic senator.

"We believe we have the ability on defense should they put a lot of money in one state, particularly a blue state, to answer it," he said.

He would not say which state, but did not dispute a suggestion that Democrats may counter the money Republicans are spending in New Jersey.

Republicans were also taking a second look at some House races they once considered safe from Democrats.

The National Republican Congressional Committee is paying for polling in the Kentucky congressional district of Rep. Anne Northup and the Pennsylvania district of Rep. Melissa Hart. Such polls usually are commissioned to determine whether the party needs to put in resources to help a candidate in trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0082714

In another new battleground, both parties signaled that they will begin airing television ads in GOP Rep. Gil Gutknecht's re-election race in Minnesota, a campaign not previously considered competitive.

Both parties have also stepped up their spending on other means of reaching voters, particularly direct mail and automated phone calls. Since Friday, the National Republican Congressional Committee has about $350,000 in mailings and phone banks, most critical of Democratic candidates. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee reported more than $550,000 spent on phone banks, mostly against Republican candidates.

The NRCC also reported airing about $2 million in television commercials in nine highly competitive congressional districts. Republicans have hope they can hold onto the seat of former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in the midst of a scandal over sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage male pages. The NRCC reported spending more than $270,000 on an ad opposing the Democratic candidate for the seat, Tim Mahoney.

Pro-Republican Ads Stretch The Truth On Iraq To Influence Elections (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - It's an easy claim to make, calling yourself a "political truth squad." But when a shadowy group pouring untraceable millions into this fall's campaign makes that claim, that bears a little truth-checking itself.

Television ads from the group, Progress for America, manage to grab the heart, but also stretch or twist the truth as they work to boost support for the Iraq war.

They feature David Beamer, whose son led a counterattack against the terrorists who hijacked United Flight 93 on Sept. 11, 2001. Todd Beamer was the one who said, "Let's roll," as he and others courageously stormed the cockpit. The plane crashed in a field in Pennsylvania, well short of either the Capitol or White House, its presumed target.

"Todd was one of the passengers and crew who fought back on 9/11 and saved our capital from being destroyed," the elder Beamer says in one ad, looking squarely into the camera as a picture of his smiling son flashes beside him.

"Al-Qaida killed 3,000 Americans on 9/11 and will do anything to destroy us and our way of life. Todd and United 93 fought back. We continue this fight in Iraq today. This enemy must be destroyed in Iraq and wherever we find them."

That makes it sound as though the war in Iraq is retaliation against al-Qaida.

It's not. Iraq had nothing to do with al-Qaida's attack on us. In fact, a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report showed that not only did Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein not have anything to do with Sept. 11, he also wanted nothing to do with al-Qaida and shunned pleas for help from Osama bin Laden.

"Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," the report said.

Asked to back up its ad, the group pointed to news articles about al-Qaida in Iraq now. But we didn't "find" al-Qaida in Iraq. They came in to fight us after we invaded.

Misleading assertions like those made by Progress for America feed a lingering misunderstanding of the Iraq war. As recently as March, 39 percent of Americans believed that Saddam was personally involved in the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, according to the Gallup poll. That's down from 53 percent in 2002, but still surprisingly high.

Progress for America presumably hopes the ads will rebuild that false connection between Sept. 11 and Iraq - and thus make the Iraq war more justifiable to an increasingly skeptical public. The ads are being aired in Missouri and Ohio, two states where Republican senators are in danger of losing their seats, and on national cable TV.

Progress for America is a mysterious conservative group. It has aired ads supporting President Bush and his Supreme Court nominees, as well as the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism.

It was founded in 2001 as a "527" group, named for a section of the tax code, and raised an estimated $45 million for ads in the 2004 campaign.

It's now incorporated under section 501c(4) of the tax code, which prohibits it from directly supporting or opposing candidates, but also exempts it from having to disclose who finances it.

Nicole Philbin, a spokeswoman for the group, declined to say how much it's raised or spent, or who has financed its ads.

DOJ_NMG_0082715

The group has another ad featuring Beamer, this one supporting the war on terrorism and ripping unnamed people who question U.S. tactics. It was aired in Missouri and on national cable channels.

In it, Beamer says: "Now, we have narrowly escaped another 9/11 . . . using prove surveillance that some would stop."

That's a reference to the breakup of a plot to blow up U.S.-bound planes from London - and an apparent suggestion that it was stopped using the kind of warrantless eavesdropping that the Bush administration uses here.

But there's no evidence that the London plot was stopped by warrantless eavesdropping. And there's no backup to the assertion that "some" want to stop U.S. surveillance.

To the contrary, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who would chair the Judiciary Committee in a Democrat-controlled Senate, told a recent congressional hearing that he supports eavesdropping, but wants it done with court oversight.

To back up the ad, the group noted news articles that refer to U.S. surveillance done at the time of the London investigation. But that surveillance was done with court approval - exactly the approach that has universal support here. There was no documentation of the charge that "some" want to stop that surveillance.

To see the Beamer ads, go to www.progressforamerica.org and click on "videos."

For more on the Senate Intelligence Committee report, http://intelligence.senate.gov/phaseiiaccuracy.pdf

Colo. Opens Probe On Beauprez Attack Ad (AP-Y)

By Steven K. Paulson

AP, October 18, 2006

Colorado authorities have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack ad run by GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez against his opponent for governor illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database.

Democrat Bill Ritter's campaign has suggested the information was taken from the computerized crime records.

But John Marshall, the congressman's spokesman, said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign is cooperating with investigators.

The investigation marks an ugly turn for what has so far been a relatively mild campaign to succeed Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who is prevented by term limits from running again. Recent polls show the two-term congressman trailing Ritter, a former Denver district attorney.

The governor has asked the Colorado Bureau of Investigation to expedite its investigation. Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime punishable by fines and up to a year in prison.

The TV ad in question refers to Carlos Estrada Medina, a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says Ritter chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, Medina avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor.

Reporters found that the person arrested in Colorado was identified as Walter Noel Romo and had a different birthdate than Medina, according to the Ritter campaign. When questioned about the man's identity, the Beauprez campaign said Romo and Medina were the same man because federal criminal databases indicated the two men had the same FBI numbers.

Ritter spokesman Evan Dreyer said the campaign tried verifying that information through public records but could not — raising the possibility that the databases were illegally accessed.

"We could not connect the dots using information available to the public in a way that made any sense at all," Dreyer said. "If we couldn't do it, how was the congressman able to do it?"

Arrest records are the only public information in the database, CBI spokesman Lance Clem said.

Political Ad Draws A Criminal Inquiry (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DENVER, Oct. 17 (AP) — Colorado authorities have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack advertisement run by Representative Bob Beauprez against his opponent in the governor's race illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database.

DOJ_NMG_0082716

The television advertisement in question criticizes Mr. Beauprez's opponent, Bill Ritter, a Democratic former district attorney, for seeking a plea bargain in the case of a suspected illegal immigrant arrested on charges of heroin trafficking.

Mr. Ritter's campaign has suggested the information was taken from computerized crime records. Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime.

But John Marshall, Mr. Beauprez's spokesman, said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign was cooperating with investigators.

The race is to succeed Gov. Bill Owens, a Republican who, because of term limits, cannot run again.

Virginia's Senate Race (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

THE U.S. SENATE race in Virginia pits a novice politician, Democrat James Webb , against a much more experienced one, incumbent Republican George Allen, who spent much of the early fall obliterating his reputation for amiable charm and political deftness. As Mr. Allen has partially admitted, his wounds in the close race have been mostly self-inflicted and have left a sour taste in the mouths of many Virginians. Still, there is an even better reason to vote against Mr. Allen: Quite simply, he is a mediocre senator whose six years of undistinguished service do not justify rehiring.

His opponent -- former Navy secretary, former assistant defense secretary, former Marine Corps officer and former Republican -- is admirably independent-minded. He was prescient in warning, back in 2002, that the war in Iraq risked stranding the United States in a long-term occupation without an exit strategy. An intelligent man with a record of integrity, he has resisted the packaging of political consultants, which can only be a good thing. Those assets, as well as his deep familiarity with military and national security affairs, offer the promise that he would make an able, if unorthodox, U.S. senator. And the fact that his youngest son is deployed as a marine in Iraq gives him a perspective that is rare in today's Congress.

Mr. Webb, a fine writer, remains in many ways a political work in progress. His impressionistic grasp of domestic policy generally and his passing acquaintance with Virginia issues in particular reflect his meager experience in electoral politics. His diagnosis of America's widening disparities in wealth and income is on the mark, but his fuzzy-headed attacks on free trade are the wrong prescription. As a candidate, Mr. Webb has had a steep learning curve; to his credit, he has acknowledged it.

Mr. Allen lacks any comparable independent-mindedness. He has spent his time in the Senate in lock step with the Bush administration, embracing tax cuts that have imperiled the nation's fiscal health; subsidies for oil and gas companies that hardly needed the help; prisoner detention policies that have undercut America's image abroad; and restrictions on embryonic stem cell research despite its medical potential.

At the same time, Mr. Allen has accomplished little for his state's most dynamic region, Northern Virginia. Other Republican members of Virginia's congressional delegation -- Sen. John W. Warner and Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf -- have played vital roles in advancing transit and other priorities while Mr. Allen was busy grooming himself for a possible 2008 presidential race.

Many of the initiatives that Mr. Allen has undertaken in the Senate are the easy stuff -- relatively noncontroversial measures that lavish money and favors on his constituents. Nothing wrong with that, if it's part of a broader record of accomplishment. But while Mr. Allen has proposed some worthwhile bills -- for instance, to expand investment in nanotechnology and to help historically black colleges and universities upgrade their telecommunications infrastructure -- his legislative contributions have been marginal at best. He is no one's idea of a heavyweight in the Senate.

Virginians deserve better and more enlightened representation. Mr. Webb offers that hope.

Don't Call Him Redneck (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

About a year ago, before he was running for the Senate, James Webb took a colleague to the mountains of southwest Virginia to do some research for a movie they were working on.

Rob Reiner , meet my cousin Jewel and her husband, Buck. Jewel made a home-cooked meal for Webb and his producer-director friend. She pointed across the way to a nearby hollow and said:

DOJ_NMG_0082717

"Ah wuz bawn rat ovah theyah." That's Reiner on the phone from Los Angeles, doing a mountain accent.

At night, Webb took Reiner to a rustic auditorium. There was bluegrass and flatfoot dancing.

"Incredible experience," Reiner says.

There may be few places in the country more foreign to Hollywood than Gate City, Va., and much of Webb's livelihood has been to translate one culture for another. His dad's family came out of these hollows, though Webb grew up on military bases all over the country. Over the course of his career, in books and more recently in screenplays, Webb, 60, has been writing about the dignity of his people -- the gun-loving, country-music-singing, working-class whites of Scotch-Irish descent who fight in wars, staff the nation's factories and shop its Wal-Marts.

"This people gave our country great things, including its most definitive culture," Webb writes in his most recent book.

He knows that some folks might call his people rednecks. We pity those folks if Jim Webb is around when they say that.

* * *

Webb has moved in and out of public life, but the near-constant over the years has been writing, ever since he read a short story by Hemingway at Georgetown Law School and thought to himself, "That looks easy."

It wasn't, of course.

He is best known for the novel he started shortly after that, "Fields of Fire," a book he sweated over and struggled with, writing and rewriting it "seven times, cover to cover," as he likes to say. Drawing on his experience as a Marine company commander in Vietnam, it was published to much acclaim in 1978, when Webb was already serving as counsel to the House Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He went on to become assistant secretary of defense under Ronald Reagan and then secretary of the Navy. When he quit that post in a protest over budget cuts, he added screenwriting and producing to his rÃ©sumÃ© and spent 2 1/2 years trying to bring American businesses into Vietnam. And he kept writing books. In all, he has written six novels and, most recently, a book of nonfiction about Scotch-Irish culture. (That's not counting an academic book he wrote in law school, about U.S. military strategy in the Pacific.)

Campaign officials for Webb's opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, have repeatedly referenced Webb's careers in writing and in movies, hoping these labels might imply he is out of touch, untrustworthy or -- perhaps worst of all in Virginia -- liberal. In a debate, Allen said Webb was more aligned with the "values of Hollywood" than the "values of Virginia." "Hollywood," of course, is itself a dirty word in the popular political lexicon, a kind of shorthand for things that are lefty, elitist and vaguely debauched.

The funny thing is, Webb -- a Democrat who became a Republican in the '70s and a Democrat again in recent years -- has been a largely conservative force both in movies and on the printed page. At various times he has eviscerated liberals, feminists, elites, academics and those who protested the Vietnam War. He has criticized Hollywood for its treatment of his people. By all rights, he should have alienated someone like Rob Reiner. Instead, Reiner has been giving money to his Senate bid. ("I've maxed out," Reiner says.) Much of what they share is a deep opposition to the Iraq war.

The project that took Webb and Reiner to the hills of southwestern Virginia is a script they'd been working on for a movie about this very subject. "Whiskey River" centers on an Iraq war soldier who hails from a world much like Gate City, Va., and what Reiner calls the "culture of service" this soldier comes from. It is also, Reiner says, about the fundamental unfairness of a war in which "only certain people have to sacrifice."

The notion of his people's sacrifice in wartime is a theme Webb has returned to again and again in his writing. In his 2004 book, "Born Fighting: How the Scots-Irish Shaped America," Webb writes that the Scotch-Irish "have fed dedicated soldiers to this nation far beyond their numbers in every war." In interviews, he recalls starting law school in 1972 and discovering that others were in "ethnocentric retreat." Everyone else knew who they were and where they came from, everyone else had ethnic pride, but the identity of Webb's own culture had been lost. He says his peers labeled him a white man of privilege, a WASP.

In the decades since, Webb has studied the migrations of his people, exulting in their fighting history and puzzling over their entrenched poverty. He is himself the product of a long line of military men, and his son Jimmy is a Marine in Iraq. Webb's dad was an Air Force officer who used to make 4-year-old Webb hit him, fist to fist, to prove he was tough. Webb once told an interviewer he used to have to stand "at attention" when his dad inspected his room:

DOJ_NMG_0082718

"I'd say, 'Hey, Dad,' and he'd say, 'Shut up, you're a corporal.' "Everybody's Villains

Webb can be grim and stiff in public. In a recent appearance to generate support among Hispanic voters for his Virginia Senate run, Webb looked off into the distance as speakers took the podium, his body rigid, looking about as relaxed as, well, a corporal standing at attention. When the crowd whooped and clapped for him, he didn't even smile.

But one-on-one, Webb can really talk. He breaks into spontaneous, growling recitation of a manly poem called "Do You Fear the Wind?" that he learned from his father, and launches into a disquisition on country music. He critiques the prose of Winston Churchill ("marvelous") and Teddy Roosevelt ("a little over the top"). His manner is relaxed, bordering on incautious. Regarding his early drafts of a particular book, he says (unsenatorially) that "they all sucked."

He recalls a magazine article he wrote in 1984: "We had the second-highest volume of mail of anything that Parade's ever published."

He talks about his love of poetry. Yeats. Pound. Dylan Thomas. He talks about his books. "In a lot of my writing, the narrative is in meter," Webb says. "I don't know if you've ever noticed that."

We hadn't. He pulls out a copy of "Fields of Fire" and reads aloud to demonstrate.

"Fields of Fire" -- about Marines serving in Vietnam even as America has begun to turn its back on them -- is filled with the ugliness of combat, beautifully rendered. Tom Wolfe called it "the finest of the Vietnam novels," and it remains a strong seller to this day. Webb started it when he was surrounded by antiwar and anti-vet fervor. He was shocked that so many of his law school peers had avoided the draft; this seemed a gross inequity. He wanted those who hadn't served to experience the war as he had, to respect the soldiers who put their lives on the line no matter the cause.

In brutal language, peppered with obscenities and ethnic slurs, "Fields of Fire" demonstrates the horrors and murky morality of war. A man is blown open and his torso becomes "a dripping ooze." A Vietnamese translator who works for the Marines bribes a starving villager into having sex with him in exchange for food. Even when Webb's characters do gruesome things, he does not make it easy to condemn them.

As journalist Robert Timberg wrote, "Webb challenges the reader to engage in the actions of his characters, dusting each scene with ambiguity, offering no pat answers."

One of the main characters is a man much like Webb, a soldier of Scotch-Irish descent who comes from a tradition of fighters. Before going into combat, this character meets the battalion executive officer, who warns him about the ways the war will wreck his soul.

"You spend a month in the bush and you're not a Marine anymore. Hell. You're not even a goddamn person. There's no tents, no barbed wire, no hot food . . . You roll around in your own filth. You forget how bad you smell. Dead people, guts in the goddamn dirt, miserable civilians, it all gets sort of boring."

A paper trail is a dangerous thing for any politician to leave behind, and Webb's paper trail -- thousands of pages written over the course of 30 years -- is a very long one indeed. The Allen campaign's researchers have read all of Webb's books and compiled an exhaustive list of everything one might find offensive, with racial slurs in bold, along with such categories as "Women as Sex Objects (See also 'Sex Scenes')" and "Mutilation of the Dead."

"He makes his literary and movie works part of the debate in this campaign," says Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams. "It'll be up to Virginia to decide if that helps him or hurts him."

"I'm of the realist school of writing," Webb says. "You have a duty to portray things as they really are."

But there is less room for this sort of realism on the campaign trail than in fiction. Less room for ambiguity, too. These are lessons Webb appears still to be learning.

In a recent interview in the back of his campaign RV, Webb talks about how Hollywood has lampooned the Scotch-Irish. He says he is sick of this story line. For too long, he says, poor Southern whites have been one of the few groups it's still safe to make fun of.

"Every movie needs a villain," Webb says. He could let the statement end there, but instead, he does a strange thing. In the midst of a Senate race marked by accusations of racial insensitivity on both sides, he says this:

"Towel-heads and rednecks -- of which I am one. If you write that word, please say that. I mean, I don't use that pejoratively, I use it defensively. Towel-heads and rednecks became the easy villains in so many movies out there."

DOJ_NMG_0082719

Later, Webb's press secretary learns of this quote, and the next day Webb is calling a reporter from a fundraiser in Atlanta:

"I used the words that are used to stereotype them," he says, adding that he was using both terms "defensively." "I'm really upset if this is going to end up being the guppy that eats the whale here."Speaking of Stereotypes . . .

Webb knows another Hollywood story line very well. It's the one in which his potential movies languish for years. His most visible success was writing the original story for the 2000 movie "Rules of Engagement," starring Samuel L. Jackson. He has also sold or optioned several of his books to studios, but none has been made into a movie. Yet. There are timing issues, says his literary manager, Pete Donaldson. Or there are competing projects. Or there's a problem with the studio.

Most recently, "Whiskey River," optioned last year by Warner Bros. for $150,000, has moved into a holding pattern. Perhaps typical of Hollywood, Reiner, Webb and Donaldson each give different reasons why.

Webb has had other deals. In the early 1990s, he had a screenwriting contract with Universal that included working on other writers' screenplays. A few years back he wrote a pilot for a television series, but the show never made it to production. He's never lived in Hollywood, though he has visited the West Coast regularly for business.

Webb's books have continued to be popular. Webb says he receives "well into the six figures" on book advances, and according to a financial disclosure report filed in May in connection with his campaign, he is now worth between $2.2 million and $6.4 million. (The Senate disclosure form requires that candidates list their assets within broad ranges.) He lives in Falls Church with his third wife, Hong Le Webb, a lawyer who was born in Vietnam and escaped with her family after the fall of Saigon.

The novels are all military-themed and their titles pulse with warrior bravado -- "A Sense of Honor," "Something to Die For," "Lost Soldiers." Several have briefly made it onto major bestseller lists, and some have been translated into other languages. Critics have praised his scene-setting and far-ranging, action-packed plots. They've noted that, as one reviewer put it, he is "not just a writer of war thrillers; he is a genuine novelist of ideas," tackling such issues as when it's appropriate (or not) to put soldiers in harm's way.

When he falls down, it is because he fails to convey the moral ambiguity he achieved in "Fields of Fire." His portrayals can "border on caricatures," as a reviewer of Webb's 2001 novel "Lost Soldiers" put it. "Webb continues his literary M.O. of spicing his narrative with unsubtle conservative political gibes," another wrote. His bad men, his conniving politicians and a whole host of characters who might be lumped together as vaguely "liberal" garner flat, unsympathetic treatment.

In his 1983 book "A Country Such as This," Webb writes of a power-hungry feminist named Dorothy Dingenfelder who "had given up on trying to be pretty" and who enjoys a swanky hotel despite her "publicly egalitarian views." ("She ignored the paradox as irrelevant," Webb writes.) Dorothy organizes a protest against the Vietnam War in which the protesters begin to attack the soldiers.

"Dorothy watched it, uneasy with the ugliness. It was the soldiers, the Army that was supposed to be hateful and brutal."

And who are the soldiers? "The blue collar kids, the red-necks, " -- standing silently, misunderstood.

Familiar Themes Dominate Senate Radio Debate (CCT)

By Angela Delli Santi

The Contra Costa Times, October 18, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Less than two weeks after they butted heads in a debate at a New York television studio, the two candidates for U.S. Senate from New Jersey were at it again Tuesday, in a 90-minute radio encounter that opened with a lengthy exchange on the war in Iraq.

Republican Tom Kean Jr. repeatedly refused to say whether he would vote to authorize sending U.S. troops into Iraq, even if he had intelligence information that was not available when the war began. Democrat Robert Menendez voted against the resolution authorizing the start of the war and has called for a timely withdrawal of U.S. troops.

After the debate, which aired live on Millennium Radio Network stations, Kean was asked again and again to articulate his position on authorizing the war and each time refused to answer the question directly.

"At the time the case was made for the war in Iraq on national security grounds," Kean said when asked by debate moderator Eric Scott whether he would vote for the war "knowing what you know now."

Eventually, Scott moved on, but not before noting, "OK, you're not going to answer that question."

DOJ_NMG_0082720

Menendez has throughout the caustic campaign for U.S. Senate tried to link Kean with the policies of the Bush administration. President Bush's popularity hovers at around 35 percent in New Jersey.

Kean, the son of former Gov. Tom Kean Sr., has made ethics a centerpiece of his candidacy and has tried to paint his opponent, who rose through the ranks of rough-and-tumble Hudson County politics, with a broad brush of political corruption.

That familiar line of attack was evident again Tuesday night. When Kean was asked to articulate his allegations against Menendez, he repeated an oft-used line that his opponent is "under federal criminal investigation" for leasing office space to a nonprofit that receives federal funding. The U.S. Attorney's Office reportedly has subpoenaed records from the nonprofit organization that rented a Union City house from Menendez.

"Tom throws out allegations like other people throw out their garbage," Menendez shot back. "I'm under no federal criminal investigation."

Since the U.S. Attorney's Office will neither confirm or deny in-progress investigations, Kean was asked afterward what evidence he had to support his claim.

"Number one, he said he welcomed the investigation on national television," said Kean. He also cited as evidence the fact that Menendez accused the U.S. Attorney's Office of playing partisan politics and the fact that Menendez's political pals questioned the timing of the allegation.

The debate marked the fourth and last scheduled face-to-face confrontation between Menendez, the incumbent, and Kean, a state senator. The entire campaign has been characterized more by a lack of civility than a substantive debate on the issues.

Besides delving into their positions on various issues, this debate also explored the candidates' knowledge of southern New Jersey. After both Menendez and Kean insisted they'd spent a lot of time campaigning in the state's southern reaches, neither could correctly name the county in which six randomly selected South Jersey towns were located.

Tuesday's debate took place exactly three weeks before the Nov. 7 election. Recent polls show the race still virtually deadlocked, although Menendez has a slight edge outside the polls' error margin in a few surveys.

Voters can expect the candidates to unload the campaign cash they've raised so far on television and radio ads and get out the vote efforts in the remaining days. The latest figures filed with the Federal Election Commission show Menendez with $5.5 million to spend to Kean's $3.17 million to spend.

A spokeswoman on Tuesday said Kean loaned his campaign $400,000. On Monday, the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee said it would spend $500,000 to continue running one of Kean's television ads for an additional week in the New York area. It was the first such money sent to his campaign by the national party.

Menendez unveiled a new television ad Tuesday explaining how his 87-year-old mother's reliance on Medicare and Social Security encourages his fight against President Bush's effort to alter the programs, and how her Alzheimer's disease fuels his support for stem cell research.

Several celebrities have already campaigned for both candidates and more are expected. Kean will have Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in for him, while Menendez will have New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland and actor Michael J. Fox.

Different Approaches From Kean, Menendez (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Trenton, N.J. — Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. sat calmly in the lime-tinted hearing room, occasionally chatting to colleagues, during a close to three-hour hour meeting of the state Senate Health, Human Services and Senior Citizens Committee.

More than 60 miles to the Northeast, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) was getting ready to greet potential voters getting off the commuter train in Montclair, a community in densely packed Essex county, his second campaign event of the day.

As the meeting in Trenton wore on, legislators filtered out of the room until Kean was only one of six left to vote unanimously on an adoption bill.

DOJ_NMG_0082721

Earlier in the day, Menendez stood with local law enforcement officials at Rutgers law school in Newark to announce in front of several television cameras that he had just authored a new anti-gang crime bill that would be his top domestic security priority.

It was the second time in the past week that Kean took a day out of his campaign schedule to attend to the seemingly mundane tasks of committee work, while his opponent, with whom he is locked in a neck-and-neck race, stumped for votes.

While appearances this week suggest Kean is not as committed to the race as Menendez is, Kean has made it clear that he's in this battle to win.

Kean this week decided to spend at least $400,000 of his own money to defeat Menendez in a race that represents the GOP's best chance of capturing a Democratic Senate seat next month. The personal contribution will appear on fundraising reports to be made public today.

One GOP official estimated the $400,000 could help Kean's campaign increase his television presence by about 25 to 30 percent. It will also narrow Menendez's financial advantage. Newly filed finance reports show that Menendez had $5.5 million and Kean $3.2 million in their campaign accounts at the end of September.

This is the first time that Kean has dipped into his own pockets to assist his campaign.

The move comes as a surprise even to members of Kean's finance team, one of whom told The Hill yesterday that he did not know whether Kean could "invade" the family monies kept in trust.

Kean owns between $3million and $8million in stocks and $2million in family trusts and partnerships, according to news reports.

It comes after the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) announced yesterday that it would spend at least $500,000 in New Jersey, bringing the total amount of new Republican money in the race to close to $1 million.

The decision of national GOP party strategists to curtail spending in Ohio, where Sen. Mike DeWine (R) trails in the polls, and shift resources to New Jersey, shows that New Jersey is among the four most competitive Senate races in the country. That is surprising because New Jersey has not elected a Republican senator in New Jersey since 1972. And a Republican presidential candidate has not carried it since 1988.

But the anti-incumbent sentiment that has bedeviled Republicans around the country seems to be helping them in New Jersey, where the Democrats control the governor's mansion and the state house and senate. A succession of local Democratic scandals have eroded the party's image among voters and have allowed Republicans to borrow the credo Democrats have used as a bludgeon in other states: it's time for a change.

"Public service is a tradition that I'm proud of," Kean states on camera in a television ad now running in the state. "That's why I'm fighting to help New Jersey escape the clutch of corruption."

"New Jersey has had a very checkered history with senior elected officials," said Roger Bodman, a longtime Kean family friend who managed Tom Kean Sr.'s successful run for governor in 1981.

In 2002, former Democratic Sen. Bob Torricelli (N.J.) resigned from office after the Senate ethics committee rebuked him for accepting improper gifts from a supporter. In 2004 Democratic Gov. Jim McGreevey resigned after it became known that he appointed a man with whom he was having an extramarital affair to be the state's homeland security adviser.

More recently, attorney general Zulima Farber resigned after she was found to have violated ethics rules and last month former Democratic state Sen. John Lynch pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

Having spent his career in the midst of New Jersey Democratic politics, Menendez has struggled to separate himself from the transgressions of his fellow Democrats, but not always successfully.

For example, last Thursday Menendez was surprised when Democratic state Sen. Wayne Bryant, who is under federal investigation, showed up at a campaign rally Menendez held with Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) at a church in Camden.

Menendez's campaign also received a blow last month when it was revealed that Donald Scarinci, one of Menendez's closest political advisers, was secretly taped seven years ago pressuring a local official to hire someone as a favor to Menendez. Kean aired a portion of the recorded conversation in a hard-hitting attack ad that the NRSC is now paying to keep on television.

Kean has also gone on the attack against Menendez by repeatedly claiming that his opponent is under federal investigation, a charge that Menendez denies vehemently. Kean is basing his claim on reports that the U.S. attorney for the state of New Jersey subpoenaed the records from a nonprofit agency which leased a building from Menendez for $320,000. Kane claims that the agency paid the money in return for federal grants Menendez helped to secure.

But Menendez is fighting back by throwing allegations of ethical impropriety back at Kean. Menendez's campaign yesterday announced a new television ad that criticizes Kean for holding a fundraiser with executives from United Health Group on the same day his father, Tom Kean Sr., a former governor of New Jersey and a member of the group's board, was scheduled to testify about whether the company improperly dispensed stock options. Menendez has labeled the fundraiser a shakedown.

Kean for his part, accuses Menendez of attacking his father. Kean Sr. and Kean Jr. will hold a joint press conference today where they are expected to respond to the allegations.

Whether Menendez's counterattack will work or whether the perception that New Jersey Democrats are corrupt will prevail is unclear. Various polls have shown both Menendez and Kean leading by a few points.

One New Jersey political expert postulated that voters may have become inured to ethics scandals and may ignore the mudslinging to focus on issues such as the war and Social Security. That's what Democrats are arguing will happen.

"There's almost a sense among New Jersey voters that it's very difficult to be involved in state politics without somehow being tainted or crossing paths with people who are less than scrupulous," said Ross K. Baker, a professor of political science at Rutgers University.

Other observers, including both Democrats and Republicans, agreed that voters in New Jersey have a higher tolerance for scandal than in other states.

Hoyer Remark 'Racist,' GOP's Steele Charges (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele accused a leading Democratic congressman yesterday of racial insensitivity for saying the Republican candidate has "slavishly" followed the GOP.

Steele, an African American running for the U.S. Senate, was reacting to remarks by House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, who characterized Steele this week as having had "a career of slavishly supporting the Republican Party."

After speaking to members of the Maryland Chamber of Commerce gathered in Ocean City, Steele called the description "the height of arrogance."

"It goes to just the sheer craziness of some in the Democratic Party who think they can use racist terms and infer things about me just because I'm an African American Republican," he said.

Steele added that he expects his Democratic opponent, Benjamin L. Cardin, to "stand up and tell his team to sit down and shut up, stop the noise and apologize."

Hoyer's comments, first reported by MSNBC, came Sunday as he was introducing Cardin to a group of black business owners in Upper Marlboro, and his choice of words did not cause a visible reaction from the crowd.

"There was absolutely no offense taken or noticed," said event organizer Melvin Forbes, chief executive of Cool Wave Water. "It was obvious that Steny was simply talking about Steele's constant support for the Republican agenda."

The Rev. Anthony Evans, who heads a group called the National Black Church Initiative, released a statement last night calling Hoyer's comment "outrageous and destructive." "If I did not know Rep. Steny Hoyer, I would say that he is a racist," Evans said.

"I shouldn't have used those words," Hoyer said yesterday, through a spokesman. "If Mr. Steele did in fact take offense let me assure him that none was intended."

Cardin thanked Hoyer for addressing "this promptly, and we're glad that he did."

But he also said Steele was trying to change the subject. "He's looking for every excuse he can to avoid talking about the issues," Cardin said.

The two candidates spoke separately at the Ocean City forum on such topics as health care, Social Security and immigration.

Cardin asked the audience not to judge the candidates by "what you see on those 30-second ads."

DOJ_NMG_0082723

His timing was no coincidence. The Steele campaign released a commercial yesterday -- paid for by the National Republican Senatorial Committee -- essentially calling Cardin a hypocrite for saying he can "change Washington" while taking campaign contributions from corporate interests.

Steele and Cardin have taken hundreds of thousands of dollars from corporate political action committees, records show.

Steele said the difference is he is raising money within the constraints of a campaign finance system that Cardin has done nothing to change. "Talk to me after I've cast a vote," Steele said.

Cardin responded that voters should "judge me by my record" and said that Steele was the one offering to help the corporate interests in the hotel ballroom.

Steele closed his remarks by acknowledging some of the companies there, naming Pepco and Washington Gas, among others.

"What are you prepared to do, and who is going to be there to help you do it? You can count on me."

Tyson Ready To Enter The Ring For Steele (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Former heavyweight boxing champ Mike Tyson says he is so bullish on Republican Michael S. Steele's campaign for the U.S. Senate, he would return to the ring if Steele thought it might help him.

"I would do anything to help Michael," Tyson said in a telephone interview Monday night after holding a news conference in Ohio wearing a Steele T-shirt. "I would box an exhibition for him. I would even fight again to help Mike. I would do anything."

Iron Mike's little-known but long-standing devotion to Steele dates to the boxer's former marriage to Steele's half-sister, Monica Turner.

Tyson and Turner met in 1990 at a party at comedian Eddie Murphy's house and married in 1998, after the boxer's rape conviction. Turner flew to Indianapolis almost every two weeks to visit him in jail. Tyson and Steele remained close even after the couple's divorce.

"I always considered him a brother," Tyson, 40, said. "He's a remarkable human being."

The ringing endorsement, coming in a heated race between Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), arrived uninvited and wasn't exactly cherished.

Steele's campaign refused to make the candidate available to discuss his friendship with the boxer. Asked to comment yesterday, Steele spokesman Doug Heye responded by e-mail, "Mike Tyson is the father of the Lt. Gov's niece and nephew and therefore a member of his family."

A Tyson endorsement brings some of the heavy baggage from the boxer's checkered public life, including the rape conviction and that small matter of his biting off a chunk of Evander Holyfield's ear.

Not all of Tyson's controversies are in the past. Yesterday, while clad in the Steele shirt, he proclaimed his desire to fight women for money.

"This is not an endorsement you'd put up on the Web site," University of Maryland politics professor James G. Gimpel said, laughing.

But Steele has said nothing to belittle his friend. In an interview with the New York Times, Steele said he would "welcome in a heartbeat" the boxer's help, although Tyson has not done anything official for the campaign.

"He may be divorced from my sister, but I can't cast him aside," Steele told the Times. "You embrace. You love. . . . I've never sat in judgment of him, and I never would."

Steele was ringside in June 2005 when Tyson -- once the most feared boxer in the world, winning his first 37 bouts -- left the MCI Center after losing the third of four fights in a comeback attempt.

Tyson was booed by many in the crowd of 15,732 for quitting, and one fan threw a cup of soda at him as he left the arena, published reports said. Tyson responded by using his middle finger to express an obscenity.

DOJ_NMG_0082724

Although Steele has never talked much about his relationship with Tyson, the boxer's fame has ensured that the public record has plenty about it. Steele received some unwanted attention after trying to help his sister settle her divorce with Tyson without, in his words, having "the lawyers muddle everything."

While Steele was running for lieutenant governor four years ago, the state Democratic Party accused him of practicing law without a license, a matter that was eventually dropped.

And in 1998, when Steele was a candidate for state comptroller, he was on hand to lend support when Tyson pleaded no contest to assault charges. As Tyson was marched from a Montgomery County courtroom, he had only one thing to say to the waiting clutch of reporters: "Vote for Michael Steele."

Tyson said this week that he was "overwhelmed" by Steele's support for him at the time.

"I don't want him to jeopardize his career for me," he said. "He's just such a moral person. Boxing attracts scum. Being around him was a breath of fresh air."

Also this week, the lieutenant governor secured the support of another controversial boxing figure, promoter Don King, who offered this endorsement: "I must have an indictment list longer than his awards list."

Asked what to make of Steele's eclectic backers -- who include White House aide Karl Rove and hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons -- Matthew A. Crenson, a Johns Hopkins University political science professor, sighed deeply. "This guy has a very strange collection of friends," he replied.

Lieberman Urges Dems To Alter Their Ways (AP-Y)

By John Christoffersen

AP, October 18, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent after losing the Democratic primary, said Tuesday he hoped Democrats seize control of Congress — with one caveat: a Democratic-led Congress, he said, must change its ways.

"It won't represent progress that's real," Lieberman told reporters while stopping at a transportation forum in New Haven. "It's not going to be much of a step forward if there's a new Democratic leadership that doesn't change the tone in Washington."

As recently as Friday, Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat who was his party's nominee for vice president in 2000, would not say whether he thinks the nation would be better off with the Democrats in control of Congress.

Democrats must gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to win control of Congress. Lieberman has said he would remain a member of the Democratic caucus if he wins on Nov. 7.

Lieberman has said he will not endorse Democratic candidates because he understands that his candidacy has put Democratic candidates in an awkward position, and has said he would stay out of their races.

Most leading state and national Democrats have endorsed Ned Lamont, a wealthy cable television company executive who has put some $10 million of his own money into the race, including $2 million this week. Republican Alan Schlesinger is also in the race, but trails in the polls.

Liz Dupont-Diehl, a spokeswoman for Lamont, said the three-term senator isn't taking responsibility for helping set the tone in Washington. Lieberman has called for an end to partisan politics, but Lamont has criticized him for siding too often with Republicans and President Bush.

"It's certainly hard to tell from Sen. Lieberman's comments that he's the incumbent," she said. "It seems that he's trying hard not to own up to the fact that he's been there for 18 years."

On Tuesday, Lamont faulted Lieberman for backing a 2005 energy bill that the Democratic candidate argues was a giveaway to big oil companies that sent gas prices soaring.

"That's the Washington of George Bush and Joe Lieberman," Lamont said in a speech at Eastern Connecticut State University. "That's the Washington they have defended together."

Lamont offered a plan to promote energy efficiency, alternative fuels and other renewable sources. He called for tax credits to help companies buy new fuel-efficent equipment and set a goal for the United States to use one quarter of its energy from renewable sources by 2025.

DOJ_NMG_0082725

Lamont, the anti-war challenger, framed energy independence as a national security issue, "so we don't have to fight and lose loved ones in a desert in Iraq thousands of miles away."

Obama Kicks Off Book Tour, Weighs Presidential Bid (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- While Sen. Barack Obama launches the most public of book tours, with appearances on "Oprah Winfrey," the "Today" show, "Larry King Live" and "Meet the Press," he also is more intensively examining whether to run for president in 2008, reaching out to Democratic operatives and trying to reconcile the demands of a national campaign on his family.

Obama (D-Ill.) has been having quiet conversations with colleagues and friends about a prospective White House run, but a key concern is whether his wife, Michelle, would support it and whether he could manage the time away from their two young daughters.

"He has gotten the presidential bug bite," said Donna Brazile, campaign manager for Al Gore in 2000. "Barack is constantly calling, he's constantly talking to people. He's not calling me to check on the weather. I'm not saying he's in, but he's checking the water. He's having lots of conversations." Brazile said she is scheduled to talk politics with Obama shortly after Election Day.

Sen. Dick Durbin, Illinois' senior Democratic senator and a strong proponent of an Obama presidential bid, said his colleague has learned more about international affairs and the workings of the federal government in his brief Senate career than most governors who run for president. Staying in the Senate, Durbin said, will only provide opponents with more targets as Obama continues to cast votes.

"I said to him, 'Do you really think sticking around the Senate for four more years and casting a thousand more votes will make you more qualified for president?'" Durbin said. "The critical element that remains that he has to face is whether he is willing to be separated from his family for longer periods of time and I think he is staring that right in the face."

'No one else of interest'

He's also drawing plenty of stares from fans who have rushed to have him sign a copy of his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." The signings kicked off Tuesday in Chicago. Applause greeted him as he entered the third floor of the Michigan Avenue Borders. Hundreds of people had formed a line starting at 6 a.m.

"For me, there's no one else of interest," said Cheryl Hammock, 60, a Gold Coast resident. "I hope he's the next president."

That is just the kind of talk that fans the speculation about him running.

But David Axelrod, Obama's political consultant, said people should not read too much into a publicity tour crafted by the senator's publisher.

"He is not initiating calls on this," Axelrod said. "People call him all the time and he gives them a respectful hearing. I really don't think he's going to focus on this question at all until after Nov. 7."

Other political professionals, however, expressed skepticism that Obama's treatise on how America can move beyond its divisions to find common ground could be considered anything but a campaign platform.

"There's a political connection between the book he's written and the campaign he will run," said Tom Rath, the Republican national committeeman in New Hampshire. "It's awfully hard to go into some of these places and do what he's doing and say it's all about the book."

Obama has drawn national attention since he delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004, won his Senate seat and came to Washington. From the day of his arrival, there has been at least simmering speculation about a presidential run, and his appeal has only grown.

Just two years into a Senate career, but with a much higher and more positive profile than most senators, Obama also has been raising large amounts of money and earning other political capital by campaigning for fellow Democrats. In a 12-day period in October, he raised $2 million, aides said.

DOJ_NMG_0082726

Yet the book puts the focus almost exclusively on him, providing him with millions of dollars' worth of free publicity, largely in non-confrontational, friendly forums. If the book is popular—and already it is No. 15 on the Amazon.com list—it could help him in ways that Sen. John McCain's best-selling memoir, "Faith of Our Fathers," fueled his presidential campaign in 2000.

"It takes it to the next level, it gives you a platform and it gives you a little cover for testing the presidential waters," said Dean Spiliotes, a political science professor at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at St. Anselm College. "You can go to all the places but say, 'Hey, I'm just talking about my book right now.'"

At political events too

While playing the role of senator-author one day, Obama is often headlining political events the next. On Monday, Obama flew to Indianapolis with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) to raise money for three Democratic candidates in some of the nation's most competitive House races. Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said they talked about races around the country and what needed to be done over the next three weeks—not about a presidential bid.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said Obama has done everything Democratic leaders have asked him to, traveling to 20 or 30 states this year.

"He's the star. He is in such demand," Schumer said. "He is in greater demand than any other person that we have to offer."

And in campaigning for others, Obama is also subtly campaigning for himself.

"He's got the book, Oprah, [Tim] Russert—his time intellectually and emotionally is about the elections and about the book," Emanuel said. "That doesn't mean he's not considering it. A lot of people are talking to him. You can't go to the airport without seeing it—it's on the cover of Time."

Indeed, Obama's face fills the cover of Time magazine, with bold letters asserting "Why Barack Obama Could be the Next President." On Sunday, he will appear on "Meet the Press" with Russert, following a week of book and media appearances, including Charlie Rose, "Hannity & Colmes" and "Countdown with Keith Olbermann."

Shifting statements on future

In between, Obama will campaign for Chicago native Deval Patrick, the Democratic nominee for governor in Massachusetts, help House candidates in Philadelphia and rally for Jim Pederson for Senate in Arizona, to name just a few stops.

Obama partisans insist that the senator is simply trying to help out, and the publicity just happens to be ginned up by his publisher. But it comes when his statements about his presidential ambitions appear to be shifting substantially.

Last January, on "Meet the Press," Obama told Russert, "I will serve out my full six-year term," adding that his thinking had not changed since he took office.

"So you will not run for president or vice president in 2008?" Russert asked.

"I will not," Obama said.

In May, he told the Tribune that "there are people who think I should make an announcement tomorrow that I'm running for the presidency.

"I tell them," he said, "that I'm focusing on my job as a senator from Illinois."

Now, however, he has told Time that he will revisit the question in November.

"When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," Obama said. "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

GOP first-time candidate Dee Margo is running an uphill race against a longtime incumbent to represent heavily Democratic El Paso in the Texas Senate. So how'd he get the most popular Republican campaigner in the nation to stump for him?

Easy: Laura Bush is good pals with his wife.

DOJ_NMG_0082727

Gallery owner Adair Wakefield Margo and the first lady first clicked years ago when Adair wrote a book about El Paso painter Tom Lea , whose "Rio Grande" now hangs in the Oval Office. Laura and Adair traveled to Mexico to scope out artists' studios. The Margos raised big bucks for Dubya 's campaigns, and Adair now serves as chair of the President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities. Tomorrow, the first lady visits El Paso to speak at a private campaign luncheon for Dee.

Adair says she finds herself thinking often of the Bushes now that she's on the trail for her husband, dropping by the little Segundo Barrio businesses that still have Laura's picture hanging up front. And she finds herself looking to Laura's example on how to be a political spouse.

"Recently, at the White House, she told me, 'You know, they're blaming George for Katrina now,' " Adair said, adding that the first lady let the criticism roll off her back: "She's always kept things in perspective." The Bushes also taught her to keep the faith: "They believe that all things are possible. We've never elected a Republican state senator in El Paso. Things can change for the better in the Middle East, and we can have a two-party system in El Paso."

Coming Not-So-Soon To HBO: Graham's Story

The HBO biopic about former Washington Post publisher Katharine Graham is on hold once again.

There was plenty of buzz over the summer that the project was on the cable network's fast track, but it can't go forward without a finished script and an actress in the title role. HBO is looking for an A-lister-- the rumor mill includes Annette Bening, Helen Mirren and just about every top middle-aged star in Hollywood.

After Graham's Pulitzer Prize-winning autobiography, "Personal History," was published in 1997, she received dozens of offers to turn the dramatic story into a movie, and turned them all down -- as her family has done since her death in 2001. Acclaimed writer Joan Didion is attempting to write her version of Graham's life and is almost finished with the screenplay; Tom Hooper (who just won an Emmy for HBO's "Elizabeth I") is likely to direct. "HBO is still absolutely committed to the project," said a spokesman.

In the meantime, Hooper is busy with another high-profile HBO miniseries: In February, he's slated to start shooting "John Adams" in Virginia. Paul Giamatti will play the young Adams in the project, based on David McCullough's bestseller; Tom Hanks is the executive producer.

THIS JUST IN . . .

· Wesley Snipes was indicted in Tampa yesterday for not paying taxes and conspiracy to defraud the IRS. Federal officials said the action star failed to file income tax returns from 1999 to 2004; he and two other men are also charged for falsely claiming almost $12 million in refunds. As of press time, officials had not managed to find the 44-year-old actor; a warrant was issued for his arrest. He faces up to 16 years in jail if convicted.

· Rapper Fabolous was shot in the thigh early yesterday while leaving a Manhattan restaurant -- and ended up arrested hours later when police said they found unlicensed weapons in the car he used to leave the scene. No suspects have been apprehended in the shooting; the rapper was taken into custody after being treated at a hospital.

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

· Annie Leibovitz , choosing the fatty tuna at Kaz Sushi Bistro on Monday night after her appearance at Politics and Prose. The celeb photographer (a 1967 graduate of Northwood High School in Silver Spring) was sporting her iconic look -- long hair, hiking boots, leggings -- and talking about her ongoing book tour.

In Vodka Non Veritas (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

Hillary Clinton always reminded me of Sarah, the Mission Doll, in “Guys and Dolls.”

DOJ_NMG_0082728

As first lady, she had that earnest, sometimes sanctimonious, air of certitude and do-gooding that earned her the nickname Saint Hillary. As a senator, she has gotten friendly with conservatives in her Congressional prayer group and has lately been spotted wearing crosses around her neck, a gold one and a diamond one.

"Is it, perhaps, a sign that her faith may be a bit more in the foreground as 2008 approaches?" Ben Smith mused in a New York Daily News blog.

And yet Hillary always struck me as the sort of buttoned-up and driven woman who would be really fun if you could get her out for a night of dulces de leche in Cuba, as Marlon Brando did Jean Simmons in "Guys and Dolls."

My instinct about Hillary's subterranean saucy side was confirmed when I read a front-page story in The Times about her unlikely friendship with her expected rival in the 2008 race, John McCain.

Anne Kornblut wrote that two summers ago, on a Congressional trip to Estonia with Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins, Senator Clinton "astonished her traveling companions by suggesting that the group do what one does in the Baltics: hold a vodka-drinking contest. Delighted, the leader of the delegation, Senator John McCain, quickly agreed. The after-dinner drinks went so well — memories are a bit hazy on who drank how much — that Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, later told people how unexpectedly engaging he found Mrs. Clinton to be."

It seemed a refreshing breeze of bipartisanship in W.'s acrid era. But a few days after the anecdote appeared, Mr. McCain flatly denied it on Fox News as "Not true."

"Didn't happen?" Alan Colmes pressed.

"No," Mr. McCain insisted.

"But you and she have a good working relationship, right?" Mr. Colmes asked.

"I try to have a good working relationship with all senators, and I have a good working relationship with Senator Clinton, and I try to do that," Mr. McCain said.

Sean Hannity chimed in, "I'm glad to hear, Senator, you weren't drinking shots with Senator Clinton."

"I was not," Mr. McCain repeated, emphatically.

Then the senator went on Jay Leno's show and again denied the Night of Baltic Sea carousing. After joking that "we were trying to get Ted Kennedy to be the judge," he insisted again: "Didn't happen. Didn't happen."

"It was the front page of The New York Times!" Mr. Leno said, to which Mr. McCain riposted, "Don't believe everything you read."

Joshua Green, reporting the cover profile of Hillary for the latest issue of The Atlantic Monthly, was rebuffed when he asked for an interview with Mr. McCain about the night Hillary poured shots for fellow lawmakers. But Mr. Green ran into Mr. McCain walking through the Capitol and asked him about the Baltics escapade. "McCain lit up at the recollection," he wrote. " 'It's been 50 years since I'd been in a drinking game,' said McCain. ... He added, admiringly, 'She can really hold her liquor.' "

The Straight Talk Express was swerving again. Confused, I checked in with the McCain camp.

"They went out and had dinner," I was told. "After dinner, they had drinks. It was not a drinking contest, the way you and I think of a drinking contest. John had two drinks." Team McCain wanted it to be clear that Susan Collins and Hillary Clinton were more dedicated revelers, and that it was not an intimate party — "there were six senators and staff and Estonian hangers-on."

So the vodka vivacity happened, but Mr. McCain's staff, eager to see the senator pander to what Jon Stewart called the "crazy-base world," put a stop to their boss's inviting Mrs. Clinton on trips. The former fighter jock and "scamp," as his mom called him, has become so lifeless and base-whipped that he is scared to be seen knocking back Stolis with a nice Methodist girl from the Midwest who wears crosses around her neck.

"John was not intentionally misleading," his person said. "The image a drinking contest sets up is not very pretty, and we're in serious times. The best thing he's done is to be collegial. You can do that by drinking, but it's not a drinking contest. Is this splitting hairs?"

Actually, yeah. The once candid senator is starting to sound downright Clintonian with all this silly parsing and dissembling. I did not have drinks with that woman!

The Wal-Mart Posse (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0082729

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Wal-Mart may be expanding in the People's Republic of China, but here in capitalist America the low-price retailer has become the Democratic Party's favorite pinata. The media like to portray this as a populist uprising against heartless big business. But what they don't bother to disclose is that this entire get-Wal-Mart campaign is a political operation led and funded by organized labor.

We've done a little digging into the two most prominent anti-Wal-Mart groups, and they might as well operate out of AFL-CIO headquarters. An outfit called Wal-Mart Watch was created by the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), probably the most powerful union in America after the National Education Association. Wal-Mart Watch is backed by Five Stones, a 501(c)3 organization that received $2,775,000 in 2005 from the SEIU, or 56% of its $5 million budget. According to financial records, SEIU also gave Five Stones $1 million in 2004 to launch the anti-Wal-Mart group, and SEIU president Andy Stern is the Wal-Mart Watch chairman.

A second group, Wake Up Wal-Mart, is more or less a subsidiary of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union (UFCW). Wake Up Wal-Mart refuses to divulge its funding sources, but here is what we do know: The group was founded by the UFCW, is housed at UFCW headquarters, and its campaign director's $135,000 salary is paid by the UFCW.

Wake Up Wal-Mart also has close ties to the Democratic Party. Its union-funded campaign director is Paul Blank, who was political director of Howard Dean's failed Presidential campaign. The group sponsored a 19 state, 35-day bus tour across the U.S. earlier this year, staging anti-Wal-Mart rallies. Nearly every major Democratic Presidential hopeful has joined in the Wal-Mart-bashing, including Senators Joe Biden and Evan Bayh, New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson, and trial lawyer-turned-man-of-the-people John Edwards. They all seem to believe they have to take this line to pass union muster for 2008.

Even Hillary Rodham Clinton has joined in the political fun. Never mind that she served six years on the Wal-Mart board during her time in Beltway exile as an Arkansas lawyer and, according to the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, was paid $18,000 per year plus $1,500 for every meeting near the end of her tenure. Most recently, Mrs. Clinton returned a $5,000 campaign contribution from Wal-Mart to protest its allegedly inadequate health care benefits. Maybe someone should ask her if she's returned her director's pay, with interest. * * *

Most of the local protests against Wal-Mart are organized through the left-wing activist group ACORN, an acronym for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now. ACORN is the group that put the squeeze on the Chicago City Council to pass an ordinance this summer to require Wal-Mart, Target and other big-box stores to pay a minimum $10 an hour wage and $3 an hour in benefits by 2010. (Democratic Mayor Richard Daley vetoed the bill.) ACORN also pretends it is a locally organized and funded voice of the downtrodden masses. But guess where ACORN gets much of its money? Last year the SEIU chipped in $2,125,229 and the UFCW $165,692.

Then there are the anti-Wal-Mart "think tanks," if that's the right word for these political shops -- notably, the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) and the University of California at Berkeley Labor Center. The job of these two outfits is to publish papers backing the economic claims of Wal-Mart critics. The UC Berkeley group recently asserted that Wal-Mart "reduces total take-home pay for retail workers."

The UC Berkeley Labor Center has received at least $43,550 from SEIU. The Economic Policy Institute received $100,000 from the SEIU and $40,000 from the UFCW in 2005 and has published several anti-Wal-Mart studies, particularly on the benefits of the Chicago ordinance. By the way, Andy Stern also sits on the EPI board. He's a busy guy.

Now, we're not predisposed to be pro- or anti-Wal-Mart. We've criticized Wal-Mart lobbying on policy grounds -- for example, when the company supported a minimum wage increase to court some nice publicity while also knowing this would harm any lower-priced competitors. However, it is simply fallacious to argue that Wal-Mart has harmed low-income families.

More than one study has shown that the real "Wal-Mart effect" has been to increase the purchasing power of working families by lowering prices for groceries, prescription drugs, electronic equipment and many other products that have become modern household necessities. One study, by the economic consulting firm Global Insight, calculates that Wal-Mart saves American households an average of $2,300 a year through lower prices, or a $263 billion reduction in the cost of living. That compares with $33 billion savings for low-income families from the federal food stamp program. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0082730

Alas, what's good for working families isn't always good news for unions and their bosses. They hate Wal-Mart because its blue-coated workforce is strictly non-union -- a policy that dates back to the day founder Sam Walton opened his first store. Today the company employs 1.3 million American workers, and its recent push into groceries has made life miserable for Safeway and other grocery chains organized by the service workers or the UFCW.

Wal-Mart pays an average of $10 an hour, which is more than many of its unionized competitors offer. And typically when a new Wal-Mart store opens in a poor area, it receives thousands of job applications for a few hundred openings. So Wal-Mart's retail jobs of $7 to $12 an hour, which the unions deride as "poverty wages," are actually in high demand.

But as we say, this campaign isn't about "working families," or any of the other rhapsody-for-the-common-man union slogans. If Wal-Mart were suddenly unionized, Big Labor's membership would double overnight and union leaders would collect an estimated $300 million in additional dues each year to sway more politicians. Short of that, their goal is to keep Wal-Mart out of cities so their union shops have less competition. That's what the war against Wal-Mart is truly about.

A Treat Worthy Of Cinderella (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

With obesity rates soaring among the young, the Walt Disney Company has announced promising new guidelines for the way it promotes food to its impressionable clientele. Over the next two years, the company that brought you Buzz Lightyear and Goofy and the Lion King plans to make sure that its animated characters endorse healthier children's foods with less fat and sugar and fewer calories.

Disney has also begun revamping menus in its theme parks with the goal of abolishing trans fats and offering applesauce or other healthy side dishes to children. French fries — and sweets — will still be available on request. How can you enjoy Disneyland without a little ice cream? But Disney's kingdoms also promise pure juice, water, and real fruits and vegetables — unsugared, unreconstituted, undoctored.

Disney should work to take the next step by limiting the overload of junk food advertising on its television shows for Toon Disney and ABC Kids. But this first move is a good one, and it should send a strong signal to other corporations.

Childhood obesity has tripled in the last 25 years. There are many cures for this: more physical activity than television time, for example. But the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has also warned that "current food and beverage marketing practices put children's long-term health at risk."

At this point, the Bush administration and Congress seem content to keep studying the problem. Some corporations have used that as an excuse to continue peddling ultra-sweet cereals and high-fructose drinks. Others have made a few feeble efforts to promote healthier eating to children. It's heartening that a few, mainly Kraft and now Disney, recognize that we can't wait forever for Congress to act, and are actually doing something now.

N. Korea Apparently Preparing Nuke Test (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

AP, October 18, 2006

Satellite images indicate North Korea appears to be getting ready for a second nuclear test, officials said Tuesday, as the defiant communist regime held huge rallies and proclaimed that U.N. sanctions amount to a declaration of war.

China, the North's longtime ally and biggest trading partner, warned Pyongyang not to aggravate tensions. The U.N. has condemned the Oct. 9 atomic blast, and U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill told reporters in Seoul on Tuesday that another nuclear explosion would be "a very belligerent answer" to the world.

As the White House acknowledged that the isolated nation might try a second test, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice launched a diplomatic drive to persuade Asian allies and Russia to intensify North Korea's isolation by enforcing sanctions that the U.N. Security Council unanimously approved on Saturday.

Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said Wednesday in Seoul that Rice plans to ask the South to expand its role in a U.S.-led international program to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior U.S. defense official said.

DOJ_NMG_0082731

The activity, started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering. He said that although the purpose of the structures is unclear, officials are concerned because North Korea has left open the possibility of another test.

A senior South Korean official told foreign journalists that despite signs of a possible second test, it was unlikely to happen immediately.

"We have yet to confirm any imminent signs of a second nuclear test," the official said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

In North Korea, the nation marked the 80th anniversary of the "Down-with-Imperialism Union" — a political platform on which the ruling party was built. North Koreans held parades across the country along with an enormous gathering at a central square in Pyongyang.

In the capital, hundreds of women in brightly colored costumes sang and held bunches of flowers, including some named for Kim Il Sung, the country's first leader and the late father of current leader Kim Jong Il.

The regime slammed the U.N. measures with a stream of bellicosity in a Foreign Ministry statement released on the official Korean Central News Agency.

"The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of a war" against the North, the statement said.

The North also said it "wants peace but is not afraid of war," and that it would "deal merciless blows" against anyone who violates its sovereignty.

It said it wouldn't cave in to "the pressure and threat of someone at this time when it has become a nuclear weapons state."

South Korean nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo said the North's reaction wasn't surprising, and was full of "the usual rhetoric."

China warned Pyongyang against aggravating tensions.

"We hope North Korea will adopt a responsible attitude ... and come back to resolving the issue through dialogue and consultation instead of taking any actions that may further escalate or worsen the situation," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said at a press briefing in Beijing.

But now that the U.S. has confirmed that last week's blast was indeed nuclear, North Korea can be expected to use its new position as a confirmed atomic state to press for direct talks and concessions with Washington — as it did in March 2005, a month after Pyongyang first asserted it had a nuclear weapon.

Hill, the U.S. envoy, said the North was falsely assuming it would win more respect with atomic explosions.

"The fact of the matter is that nuclear tests make us respect them less," he said, adding that the North's comments about sanctions were "not very helpful."

U.S. intelligence has concluded that the North Korean device likely used plutonium, as opposed to uranium, in the Oct. 9 test.

Under a 1994 deal with the U.S. during the Clinton administration, North Korea pledged to freeze its nuclear program, then believed to be based on producing weapons-grade plutonium. But the agreement broke down by 2002 under the Bush administration after revelations of a covert effort by the North to produce highly enriched uranium. Pyongyang soon removed 8,000 spent fuel rods that the International Atomic Energy Agency was monitoring and began to reprocess them into weapons-grade nuclear fuel.

The White House said Tuesday that it wouldn't be surprising if North Korea were to try another nuclear test "to be provocative."

"It would not be a good thing for them, but it certainly would not be out of character," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "We're not going to discuss any particular matters of intelligence, but if you take a look at the record, I think it is reasonable to expect that the government of North Korea will do what it can to test the will, the determination and the unity of the United Nations."

Asked why it would not be a good thing for North Korea, Snow said, "If they do believe that somehow people are going to give them a pass on this, they're going to find out that they're wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0082732

While U.S. officials insist they aren't about to invade, they have taken other steps against North Korea — even before the U.N. resolution — including severing it from the international financial system. That move is believed to have angered the elites that keep Kim in power, and Kim may fear being ousted or possibly even killed.

The North has consistently pressed for direct talks with the U.S. on the financial sanctions and has refused to attend six-nation disarmament talks until the sanctions are lifted. Along with the U.S., the talks include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

Now, the North has a new arrow in its quiver: being a confirmed nuclear power recognized as such by the very country whose attention it so desperately craves.

The Bush administration, wary of rewarding the regime's behavior, has consistently refused to talk directly to the North, insisting the issue is a regional concern and seeking to enlist other countries.

On Tuesday, Rice left for Japan, first stop on a four-nation trip, amid clear signs of unease in China and South Korea about even the softened sanctions.

China contends that interdicting ships, although permitted in the U.N. resolution, might needlessly provoke the North and discourage it from returning to the six-nation talks. South Koreans worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

"Sanctions against North Korea should be done in a way that draws North Korea to the dialogue table," South Korean Prime Minister Han Myung-sook said, according to Yonhap news agency. "There should never be a way that causes armed clashes."

Seoul Warns Of Another N Korea Test (FT)

By Anna Fifield , Richard Mcgregor And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

The South Korean government on Tuesday said it had detected activity suggesting that North Korea might be preparing to conduct a second nuclear test, as concerns mounted worldwide that Kim Jong-il's regime might again defy international pressure.

Amid a flurry of diplomatic meetings – and reports China had begun taking tough action against its errant neighbour – North Korea issued another statement condemning United Nations sanctions, imposed after last week's nuclear test, as a "declaration of war".

Pyongyang said: "The US would be well advised not to miscalculate the DPRK."

Even a few months ago such a threat would probably have been dismissed as mere sabre-rattling, but these statements are now being taken more seriously following the regime's decision to go ahead with missile and nuclear tests.

US television networks reported overnight that US spy satellites had detected "suspicious vehicle movements" in North Korea. It was thought that the movements could signal preparations for another test.

A senior official of the Seoul government confirmed that there were signs of unusual activity near the site of the first test in northern North Korea. "We are keeping a close eye on that place," he said.

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said a second nuclear test would result in the further isolation of North Korea, including from China, which is seeing its already difficult relationship with the Stalinist state deteriorating. One person familiar with North Korean warnings to its neighbours said China had received only 20 minutes' notice of the first test, as opposed to the two hours Russia had received.

"What you've seen already in the case of the first test is that the US and the Chinese are working more closely together than even before," said Mr Snow. "I daresay they would become even closer as strategic partners in trying to guarantee safety in the Korean peninsula."

China said it was "resolutely opposed" to a second test. Liu Jianchao, the -foreign ministry spokesman, said Beijing hoped North Korea would adopt "a responsible attitude and come back to resolving the issue through dialogue and consultation".

Fears of a second test have been stoked by the arrival of Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, in north-east Asia for discussions on how to deal with the North Korean nuclear crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0082733

Following its support for the UN sanctions, China appears to be taking some tough action against North Korea. “China will strictly act on this resolution. We will shoulder and fulfil our -obligation,” Mr Liu said -yesterday.

Although both say they support the sanctions, China and South Korea are considered unlikely to squeeze North Korea too hard for fear of causing a collapse on its borders.

But there have been reports that some branches of the Bank of China, including those in Dandong, the town through which most bilateral trade is conducted, have halted remittances to North Korea.

Hints Of Another N. Korea Test Seen (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence agencies have detected new activity near the site where North Korea detonated a nuclear device last week, suggesting possible preparations for a second test, a U.S. intelligence official said Tuesday.

The indications of a possible follow-up test, coinciding with similar reports from South Korea and Japan, prompted warnings from Washington and other capitals that a second nuclear explosion would heighten international tensions and deepen North Korea's isolation.

The White House did not rule out the possibility of a second test.

"Let me put it this way: The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said.

North Korea's test Oct. 9 was considered by analysts to be at least a partial failure because of its low explosive yield, less than the equivalent of 1,000 tons of dynamite, which is much smaller than most nuclear blasts.

The U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity because intelligence findings were being discussed, said another try by the North Korean government in Pyongyang was possible.

"Nobody has discarded the possibility of another test," the official said.

At the same time, the official noted that activity is frequently seen at such sites, and that an imminent test is frequently indicated by relative calm as crews clear the test area.

The U.S. State Department said there was nothing to "indicate one way or the other" whether a second test was about to take place.

U.S., Allies Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

The United States and two allies voiced new worries yesterday that North Korea is set to conduct a second underground nuclear test, as Pyongyang said that new U.N. sanctions are tantamount to a declaration of war.

Asked about the possibility of another nuclear test, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told reporters that there is "speculation," but no specific information.

"We've seen them do things in multiples rather than singles," Mr. Rumsfeld said, referring to North Korea's seven missile-flight tests in July.

"There's speculation that they may want to do something additional. There's also speculation they may not. So, only time will tell," he said after meeting with Singapore's former prime minister, Lee Kuan Yew.

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said, "We have received such information [about a test], but I cannot tell you the details."

A South Korean official told reporters in Seoul that "there are certain signs that prompted our authorities to cast a very sensitive eye on the matter."

U.S. intelligence agencies on Monday confirmed that a blast Oct. 9 northwest of Kilchu, North Korea, was a nuclear test, although it appeared to be smaller and less successful than anticipated.

The White House warned North Korea yesterday that another nuclear test would lead to greater isolation.

DOJ_NMG_0082734

"The first test, while nuclear, did have a low yield, and perhaps it would not be unreasonable to expect that the North Koreans might want to try something once again to be provocative," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters. "It would not be a good thing for them, but it certainly would not be out of character."

A U.S. official said yesterday that a second test is possible but that there are no signs one is imminent.

A defense official said that several North Korean nuclear-testing facilities are being watched closely and that some increased activity has been spotted. Normally, such tests are preceded by vehicle movement and increased communications.

North Korea's government, meanwhile, harshly criticized sanctions passed Saturday by the United Nations in response to the nuclear test, issuing its first official statement on the matter.

The Foreign Ministry said North Korea's test was the result of "the U.S. nuclear threat, sanctions and pressure."

North Korea "was compelled to substantially prove its possession of nukes to protect its sovereignty and right to existence from the daily increasing danger of war from the U.S.," the ministry said.

Pyongyang, however, still wants to "de-nuclearize the peninsula through dialogue and negotiations," it stated.

North Korea "is ready for both dialogue and confrontation," the Foreign Ministry said. "If the U.S. increases pressure upon [North Korea], persistently doing harm to it, it will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war."

In Seoul, Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told reporters that another nuclear test will be a further sign of North Korean bellicosity.

"We would all regard a second test as a belligerent answer on North Korea's part to the international community," he said. North Korea "really has to understand that the international community is not going to accept [it] as a nuclear state."

Mr. Hill said Pyongyang might view nuclear tests as a way to gain respectability but, in fact, the blasts "make us respect them less."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left Washington yesterday for a diplomatic tour of the region. She will meet with Japanese officials today and South Korean ministers tomorrow on North Korea sanctions. She will also meet with Chinese officials later in the week.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency today quoted Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador in Seoul, as saying Miss Rice will ask South Korea to help inspect North Korea-bound ships for the components for weapons of mass destruction. Both China and South Korea have expressed reluctance to participate in such actions.

The governments of South Korea and Japan also are worried that a second test is coming.

Intelligence analysis of the likelihood of a second test appeared mixed. Some analysts said there is no evidence indicating that a second test will be conducted soon.

"This activity could represent prep for a second test, but it doesn't necessarily mean definitively that it is," the defense official said.

People and vehicle activity in North Korea is not a sure sign of an impending nuclear test.

"They may have had the same activity six months ago, but it wouldn't have raised any red flags at the time," one official said. "But now it is."

On the motive behind North Korean actions, Mr. Snow said he would not "do a psychological evaluation of the 'Dear Leader,' " as North Korea's Kim Jong-il is called.

"What we do is, we take a look at his actions, and we'll respond with actions, which we think are going to be louder than words or psychological profiles," he said.

"I think the consequences of a second North Korean nuclear test would be the further isolation of North Korea," Mr. Snow said.

N. Korea Condemns Sanctions, Threatens 2nd Nuke Test (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082735

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to seek commitments from China and other North Korean neighbors for a sweeping inspections program to monitor almost all cargo shipped to or from the would-be nuclear power, a senior State Department official said during the first leg of Rice's four-nation trip to Asia.

Though couched in more diplomatic terms, the action described amounts to a virtual blockade--albeit one imposed at the ports, frontiers and airfields of North Korea's trading partners rather than on the seas surrounding the nation.

The official stressed that the U.S. would ask countries to use their ordinary customs authority to control shipments to and from their territory. Except in rare circumstances such as detecting that unconventional arms or missile technology are onboard, the U.S. does not contemplate the boarding of North Korean vessels in international waters, the official said.

With Rice scheduled to touch down in Tokyo about 3 p.m. there Wednesday, tensions continued mounting in the region Tuesday as North Korea condemned the United Nations sanctions as "a declaration of war" and analysts in the U.S. and Japan said there were indications the government of Kim Jong Il was preparing a second nuclear test. A first test earlier this month led to the unanimous UN Security Council vote to impose sanctions.

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior U.S. defense official said.

The activity, which started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering.

In North Korea, meanwhile, the nation marked the 80th anniversary of the ``Down-with-Imperialism Union"--a political platform on which the ruling party was built. North Koreans held parades across the country along with an enormous gathering at a central square in Pyongyang.

The regime slammed the UN measures with a stream of bellicosity in a Foreign Ministry statement.

``The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of a war" against the North, the statement said.

The new UN measures ban North Korea from importing or exporting materials for weapons of mass destruction or missile technology. They also forbid the sale of luxury goods and call for a freeze on the assets of individuals and entities involved in the nuclear program.

China has a lengthy border with North Korea and is its largest trading partner, making its cooperation crucial to attempts to exert pressure. But China's interest in discouraging North Korea's nuclear program is balanced by fears of regional chaos if the regime collapsed.

Though there were reports the day after the resolution that Chinese authorities inspected cargo traversing its frontier with North Korea, it is unclear how long the efforts will last or how complete they will be. China's UN ambassador declared after passage of the sanctions that China would not interdict North Korean ships passing through its territorial waters.

Rice will make the case to China and other nations that the UN sanctions impose a legal requirement to prevent shipments of contraband.

"We believe it is now a legal obligation for states to give very close scrutiny on their territory, in their ports, in their territorial waters and even in their airspace to any North Korean cargo," said a senior State Department official.

Shipments over Chinese airspace are particularly significant because flights between North Korea and Iran, which the U.S. also fears is engaged nuclear weapons development, ordinarily would pass over China.

"We're not telling them they have to do 100 percent inspections. But we want effective enforcement," the official said.

Speaking to reporters on the first leg of her flight from Washington to Tokyo, Rice said the U.S. expected aggressive enforcement of the resolution.

"It changes the obligation of states to make sure they are using whatever authorities they can to make sure that this trafficking does not take place. It is a mandatory obligation," Rice said.

Rice also warned against a second test.

"Further action by the North Koreans is only going to deepen their isolation, which is pretty deep right now," she said.

Tribune news services contributed to this report.

Rice To Push U.S. Allies To Inspect N. Korean Cargo (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0082736

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that she will push U.S. allies to conduct aggressive inspections of North Korean cargo for nuclear weapons materials.

The Bush administration's plan to argue for a strict interpretation of a United Nations resolution, which calls for inspections, could further raise tensions in the region. The sanctions resolution was passed Saturday to punish North Korea for its recent nuclear test.

In a statement, North Korea said Tuesday that the U.N. resolution "cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of war." The North also warned it "wants peace but is not afraid of war."

The Bush administration and its key allies expressed concern that North Korea was preparing a second test.

The chief U.S. envoy on the North Korean nuclear issue, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, said in Seoul that the response from Pyongyang was "not very helpful."

"We would all regard a second test as a belligerent answer on North Korea's part to the international community," Hill said.

South Korea and China have balked at searching North Korean ships for fear of sparking a military confrontation. North Korea warned that it would respond violently to attempts to inspect its cargo.

"We will deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty," said a statement issued through the country's official news agency.

Rice, briefing reporters on the way to Asia, said a focus of her trip would be to discuss "defensive measures" to prevent North Korea from exporting nuclear materials. "The world needs to build a framework for this kind of work," she said.

While Rice said the U.S. intention is not to inspect every North Korean ship, truck or plane, she made clear that she would use visits to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to push for a vigorous implementation of the new resolution.

The resolution calls for inspections "as necessary" to prevent illegal trafficking by North Korea.

"There are obligations for sanctions on North Korea, also obligations to inspect certain cargos," Rice said.

The resolution calls for nations to prevent North Korea from buying or selling specified weapons or technology. The measure also bans some luxury goods from North Korea and freezes funds outside the country that are associated with weapons programs.

Rice's efforts could be complicated if North Korea is preparing a second nuclear test.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the Bush administration would not be surprised by a second test, while warning against it.

"The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative," Snow told reporters at the White House. "And perhaps it would not be unreasonable to expect that the North Koreans would like to try something again."

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government had received unspecified indications that North Korea might be preparing for a second test. "I cannot tell you the details," he said.

The Bush administration confirmed Monday for the first time that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear test last week.

Rice To Urge Radiation Inspections To Thwart North Korea (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska, Oct. 17 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will urge the countries of northeast Asia to create a strict system of radiation monitoring and inspections to prevent North Korea from smuggling nuclear materials into or out of the country, a senior State Department official said Tuesday.

But in what appears to be an effort to cajole China to enforce the new United Nations sanctions against North Korea aggressively, the United States will ask the countries to focus their efforts on conducting inspections in their own territories, including ports, and on suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft rather than every piece of cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0082737

China has been concerned about taking too harsh a stance against North Korea, and its ambassador to the United Nations has said it will not interdict ships.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for the North Korean Foreign Ministry called the United Nations sanctions against his country a "declaration of war." The tone of the statement was not atypical for the North, which often releases bellicose public announcements.

The United Nations resolution, issued last weekend to punish the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear bomb test, bans trade with North Korea in materials linked with unconventional weapons, and authorizes countries to inspect cargo going into and out of the North. But this last measure was diluted by China's insistence that the resolution state that countries be asked, not required, to do so.

What Secretary Rice will be negotiating this week with Asian countries is how they will ensure that transfers of nuclear and other material do not happen. China, which voted for the United Nations sanctions, says it is committed to putting the resolution into effect.

The American idea for a new security framework for North Korea, as described Tuesday by the State Department official, was intended to try to ensure that the country's suspicious cargo would be inspected in Asia, but in ways that could not be construed as a blockade.

"We do not envision this regime as an embargo, as a quarantine or as a blockade," said the official, who was accompanying Ms. Rice as she flew from Washington to Asia, with a refueling stop here in Alaska. "It is much more selective in nature" and aimed specifically at materials for manufacturing unconventional weapons, or building missiles to carry them, the official said.

The United States will urge the northeast Asian countries to use radiation monitors to identify suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft and to also consider United States and Asian intelligence in figuring out which cargo to check.

Separately, in comments to correspondents at the start of her trip for talks in Tokyo, Seoul, Beijing and Moscow, Ms. Rice stressed that efforts to end North Korea's nuclear program should be carried out in ways that do not escalate the crisis.

Her comments could be heard as assurances to the leadership in Beijing. As worried as China may be about North Korea's decision to explode a nuclear bomb, it is equally worried that international sanctions, led by the United States, could cause its neighbor to implode, sending thousands of refugees streaming across its border.

Ms. Rice repeated the Bush administration's official formulation that the United States has no intention or desire "to attack or invade North Korea." But she also said that "the long-suffering people of North Korea should not be forgotten by the international system."

She warned of dangers if other nations moved toward developing their own nuclear arsenals to counterbalance North Korea — one reason that she said she planned to reaffirm American security commitments to Japan and South Korea.

Officials aboard Ms. Rice's airplane gave the most detailed description to date of how the Bush administration hopes to enlist North Korea's neighbors to implement the Security Council sanctions. They described how a more stringent monitoring and inspection program might focus on the placement of radiation sensors at the land crossings along China's lengthy border with North Korea, and at airfields and ports across the region and around the world that are known to handle cargo to and from the North.

The number of border crossings, airports and maritime ports used in trade by North Korea's feeble economy is limited.

Officials who described details of these initial ideas did so on condition of anonymity, under traditional ground rules for speaking in advance of diplomatic talks.

Tuesday's statement by North Korea said the country would "deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty and right to survive under the excuse of carrying out the U.N. Security Council resolution."

Referring to the North by the initials of its official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the statement also said: "The D.P.R.K. had remained unfazed in any storm and stress in the past when it had no nuclear weapons. It is quite nonsensical to expect the D.P.R.K. to yield to the pressure and threat of someone at this time when it has become a nuclear weapons state."

DOJ_NMG_0082738

In Seoul, South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Yung-woo, said the statement contained "no surprises," and was just "the usual rhetoric that they have been using," according to Agence France-Presse.

U.S. Urges Vigilance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says she hopes to use her trip to Asia to convince South Korea, China and other countries they have a legal obligation, under a U.N. resolution passed Saturday, to inspect North Korean cargo.

The world-wide inspections envisioned by the Bush administration would go far beyond the 2003 Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, under which certain countries have moved to interdict ships or planes suspected of carrying long-range missiles or nuclear material. They would also exceed the measures that some other countries, notably China and South Korea, appear ready to undertake.

Ms. Rice was en route to Tokyo yesterday as part of a five-day trip to Asia to discuss how to enforce penalties against North Korea for testing a nuclear device. U.S. officials said satellite pictures of North Korea suggest that preparations for another test explosion could be under way.

Ms. Rice sought to allay concerns that the U.S. envisioned a sort of blockade, saying that ship interdictions would largely come about as the result of tips. "We are not looking at inspecting every ship," she said.

The Bush administration "does not envision this regime as an embargo, a quarantine, or a blockade," said a senior State Department official traveling with Ms. Rice. But the U.N. resolution does create "a legal obligation" for all states "to give close scrutiny" to all North Korean cargo entering their ports, crossing their borders or entering their air space, the official said.

"We do want an effective inspection regime established that looks at North Korean shipments no matter how those shipments are made," he said.

Both China and South Korea have expressed concern in recent days that the resolution not amount to a blockade or lead to provocations that might spark a military conflict with Pyongyang. North Korea called the U.N. resolution "a declaration of war."

Ms. Rice told reporters traveling with her that much of her discussions in South Korea and China will focus on measures those countries will take to inspect North Korean cargo. Under the U.S.-led PSI, searches were voluntary and initiated only when authorities suspected that there were illicit goods. Now, she said, "it's a mandatory obligation."

China and Russia fought successfully last week at the U.N. to tone down much stricter language on inspections that had been proposed by the U.S. The final resolution simply "calls upon" states to take "cooperative action" as allowed under their own laws to inspect North Korean cargo.

But the administration is now pushing for a tough interpretation of the measure, arguing that countries have a legal responsibility to inspect such cargo. U.S. officials applauded reports Monday that China had begun to inspect trucks at its border with North Korea. But both Beijing and Seoul appear reluctant to push inspections too far, especially when it comes to boarding North Korean ships.

In addition to urging strict inspections, Ms. Rice will also offer to help China and South Korea bulk up radiation-detection capabilities at key border crossings. She is scheduled to visit South Korea tomorrow, China on Friday and Russia on Saturday.

Sanctions Against North Korea Must Be Firmly Enforced, Rice Says (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska - The United States is pressing North Korea's neighbors to check virtually all North Korean cargo crossing their borders by air, land and sea to fully enforce new U.N. sanctions, a senior State Department official said Tuesday.

As part of the response to North Korea's nuclear test, plans also are under way to expand radiation detection programs in East Asia to prevent Pyongyang from importing or exporting nuclear weapons material, said the official, who was traveling to Asia with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0082739

Rice, speaking to reporters en route to a refueling stop in Alaska, said firm enforcement of the sanctions is the best hope for persuading North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to reverse his isolated country's new nuclear status.

Still, she said there was only "a fair chance" that will happen.

Rice was headed to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to coordinate approaches to North Korea and reaffirm longtime military alliances with Tokyo and Seoul.

Following North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, the U.N. Security Council on Saturday approved a resolution containing the strictest sanctions it has imposed in a half-century. They include a ban on export or import of nuclear- and missile-related materials, heavy conventional armaments and luxury goods.

North Korea, which may be preparing a second nuclear test, said it was "nonsensical" to try to restrain it now that it has a nuclear arsenal.

"The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than (as) a declaration of war," the North Korean foreign ministry said in a statement Tuesday. "We will deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty and right to survive under the excuse of carrying out the Security Council resolution."

Satellites reportedly have picked up suspicious movement of trucks and people at a site in North Korea's northeast that indicate preparations for a possible second nuclear test.

Rice acknowledged concerns about a second North Korean test and warned Pyongyang against that step, saying it would only deepen the country's isolation.

The U.N. resolution calls on countries to inspect cargo to or from North Korea that crosses their borders to search for major weapons and material that could be used in missile and nuclear programs.

The Bush administration has interpreted that language as a new mandate on countries to conduct aggressive screenings.

"We believe it is now a legal obligation for states to give very close scrutiny on their territories, in their ports, in their territorial waters and even in their airspace to any North Korean cargo," said the senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity under State Department ground rules.

China and South Korea have voiced concerns that Washington-led punitive action against North Korea could bring instability and possible armed confrontation.

"Things must be done in such a way that they don't bring about an escalation of the situation into something uncontrollable," Chinese President Hu Jintao told a group of Japanese lawmakers visiting Beijing, the Kyodo news service reported.

China shares an 880-mile land border with North Korea that is crossed daily by trains and hundreds of trucks.

South Korean Prime Minister Han Myung-Sook said sanctions "must not be implemented in any way that could spark an armed clash," but instead should be aimed at pushing North Korea back to long-stalled six-nation talks to dismantle its nuclear programs.

State Department officials acknowledge that the touchiest question involves intercepting North Korean vessels in international waters, where the legal authority is often less clear than it is in another country's territory.

Rice and her aides said the United States isn't advocating a blockade or quarantine, such as that imposed around Cuba during the 1962 missile crisis.

Inspections of ships won't be random but rather "information-driven," Rice said, referring to intelligence tips that a vessel is carrying banned material.

The senior State Department official said North Korea has only a few major ports and a relatively low level of shipping traffic. "The problem is quite manageable," he said.

Under an existing program known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, the United States and other countries have intercepted and seized ships with material that can be used in weapons of mass destruction research. That program, however, is voluntary. About 80 countries participate in the effort, but South Korea and China aren't among them.

The Bush administration also hopes to expand the use of radiation detectors in a defensive ring around North Korea, the senior official said.

DOJ_NMG_0082740

Such detectors are in use at some U.S. border crossings and in a program at U.S. ports called the Container Security Initiative, but they work only at close range.

Rice said that at her first two stops, she will strongly reaffirm the United States' commitment to the defense of Japan and South Korea.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the senior envoy on the nuclear crisis, said in Seoul that Washington was unhappy with Seoul's decision not to suspend one of its major projects with North Korea under its "sunshine policy" of long-term economic engagement. Hill said a South Korean tourism business at Mount Geumgang, a resort in the North visited mainly by South Koreans, "seems to be designed to give money to the North Korean authorities."

Strobel reported from Alaska, Johnson from Seoul, South Korea.

Rice Tries To Head Off Nuclear Arms Race (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 17, 2006

North Korea's nuclear test could set off an atomic arms race in Asia, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday as she sought to reaffirm U.S. obligations to defend two nations most at risk.

In addition to settling nerves among allies, Rice's Asia trip is meant to reinforce pressure on South Korea and especially China to enforce sanctions. Those include what the United States describes as an aggressive inspection and interdiction program that stops short of a full blockade of North Korean trade.

The United States is concerned that Japan and South Korea may want to develop their own nuclear weapons programs to counter the threat from North Korea, and part of Rice's assignment on this week's hastily arranged trip is to lessen that temptation.

"Obviously an event of this kind does carry with it the potential for instability in the relationships that now exist in the region," Rice said en route to Japan, her first stop on a tour devoted almost entirely to answering North Korea's nuclear threat.

"That's why it's extremely important to go out and to affirm, and affirm strongly, U.S. defense commitments to Japan and to South Korea," Rice said.

Her diplomatic language refers to the calculus of nuclear deterrents and to the long-standing U.S. pledge to use its own nuclear arsenal to defend its friends.

On her trip, Rice plans to ask South Korea to expand its role in a U.S.-led international program to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction, Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said in Seoul.

Rice would not comment in detail about worries by the U.S. and other governments that the North may be preparing for a second test explosion.

"We're concerned about further action by the North Koreans," Rice said, "but further action by the North Koreans will only deepen its isolation, which is pretty deep right now."

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior defense official said Tuesday.

The activity, started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering. He said that although the purpose of the structures is unclear, officials are concerned because North Korea has left open the possibility of another test.

The White House said Tuesday that it wouldn't be surprising if North Korea were to try another nuclear test "to be provocative."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that while it was unclear what role the U.S. military might take in enforcing new U.N. sanctions, he did not expect the United States or any other nation to do so unilaterally.

"It takes cooperation among a great many countries to participate, and things move by land, sea and air, and it's complicated, and only time will tell," he told reporters.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has ruled out developing nuclear weapons, but a ruling party policy director raised that possibility soon after the North's Oct. 9 test.

DOJ_NMG_0082741

The measures passed by the U.N. Security Council over the weekend were watered down to suit China and Russia, but still impose harsh penalties. The measures ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used in its ballistic missile and weapons of mass destruction programs. They call for all countries to inspect cargo to and from North Korea to enforce the prohibition, although it is not clear how that will work in practice.

The U.S. does not think of that as an embargo, said a senior official traveling with Rice, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice had not yet met with her Asian counterparts.

Earlier Tuesday, the communist North said U.N. sanctions aimed at punishing the country for its nuclear test amount to a declaration of war. The government said it would not cave under such pressure now that it is a nuclear power.

Japan and the United States have gone beyond the U.N. measures to impose or propose separate financial, trade and other restrictions on North Korea over what the U.S. claims is a pattern of lawbreaking by a rogue nation.

China has long been one of North Korea's few friends, but relations frayed in recent months when the North ignored China's warnings not to conduct missile tests or last week's nuclear test.

Although China's cooperation is key to making sanctions effective, Beijing fears that coming down too hard could topple the fragile government of Kim Jong Il or send hundreds of thousands of hungry refugees flooding across the border.

Even with full Chinese compliance, it isn't clear the sanctions can pressure North Korea to resume multi-country negotiations on dismantling its nuclear programs. The country has lived on the edge of famine for a decade and its trade with the West is severely limited by the bans the U.S. has already imposed.

South Korea has said it would fully comply with the sanctions but has also indicated it does not plan to halt key economic projects with the North, despite concerns they may help fund the North's nuclear and missile programs.

Kerry Blasts Bush Policy On North Korea (DMR)

Des Moines Register, October 18, 2006

Iowa City, Ia. — Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry said on another trip to Iowa today that the North Korean nuclear crisis is of the Bush administration's own making.

"The Bush policy is a disgrace," Kerry said in an interview before attending a campaign event for Democrat candidate for governor Chet Culver.

"If Ronald Reagan could talk to the evil empire and negotiate with the Soviets, surely George Bush could do the same with North Korea," he said. "But he's a prisoner of rigid ideology."

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, has said the United States should negotiate directly with North Korea, the communist dictatorship that tested a nuclear weapon last week and appeared to be preparing another test today.

By asking North Korea's neighbors such as China and South Korea to participate in talks, U.S. clout is weakened, Kerry said.

"The Chinese can't do it," he said. "North Korea fears the potential of U.S. military action for regime change."

Iowa Republicans countered that Bush was engaged in diplomacy in the region by sending Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to northeast Asia today.

"Senator Kerry's irresponsible comments do nothing more than undermine President Bush's efforts to achieve peace and security in northeast Asia through diplomacy," Republican Party of Iowa spokeswoman Sarah Sauber said.

Kerry headlined a rally for Culver at a downtown Iowa City restaurant, where about 100 party activists turned out around midday.

Kerry, who later was headed to Cedar Rapids to campaign for legislative candidates, was not alone with plans to visit Iowa this week as a prospective presidential candidate. Fellow Senate Democrat Christopher Dodd of Connecticut was also planning to be in Iowa City and Cedar Rapids today.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona was scheduled to make appearances in central Iowa on Wednesday, including an appearance on MSNBC's "Hardball" from Ames.

Kerry, who won the 2004 Iowa caucuses en route to the presidential nomination, has said he is very serious about exploring a second White House bid.

DOJ_NMG_0082742

He has maintained in the two years since losing to Bush that his criticisms of the Republican president are even more valid than they were during his campaign.

He has kept in close touch with Iowans and was making his fourth visit to the lead-off caucus state in the past month and planned a fifth in the three weeks remaining before Nov. 7.

Defector: Kim's Ouster Would Stop Nukes (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, October 17, 2006

The man once considered the mentor of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il said Tuesday that the reclusive country's nuclear weapons program cannot be stopped unless the strongman is ousted.

But Kim's total grip on the communist society makes that only a remote possibility, Hwang Jang Yop, the highest-ranking North Korean government official ever to defect to South Korea, told The Associated Press.

The 83-year-old Hwang, wearing a lapel badge in the shape of the South Korean national flag, is also skeptical that United Nations sanctions imposed on the North for a nuclear test explosion will hurt Kim's rule.

"I don't think his grip on power will be significantly weakened," Hwang said, adding that South Korea continues to give aid to North Korea, while other countries, most notably China and Russia, are opposed to the idea of pressuring the North.

Hwang, who seldom gives interviews, made his surprising defection in 1997 when he and an aide took refuge in the South Korean embassy in Beijing while on a visit to the Chinese capital. At the time, he was a longtime member of the North's elite, serving as secretary of the ruling Workers' Party.

He had been close to the country's founder, Kim Il Sung, the father of Kim Jong Il, and is often described as the younger Kim's former mentor. Hwang is also widely seen as the intellectual architect of the North's "juche" philosophy of self sufficiency.

After intense negotiations between China and South Korea, Hwang eventually left Beijing for the Philippines, where he stayed briefly before making his way to Seoul.

Now under police protection 24 hours a day to prevent any North Korean attempt on his life, Hwang said the six-nation talks aimed at ending the North's nuclear weapons program will not resolve the crisis.

He said South Korea, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan should not bargain with the North. They should instead isolate the regime, he said, calling it an "international criminal organization and the enemy of democracy."

The North's nuclear test last week was not Kim's last card and the North Korean leader could still test fire more missiles like he did in July and even mount nuclear warheads on them, Hwang said.

"It is nonsense to urge the North to abandon its nuclear weapons with Kim in place," he said.

Hwang said China is key to bringing an end to Kim's regime.

China is the last remaining ally and main aid donor to its impoverished neighbor, but their relations have been strained by Beijing's support of the U.N. resolution. Still, Beijing succeeded in blocking an even tougher one pushed by the U.S. and Japan.

"No Chinese officials like the North Korean leader, but they keep him in power," Hwang said, adding that Kim's regime serves Beijing's interests by helping keep U.S. influence in the region at bay.

Hwang said the best-case scenario would be if the North pursued economic openness and reform in trying to rebuild its dismal economy, which he said would likely lead eventually to Kim's overthrow and naturally resolve the nuclear dispute.

But Hwang doubts that will happen. "Kim Jong Il actually fears Chinese-style economic reform and openness coming to North Korea," he said.

U.S. Defector Ends Silence About Life In N. Korea (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

PUSAN, South Korea -- Unrepentant and professing support for communism, the last living American defector in North Korea has spoken out publicly for the first time about his life in the nation and his motivations for defecting -- on celluloid.

DOJ_NMG_0082743

"I'm telling you a story I never told anyone," James "Comrade Joe" Dresnok says in the film "Crossing the Line," which had its world premiere Monday at South Korea's Pusan International Film Festival. "I have never regretted coming to [North Korea]. I feel at home."

Made by British filmmakers in North Korea, the documentary sheds light on a unique Cold War story: that of an underprivileged, despairing and desperate American who finds contentment in North Korea.

Mr. Dresnok, an Army private from Norfolk, also acknowledges difficulties he faced, and the film contrasts his testimony with that of U.S. veterans and of fellow defector Charles Jenkins, who declined to criticize the regime until he had escaped it.

Mr. Dresnok, born in 1941, was the product of a broken home. After his parents' divorce, he was sent to an orphanage that he describes as "a living hell." Enlisting at 17, he suffered a failed marriage before being posted to the tense inter-Korean border.

There, between dangerous patrols, he spent his pay on prostitutes. Facing disciplinary action after visiting a girlfriend against orders, he defected to the North through perilous minefields in 1962.

"I didn't care if I lived or died," he says.

Captured, he and three fellow U.S. defectors were feted as propaganda trophies and put to work creating propaganda material.

"We took great pride in it," Mr. Dresnok said. "He'd found la-la land," counters a former U.S. officer.

Life under Asian communism initially was hard for the uneducated Southerner. "I didn't want to stay," he said, citing racism. "I didn't think I could adapt."

In 1966, he and his fellow defectors sought asylum at Pyongyang's Soviet Embassy. Rejected, they underwent intense re-education.

"I got to think like this, act like this," he said, adding that he learned North Korea's official Juche ideology and its "lofty virtues."

In 1972, the four received citizenship. In 1978, they achieved local fame acting out the parts of evil capitalists in a spy-film series, "Nameless Heroes." They also taught English.

The film contrasts the watery grays of Pyongyang with the rustic hues of Mr. Dresnok's native Virginia. He is seen fishing and drinking, visiting his tailor and celebrating his youngest son's birthday in his small apartment. He has married twice in the North, to a Romanian and to a Togolese.

"I take pride in having a son at college," he says. His blond son, James, who speaks English with a Russian accent, is at a foreign-language school. "In America, I don't believe I could afford it."

The most emotional moment is when he sobs, saying, "I swore that in my life I would never abandon my children."

His comment reflects one by Mr. Jenkins, a former Army sergeant who left the North with his Japanese wife and two children with the assistance of the Japanese government in 2004. Mr. Jenkins worried that the foreign-language schools his daughters attended were recruiting grounds for spies, and said that was his motivation for escaping.

Mr. Dresnok takes the opposite view. He angrily disputes the assertions of the former sergeant, and hints at an affair with Mr. Jenkins' Japanese wife. "I'd like to kill [him]," he snarls.

Today, Mr. Dresnok's life is, by North Korean standards, privileged.

During the deadly famines of the late 1990s, "Korean people starved to death, but I got rice rations," he says. "The government is going to take care of me until my dying day."

He appears cheerful, though he is missing his front teeth. It is not clear whether this is related to beatings Mr. Jenkins claimed U.S. defectors suffered. What is clear is Mr. Dresnok is seriously ill from heavy drinking and smoking. The two other U.S. defectors -- Pvt. Larry Allen Abshier and Cpl. Jerry Wayne Parish -- both died from natural causes, he says.

Mr. Dresnok received no financial benefit from being filmed, "apart from the odd bottle of hooch," said the film's co-producer, Nick Bonner, who runs Beijing-based Koryo Tours, which takes tourists to North Korea.

Mr. Bonner said the filmmakers interviewed Mr. Dresnok without government minders being present, and were not censored. At only one point in the film, in front of the American spy ship USS Pueblo, captured in 1968, does Mr. Dresnok refuse to be filmed.

DOJ_NMG_0082744

Mr. Bonner also co-produced 2002's "The Game of Their Lives" about the North's 1966 World Cup soccer team, and 2004's "A State of Mind" about two gymnasts preparing for Pyongyang's mass games, a nationalistic spectacle of gymnastics.

The film's rights have been sold to Korea and Japan, said co-producer Paul Yi, who added that he hoped the film would play at the Sundance Film Festival in the United States.

A spokesman for U.S. Forces Korea said by telephone that he was unfamiliar with Mr. Dresnok's case, but expected that if he ever left the North, he would be treated like Mr. Jenkins was.

In 2004, Mr. Jenkins was court-martialed but set free after 30 days of confinement, on the basis that he had suffered enough.

Letters To The Editor (WT)

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

'Nuclear disarmament must be an urgent priority'

The government of the Islamic Republic of Iran strongly rejects any comparison of Iran's nuclear program with other countries'.Iran's nuclear program is legal, fully within the framework of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, peaceful and transparent ("North Korea and Iran," Editorial, Oct. 11).

After more than 2200 days of inspection of Iran's nuclear facilities, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) has concluded that there is no evidence of diversion of nuclear material to military objectives. The latest report by the IAEA's Director-General, Dr. Mohammad El Baradei, dated August 31, states: "Iran has been providing the Agency with access to nuclear material and facilities, and has provided the required reports."

Iran's leadership has repeatedly denounced the manufacturing, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons on moral, religious and political grounds. Iran is convinced that the proliferation of nuclear weapons is harmful to the cause of world peace and stability.

Iran has called for a nuclear-weapons free zone in the Middle East and has also expressed concerns about the lack of commitment of certain state parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty regarding their obligations to disarm.

Iran believe that the absence of meaningful and global nuclear disarmament must be an urgent priority of the international community.

Unfortunately, these important facts about Iran are often ignored in the U.S. media and, instead, Iran has been subjected to a massive campaign of deliberate disinformation. We urge the respected members of the media to refrain from drawing unfounded comparisons between Iran and other countries and to keep the above-stated facts about Iran in consideration when reporting on Iran.

M.A. MOHAMMADI
Press secretary
Mission of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the United Nations
NewYork City

Bush Supports Croatia Membership In NATO (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

President Bush gave a boost Tuesday to Croatia's aspirations to join NATO, saying it should be admitted to the Western alliance within two years.

Bush said he would recommend the 2008 timetable when he attends a NATO summit next month in Riga, Latvia. He also said he supports Croatia's membership in the European Union.

The president expressed his views during an Oval Office meeting with Croatian Prime Minister Ivo Sanader. "I consider the prime minister a friend; I consider Croatia a friend, as well," Bush said.

The president said he has heard Croatia is one of the most beautiful places on Earth and that he would like to visit sometime. "About the only question we disagreed was whether Croatia or the United States had the most beautiful coastline," Sanader said.

DOJ_NMG_0082745

One problem facing Sanader is opposition at home to NATO membership, with opinion polls showing 30 percent of the population against it. Some Croatians claim being a part of NATO would make it a terror target.

While prospects that Croatia eventually will join NATO look good, its hopes of admission to the European Union are less promising.

Sanader said this month he wants EU membership to be fast-tracked and feels his country will be ready for membership by 2008.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said there could be no more EU enlargements after Romania and Bulgaria join Jan. 1 until the union has resolved the future of its stalled constitution.

Abbas Threatens To Dismiss Hamas Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 17 — The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, warned Tuesday that the current Palestinian political crisis was intolerable, and suggested he would dismiss the Hamas-led government if the rival factions could not agree soon on a national unity government.

"To maintain the status quo is impossible," Mr. Abbas said in remarks broadcast on Palestinian television. "As the person in charge, I am obligated to consider all options that could get us out of this crisis."

Mr. Abbas's speech, delivered from the West Bank city of Ramallah, was the clearest signal yet that he was prepared to act against the Hamas government. With Israel and Western governments cutting off the flow of money to the Palestinian Authority, the Hamas government has barely functioned since coming to power more than six months ago.

Mr. Abbas said he still sought a national unity government that would include his secular Fatah movement and Hamas, the Islamic radical group. The two parties agreed on such an arrangement more than a month ago, but the talks broke down over issues that include the recognition of Israel, which Hamas rejects.

Mr. Abbas said that if no agreement was reached soon he might dismiss the government and replace it, at least temporarily, with technocrats.

"I have the right to dismiss the government," he declared. He then went on to say that a "government of technocrats would be the simplest and most practical solution."

But Hamas could resist such a move, and the Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, is somewhat vague on how to resolve political disputes.

There is also the fear that a political showdown between Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement and Hamas would add to tensions among the heavily armed supporters of both groups, who have fought street battles in the Gaza Strip in recent weeks.

"Civil war is the only taboo," Mr. Abbas said. "But we have other options, and I am studying them."

He set no deadlines for a decision. But there has been speculation that he may be prepared to act soon after the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which concludes next week.

Meanwhile, in violence on Tuesday, Israeli troops shot dead five Palestinians in three separate confrontations in the West Bank, according to the Palestinian security officials and the Israeli military.

Soldiers killed an Islamic Jihad militant, Muhammad Zakarneh, in the town of Qabatiya, according to the Israeli military and the Palestinians. Also in Qabatiya, two Palestinians throwing stones at army vehicles were shot dead, according to the Palestinians. The military said it was aware of only one Palestinian death, and the man was believed to be a militant.

In the nearby town of Nablus, soldiers fired on a wanted militant in a car, killing him and another person in the vehicle, according to the military and Palestinians.

Israeli Forces Conducting Raids Kill Four Palestinians In West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 17 -- Israeli military forces operating in the West Bank killed four Palestinians on Tuesday during arrest operations that turned violent in two volatile cities.

DOJ_NMG_0082746

Among the dead were at least two Palestinian gunmen affiliated with the armed wing of Fatah, the secular nationalist movement, and the radical group Islamic Jihad. Palestinian security officials said the dead also included at least one civilian.

The northern West Bank has become a focal point of Israeli security concerns in recent months, emerging as a stronghold of Islamic Jihad, the most radical militia at war with the Jewish state. The operations marked a shift by the military, which has concentrated most offensive operations in the Gaza Strip since the June 25 capture of an Israeli army corporal by several armed groups including the military wing of the governing Hamas movement.

The operations came as Ghazi Hamad, a senior Hamas official, published his second critique of Palestinian society in two months. In a column for the daily newspaper al-Ayyam, Hamad, a senior adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, asked if violence had become "a Palestinian disease."

Hamad raised the question after sectarian clashes in Gaza and the West Bank that in recent weeks have killed more than 12 Palestinians and wounded scores. He asked whether violence had become "a culture implanted in our bodies and our flesh," adding that it "has taken away the language of brotherhood and replaced it with arms."

"Shouldn't we be ashamed of this ugly behavior, which scandalizes us before our people and before the world?" he wrote from Gaza.

The Israeli military reported Tuesday the discovery of a tunnel near Gaza's border with Egypt, through which Palestinian militias apparently smuggled guns into the strip. The military said it was the 13th tunnel uncovered in the past three months as armed groups attempt to build their arsenals during the Israeli offensive.

At 7 a.m., an Israeli military unit entered the West Bank town of Qabatiya on an arrest operation. Israeli military officials said soldiers fired on a group of Palestinian gunmen, killing one. The man was identified as Mohammed Zakarneh, 18, of Islamic Jihad.

A few hours later, military officials said, a riot broke out as Israeli soldiers attempted a second arrest in the town. The soldiers were pelted with stones and cinder blocks, military officials said, and responded by firing rubber bullets toward the crowd.

Palestinian officials said Hani Khalil Kmeil, 20, was killed. Israeli military officials said they were investigating the report.

The final incident occurred in Nablus when Israeli soldiers fired on a car carrying a member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's military wing. Israeli military officials said the man, wanted for arrest, was killed, along with the driver, whose connection to the militia was unclear.

Blair Criticizes Veils As 'Mark Of Separation' (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 17 — Prime Minister Tony Blair joined a passionate and increasingly contentious debate on Tuesday over the full-face veils worn by some British Muslim women, calling it a "mark of separation."

It was the first time Mr. Blair had so explicitly backed Jack Straw, the leader of the House of Commons, who raised Muslim ire this month by saying he did not believe that women should wear the full-face veil, a headdress with only a narrow slit for the eyes. Mr. Straw had asked Muslim women meeting with him to remove their veils, arguing that it prevented communication and set the wearer apart.

"It is a mark of separation, and that is why it makes other people from outside the community feel uncomfortable," Mr. Blair said at a regular news conference, echoing some of Mr. Straw's sentiments.

His remarks reflected a sense that British society is heading toward ever deeper fissures between Muslims and non-Muslims, evoking questions about the nation's readiness to embrace Muslims, and Muslims' willingness to adapt.

The discussion mirrors earlier public disputes in France, Turkey and elsewhere about head scarves, though in Britain it is largely limited to the use of the full-face veil, the niqab.

"No one wants to say that people don't have the right to do it," Mr. Blair said. "That is to take it too far. But I think we need to confront this issue about how we integrate people properly into our society."

DOJ_NMG_0082747

There were signs that the dispute had spread farther across Europe. In an interview in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi was quoted Tuesday as saying that women should not be hidden behind veils.

In Muslim societies, the full veil is sometimes worn to shield a woman from the view of men outside her immediate family. The debate about its use among a small number of British Muslims has crystallized around Aishah Azmi, a teaching assistant suspended by a local council for refusing to remove her full-face veil during class in the presence of male teachers.

Mr. Blair said he could "see the reason" for Mrs. Azmi to be suspended from her job at a Church of England school in Dewsbury, Yorkshire, where there is a substantial Muslim minority. Within hours, her lawyers issued a statement accusing Mr. Blair of interfering in a labor tribunal case and demanding a retraction.

"We have to deal with the debate," Mr. Blair said. "People want to know that the Muslim community in particular, but actually all minority communities, have got the balance right between integration and multi-culturalism."

The debate is characterized by Muslims as a symbol of the stigma they face among the non-Muslim majority.

Muhammad Abdul Bari, the secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said in an open letter that some Muslims had been considering changing their names "to avoid anti-Muslim remarks."

"This is what happens when a community is singled out by those at the helm of affairs," he said.

Non-Muslims say the veil-wearing shows a reluctance among the estimated 1.6 million Muslims — 3 percent of the population — to compromise for the sake of social harmony. David Davis, the Conservative opposition spokesman on home affairs, said last weekend that British Muslims risked "voluntary apartheid" by displays of separateness like the full veil.

The gulf has been widening since the London bombings by four British Muslims on July 7, 2005, but the argument has sharpened in recent weeks. After Mr. Straw questioned the wearing of the niqab in early October, a government education minister, Phil Woolas, went further last weekend, calling for Mrs. Azmi, the teaching assistant, to be dismissed. Other government ministers, now including Mr. Blair, have joined the debate.

The discussion spills over into Britain's broader embroilment in the campaign against terrorism and the war in Iraq. Mr. Blair and others say Muslims must do more to police their own ranks, while some Muslims say Britain's deployment in Iraq and Afghanistan accelerates the radicalization of young Muslims like the London bombers.

Last week Britain's new army commander, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, said British troops should be pulled out from Iraq "some time soon."

But Mr. Blair said Tuesday: "If we walk away before the job is done from either of those two countries, we will leave a situation in which the very people we are fighting everywhere, including the extremism in our own country, are heartened and emboldened, and we can't afford that to happen. So we have got to see that job through."

Council Seat Still Undecided After 22 Ballots (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 17 — Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year lagged Tuesday for a second straight day, but Guatemala, the persistent leader after 22 ballots, was unable to win enough votes to secure the position.

The General Assembly recessed Tuesday night for 24 hours to ponder a way out of the deadlock, with diplomats suggesting that it might be time for the Latin American group to switch to a compromise candidate.

But neither country was prepared to step aside.

"We still have a considerable lead over our competitor, and under normal circumstances our competitor would stand down graciously," said Gert Rosenthal, the foreign minister of Guatemala, "but for reasons well known, he's not willing to do that."

Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said, "We have had to fight a very uneven battle, with constant false accusations made against us, and we have kept up the fight until now and we will continue the fight."

The setback was particularly stinging for Venezuela, whose president, Hugo Chávez, has made the contest a centerpiece of his continuing campaign against Washington, financing it liberally with oil proceeds, promoting it with personal appearances around the world and frequently predicting that Venezuela would prevail.

DOJ_NMG_0082748

In keeping with that, Mr. Arias Cárdenas has repeatedly said that this was not an argument between "brother" Latin nations, but an effort to liberate the United Nations from United States' "imposition."

Mr. Rosenthal complained: "Venezuela clearly is not doing well, but they want to bring us down with them as the proxy for the United States. It is very unfair to us. Washington did not run our campaign. We did all the work, and we have a majority of the votes."

Mr. Arias Cárdenas said his country was not being "stubborn" but was sacrificing itself to represent poor and weak countries against the "blackmail" of the United States.

He held up the front page of El País, the Spanish daily, which showed a picture of John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, leaning over and consulting with Mr. Rosenthal.

"This is the pressure we are fighting," he said. "Why doesn't Bolton come to this microphone and declare that the United States will remove the pressure, will withdraw the money, and then countries will have the liberty to vote their conscience."

In response, Mr. Bolton said: "Look, we have made our position clear in a very low key way. It is motivated by our concern for Venezuela's behavior, and that's another example of it."

Asked about the photo with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Rosenthal said: "I don't think there is anything conspiratorial about it. Yesterday, I must have been faced with 100 ambassadors, and he was one of them."

The two countries are competing for a two-year term in the seat being vacated by Argentina, and to win it, one of them must reach 125 votes, which is two-thirds of those voting. Guatemala had held to an average of 104 and Venezuela 77.

"It's true that the positions right now seem to be stuck in the same place," Mr. Rosenthal said. "The bottom line is that we still are not prepared to step down, given the lead we have, and Thursday we can have another go at it."

Mr. Bolton said the United States normally steered clear of contests at the United Nations involving regional groups but had become involved in this one out of concern that Venezuela might become a disruptive presence on the Security Council.

"You can draw one conclusion from the results," Mr. Bolton said with evident satisfaction, "that is, that Venezuela is not going to win."

Venezuela Stymied Again In U.N. Vote (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Juan Forero And Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 17 -- Venezuela was stymied for a second straight day in its bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council, a result that has shocked diplomats who expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage.

Guatemala led Venezuela in each of the 12 rounds of secret voting held by the General Assembly on Tuesday. On Monday, Guatemala won nine of the first 10 rounds. But neither country has secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina on Jan. 1 in the open Latin American seat on the 15-nation council.

The voting is scheduled to continue Thursday morning.

Delegates at the United Nations once predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat. But the opening ballot Monday showed Guatemala ahead 114 to 74 . Venezuela gained votes through the day but never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly.

On Tuesday, Venezuela could muster no more than 85 votes in any single round. Guatemala attracted as many as 112 votes but consistently fell a dozen or more votes short of the required total in each round.

Venezuela's showing has come as a relief to the United States, which has lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala. Chavez's government, U.S. officials warned, would play a destructive role on the council, lending its support to those countries, including Iran, Sudan and North Korea, that have defied the United Nations.

It also represented a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East.

Chavez may have undercut his country's chances with a provocative speech last month before the General Assembly, in which he described President Bush as "the devil." And once-solid support for Venezuela in South America, from countries including Chile and Paraguay, wavered after Chavez's government entered into a military pact with Bolivia, which has lost territory to both those countries.

DOJ_NMG_0082749

The United States, Britain, China, Russia and France enjoy permanent membership on the 15-member Security Council. The other 10 seats are distributed regionally for two-year terms; a vote by the General Assembly fills five seats each year. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions.

But the deadlock over the Latin American seat raised the prospect of a long election and that a compromise candidate--possibly Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay or Chile--might enter the race. Mexico and Cuba received single votes on some ballots Monday.

Chavez has been hostile to Washington for years, but he has been particularly antagonistic since the White House offered tacit support for a 2002 coup that briefly removed him from power. Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cardenas, characterized the race as a challenge between a fearless champion of the developing world and the world's lone superpower.

"We are not competing with a brother country. We are competing with the biggest power on the planet," he said.

Some delegates said Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol.

For those who view the General Assembly chamber as "a very sacrosanct place," Chavez's performance exhibited "bad taste," said Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga. "It can be a platform for the battle of ideas but not for the vilification of one country."

Mahiga said, however, that Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and "swayed" others to vote against it.

"It's a double-edged sword," he said. The race was "perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela."

Alberto Garrido, an author and analyst in Caracas who has written several books on Chavez, said the vote is a serious setback for Chavez's campaign to project Venezuelan influence beyond Latin America.

Venezuela has bought foreign debt from Argentina, sold crude oil at cut-rate prices to smaller Caribbean islands and provided aid to Africa--all efforts designed, in part, to counter U.S. influence.

"This is a big setback in Chavez's strategy," said Garrido, whose latest book, "Chavez's Wars," deals with the president's conflicts with the Bush administration and other foes. "He had a plan to become the institutionalized voice of the south, if he had gotten that seat. This is a blow, perhaps the biggest blow in his geopolitical strategy."

In Venezuela, the government's failure to secure a seat was called "an embarrassing defeat" by Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election. The president retains the support of a majority of Venezuelans, recent polls have shown, but opponents accuse him of ignoring spiraling crime, chronic unemployment and poverty while he focuses on making a name for himself abroad.

Chavez has spent much of his presidency outside Venezuela. But since July, as the Security Council campaign has built, his travel schedule has become feverish, with trips to Russia, China, Vietnam, Iran and Belarus.

The Venezuelan government's argument that it would be a voice for those countries suffering at the hands of U.S. imperialism did not strike a chord with enough nations, said Milos Alcalay, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations.

"To argue that Venezuela would go to the Security Council to be the counterweight against imperialism didn't mesh with the philosophy that this is a body that aims to find things in common," said Alcalay, who resigned his post because of opposition to Chavez's policies.

"This was firstly a rejection of combative language, but it was also a rejection of Venezuela's claim to be the voice of those who do not have a voice, of Africa, the nonaligned," he said. "And really, they do have a voice. Africa elected South Africa as its spokesman."

Forero reported from Quito, Ecuador. Brubaker reported from Washington.

Un Seats Continues To Elude Chávez (FT)

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082750

A second full day of voting at the United Nations General Assembly on Tuesday failed to decide whether anti-US Venezuela or pro-US Guatemala would win a seat on the Security Council.

Neither managed to get the two-thirds majority needed for victory, although Guatemala won the majority of votes by a significant margin. In a day that saw both sides' fortunes rise and fall, Guatemala won 102 votes against Venezuela's 77 in the 12th round. Diplomats said the situation was deadlocked.

The voting is a setback for Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, who in recent months has travelled extensively and invested heavily in an attempt to win support for his country's bid.

"It is a tremendous blow to Venezuela," said Juan Tokatlian, a Buenos Aires-based international relations specialist. "Their votes have fallen well short of what they expected."

The stalemate could continue for the next few days. Ecuador convened an informal discussion between Latin American countries for today but no formal meeting was scheduled. Voting resumes on Thursday. Guatemala said its bottom line was that it was still not prepared to step down.

On Monday, Guatemala started with a clear lead, then fell level with Venezuela, before recovering its majority. On Tuesday, it swung between 100 and 112 votes, against between 75 and 85 for Venezuela. Guatemala needed between 120 to 125 votes to win, depending on abstentions.

Venezuela indicated it could withdraw its candidacy if Guatemala also withdrew, and the US publicly advocated a fair vote without exerting pressure.

The impasse has prompted other Latin American countries to suggest regional talks on a way to avoid a recurrence of divisions that afflicted the region at the height of the cold war.

In 1979 it took four months and 155 rounds of votes to resolve protracted deadlock between Cuba and Colombia. That contest was eventually resolved only after the intervention of Kurt Waldheim, then secretary-general of the United Nations, and the nomination of Mexico as a compromise candidate.

Mr Tokatlian said he expected Brazil, Argentina and Chile to begin efforts to broker a solution.

In UN Political Drama, It's All About The US (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

In the war of Hugo Chávez versus George W. Bush, Venezuela versus the United States, and anti- Americanism versus American leadership, the latest battle is ... a draw.

In marathon voting at the 192-country United Nations General Assembly that continued midday Tuesday, Venezuela had not won a coveted seat on the 15-member Security Council. Mr. Chávez's trash talk about Mr. Bush from the same General Assembly hall a month ago has not won him the support he needs to claim one of the Council's 10 rotating seats -a post from which he had hoped to goad "the imperial power," or "the master of the house," as he is wont to say.

But neither has the US been able to definitively squash Venezuela by assuring the election of Guatemala, its favored candidate, to the open two-year position. The writing on the wall was getting clearer: Neither country seems likely to win the rotating seat reserved for Latin America. Speculation intensified over possible replacement "consensus" candidates.

Yet the stalemate also has deeper roots and explanations, to listen to delegates as they filed out of the hall after each ballot, or to UN officials milling around to see how the vote was going.

For some, it is a result of the fault lines that still divide the world more than three years after debate about invading Iraq. Surveys show the US remains deeply unpopular in much of the world, and the General Assembly voting reflects that.

But for others, it is more a reflection of widespread ambivalence - and perhaps fatigue - toward both the camp that wants to make a point of standing up to the US, and the one that is seen to be too closely aligned with it.

"There is a whiff of the cold war to this, and people don't want to see the UN go back to that paralysis," said one UN official observing the vote, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "My guess is that a fair number of countries don't want either side to get the upper hand."

DOJ_NMG_0082751

Many delegates expressed surprise that Venezuela, a major oil producer that worked hard for months to win votes, never overtook Guatemala in the first day of balloting. The common explanation offered was that Chávez's depiction of Bush as "the devil" in his speech to the General Assembly in September had cost him support - despite applause and titters at the time - because it raised concerns of a Security Council bogged down in polemics.

"When it comes down to it, a polarizer is not a vote-getter," said another UN official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity.

After 14 secret ballots by midday Tuesday, Guatemala stood at 108 votes - well short of the two-thirds majority (128 votes) needed. Venezuela had 76. Those numbers had fluctuated over the course of ballots, but they were basically the same as the original vote Monday.

In all, the General Assembly actually had to fill five rotating Security Council seats, although the other four slots were decided without controversy on the first ballot. South Africa, Indonesia, Belgium, and Italy are to fill the seats of their respective regions in January.

But the Latin American seat was a different story, with stakeholders from both sides indicating early on they were ready for a long fight.

"All I can say is that back in 2000, I spent 31 days in Florida," said John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, at one point on Monday, referring to his role in the legal wrangling that ultimately won the presidency for Bush. "This has just begun."

Mr. Bolton's words suggest the importance the US is putting in the outcome.

By the seventh vote on Monday, talk had shifted to the goodies the candidates were passing out to secure any wavering votes: chocolates with "Venezuela" wrappers from one side, woven friendship bracelets from the other.

But others alluded to much more heavy-handed tactics than those quaint campaign tools. Venezuela's ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cárdenas, said the people of the world were "resisting with dignity the pressures of the imperial power." He claimed the US was seeking to sway the vote by issuing both promises of aid for supporting Guatemala and threats of financial retaliation against any developing country siding with Venezuela.

Yet other diplomats referred to Chávez's nearly two-year-long campaign to win a Council seat and noted that Chávez, as leader of a major oil- producing nation, had signed numerous bilateral trade pacts while pursuing his campaign. As one diplomat noted in a tongue-in-cheek explanation for the sudden spurt in support for Venezuela in one ballot: "They upped the ante - now it's a full tanker in every port!"

Yet kidding aside, some diplomats noted there is precedent to suggest that the balloting might not be nearing a quick denouement. UN officials did some digging and found that in 1979, another vote on a Security Council seat - again involving Latin America's slot - had taken 155 ballots stretching from October to January.

In that case, a battle pitting Cuba against Colombia was resolved when Mexico finally emerged as a compromise candidate.

While Venezuela's ambassador didn't want to hear any talk of a consensus candidate to break a deadlock, the names of nations like Uruguay, Costa Rica, and the Dominican Republic floated around the hall.

And Mexico's ambassador, Enrique Berruga, said that Mexico was pressing for a meeting of Latin American countries Tuesday, to find a solution to the deadlock.

At the same time, Guatemalan officials insisted they were in the fight to stay. But their delegation's leader suggested Monday afternoon that he understood a continuing stalemate could not be allowed to go on forever.

"We are not obstinate," said Guatemala's foreign minister, Gert Rosenthal, at the end of voting Monday. "If after two, three, four days, neither country has arrived at the two-thirds needed, logically we have to consider a third candidate."

And then he continued with words that, either by design or not, contrasted with the politicking that has dominated the voting. "This has never been a national crusade [for us] to be on the Security Council." Noting that the UN spearheaded the peace process that ended Guatemala's civil war in 1996, he added, "We are giving back to the UN what the UN gave to Guatemala."

Guatemala Leads But Can't Land U.N. Seat (AP-Y)

By Nick Wadhams

DOJ_NMG_0082752

AP, October 18, 2006

Guatemala failed repeatedly to muster the necessary votes to beat out Venezuela for a Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council, prompting diplomats on Tuesday to demand a compromise candidate.

Both have so far refused and the U.N. General Assembly scheduled yet more rounds of voting on Thursday by its 192 member nations. That left a day off for Latin American nations to try to find a solution.

In the 22nd round of voting, Guatemala garnered 102 votes to Venezuela's 77. That result, similar to that of many of the previous rounds during the last two days, was 23 votes short of the two-thirds needed to win, and it now appeared that neither would be able to bridge the gap.

"It's obvious that the General Assembly is sharply divided and we are facing a deadlock in this election," said the Arab League's U.N. representative Yahya Mahmassani. "We look forward to the group of Latin American and Caribbean states to find a solution to this impasse, with the acquiescence and acceptance of the two candidates."

Yet neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election.

Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas complained that the United States pressed countries worldwide to prevent Venezuela from winning a seat on the 15-nation council.

"We are fighting against the first power of the world, the owners of the universe," Arias Cardenas said. "We're happy, we're strong and we will continue."

Roy Chaderton, the Venezuelan diplomat who played a key role in his country's campaign for the seat, said the results were only a minor setback in the long struggle against U.S. efforts to dominate international affairs.

"This battle will prepare us for another battle within the international community," Chaderton told Venezuelan state television Sunday.

The results were seen as a setback for Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who had lobbied hard in capitals around the world, offering millions of petrodollars in aid.

Diplomats said his bombastic speech to the General Assembly last month, when Chavez railed against the United States and called President Bush "the devil," may have hurt Venezuela's chances.

The vote, however, also reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, Washington's preferred candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public U.S. campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala.

After Monday's balloting, Rosenthal said his nation was an "independent voice" that would vote according to its own policies.

The record number of ballots for a Security Council seat occurred in 1979, when the General Assembly held 154 unsuccessful votes to choose between Cuba and Colombia. Mexico was then put forward and won in the 155th round.

Possible other candidates include Uruguay, Costa Rica, Mexico and the Dominican Republic.

Venezuela has served four times on the Security Council. Guatemala has never had a seat but is a leading contributor of troops to U.N. peacekeeping missions.

The 10 non-permanent seats on the council are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by the veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Venezuela Trails In Early Voting For Seat On Security Council (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - U.S.-backed Guatemala got the upper hand in a seesaw tussle Monday to secure a seat on the U.N. Security Council, dealing a surprising blow to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's ambitions to lead a worldwide anti-Washington front.

But in 10 rounds of voting Guatemala fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to win the seat, reserved for a Latin American nation, raising the specter of a lengthy battle that eventually could lead to a compromise candidacy.

DOJ_NMG_0082753

Venezuelan officials blamed U.S. pressures for blocking their bid to secure a seat that brings international prestige and a voice on such key issues as the nuclear standoffs with Iran and North Korea.

Francisco Arias, Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, said Washington was exerting "grotesque, obscene" pressures on U.N. members to vote for Guatemala, and he vowed his country would fight on.

"Venezuela is staying; Venezuela is by no means pulling out," he said after the fourth round of voting, adding that Washington was campaigning against his country as if "we were inventing a nuclear bomb."

The leftist Chavez has been a steady and strident critic of the Bush administration, and a victory in the Security Council race would give him a strong voice in Latin American regional affairs.

Most analysts had expected Venezuela to outpoll Guatemala in the election, one of the most disputed in Security Council history. Chavez had traveled the globe in search of votes, touting himself as a strong voice opposed to Washington. U.S. officials have complained that Chavez has been using his oil wealth to expand his influence.

But diplomats privately said Chavez hurt Venezuela in a speech last month at the U.N. General Assembly, in which he called President Bush "a devil."

Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal, who attended the session, told reporters after the 10th ballot that his country would maintain its candidacy for now but would be willing later to consider a compromise.

"We're going to see how things evolve in the next day or two," he said. More rounds of voting are expected Tuesday.

Although the vote was secret, many South American and Caribbean nations, as well as African and Arab nations, were known to be backing Venezuela, while Washington and most European and Central America nations were supporting Guatemala. Chile, Ecuador and Peru abstained in the first round but didn't say how they voted in the later ballots.

The winner will succeed Argentina in a two-year term on the Security Council that begins in January 2007.

Guatemala won the early rounds of balloting and by the third round secured 116 votes, just eight short of the two-thirds needed to win.

Venezuelan diplomats fanned out in the cavernous hall, with Arias methodically greeting each delegation several times. Former Venezuelan Foreign Minister Roy Chaderton, designated by Chavez as a special envoy for the U.N. campaign, also worked the aisles.

On occasion, the Venezuelan and U.S. diplomats would politely ignore each other as they bumped into one another during their lobbying runs. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton and the assistant secretary of state for western hemispheric affairs, Thomas Shannon, were seen chatting up other delegates.

"In the year 2000, I spent 31 days in Florida," Bolton told reporters at one point, referring to the long U.S. presidential election recount. "This has just begun."

The delegates' tables soon became a clutter of pamphlets, with the Chavez delegation dominating the literature. One Venezuelan handout reminded diplomats that their vote was secret and that Venezuela represented "independence."

"Raise your voice against imposition," the brochure urged.

Delegates also received a small bag with sweets from Venezuela, while Guatemalan diplomats handed out an embroidered wristband.

On the sixth round, Venezuela and Guatemala tied at 93 votes, and the Venezuelan delegation erupted in a loud applause. But Guatemala reversed the tide and by the 10th round it obtained 110 votes against 77 for Venezuela.

Monday's election recalled the 154-round standoff between Cuba and Colombia in 1979, which finally ushered in Mexico as a consensus candidate.

In Caracas, Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said his country had demonstrated the firmness of its foreign policy in the face of "pressure" and "bribes" from the U.S. delegation. "We are confronting the empire," he said.

But Chavez's main opponent in the Dec. 3 presidential election, Manuel Rosales, described Venezuela's failure to win the seat as a "democratic whipping for those who do not understand that the world is advancing towards freedom and democracy."

Special correspondent Phil Gunson in Caracas contributed to this report.

A Model Of Modern Vitality, France Devises A Baby Boom (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0082754

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

JUMEAUVILLE, France -- When the municipal day-care center ran out of space because of a local baby boom, the town government gave Maylis Staub and her husband $200 a month to defray the cost of a "maternal assistant" to care for their two children.

When Staub delivered twins last December -- her third and fourth children -- the nation not only increased their tax deductions and child allowances, the government-owned French train system offered 40 percent discounts off tickets for the parents and the children until they reach their 18th birthdays.

"The government favors families a lot," said Staub, a 35-year-old project manager for a French cellphone company. "They understand that families are the future. It's great for us."

While falling birthrates threaten to undermine economies and social stability across much of an aging Europe, French fertility rates are increasing. France now has the second-highest fertility rate in Europe -- 1.94 children born per woman, exceeded slightly by Ireland's rate of 1.99. The U.S. fertility rate is 2.01 children.

In many European countries, park benches are filled with elderly residents. In France, parks overflow with boisterous children, making it an international model for countries struggling with the threat of zero population growth. In recent months, officials from Japan, Thailand and neighboring Germany have traveled to France to study its reproductive secrets.

But the propensity of women here to have more babies has little to do with notions of French romance or the population's formerly strong religious ties to the Roman Catholic Church.

France heavily subsidizes children and families from pregnancy to young adulthood with liberal maternity leaves and part-time work laws for women. The government also covers some child-care costs of toddlers up to 3 years old and offers free child-care centers from age 3 to kindergarten, in addition to tax breaks and discounts on transportation, cultural events and shopping.

This summer, the government -- concerned that French women still were not producing enough children to guarantee a full replacement generation -- very publicly urged French women to have even more babies. A new law provides more maternity leave and benefits, tax credits and other incentives for families who have a third child. During a year-long leave after the birth of the third child, mothers will receive $960 a month from the government, twice the allowance for the second child.

A century ago, France was one of the first European countries to face a declining population. Since then, almost every elected French government -- regardless of party -- has instituted laws that encourage bigger families and make it easier for women to keep their jobs while raising children.

"Politicians realized they had to encourage people to have more babies if they didn't want to live in a country of old people," said France Prioux, director of research for France's National Institute of Demographic Studies.

Most of the subsidies and allowances are income-based, giving low-income families the most help. But higher-income families also receive substantial benefits so that only a fraction of a working mother's salary goes to child-care costs.

In Jumeauville, a rural hamlet of picturesque stone houses and about 500 inhabitants a 45-minute drive west of Paris, the Staubs are part of a trend most European countries crave to emulate: expanding families fleeing the cities and suburbs in search of larger houses and gardens, helping to replenish the village's declining and aging population of farmers.

When Staub became pregnant with twins last year, the family moved out of their cramped apartment in suburban Paris and into a renovated stone farmhouse with massive plate-glass windows and exposed wood beam ceilings in Jumeauville, which translates in English as Twin City.

Staub, a slender woman with an animated face framed by honey-colored hair that brushes her shoulders, took a year off from her job at SFR, a major cellphone company, collecting monthly maternity leave benefits and a guarantee that her job would be waiting for her when she returned.

Under French law, a woman can opt not to work or to work part time until her child is 3 years old -- and her full-time job will be guaranteed when she returns. "In other countries, maternity leaves are seen as a handicap for mothers who want to have a career," Staub said. "It's different in France."

A colleague at Staub's company, 35-year-old Axelle de Barbeyrac, also has four children, including twins. She works four days a week, a part-time schedule that she can continue, with government subsidies, until the twins are 3 next year.

DOJ_NMG_0082755

She lives in the Paris suburb of Ville d'Avray, a 10-minute train ride west of the La Defense high-technology, high-rise corridor on the edge of the capital where both women work. Barbeyrac catches the 5:09 p.m. train home, walks to the government-subsidized day-care center where her 2 1/2 -year-old twins have spent the day ($670 a month for both), then picks up Ines, 8, and Feh, 6, at the after-school program that ends at 6 p.m. ($75 a month for the two).

As she arrives home to begin the four-child assembly line in the bathtub, the sidewalks around her cream-colored stucco house are crowded with schoolchildren on scooters and mothers pushing a stroller with one hand and gripping a toddler with the other.

"I don't know if the French system encourages women to have more children," said Barbeyrac, whose husband is a documentary filmmaker. "But people don't stop having children because of money concerns."

Maylis Staub agrees. Staub, who is married to a lawyer, returned to work in August. Instead of using the government-supported day-care centers, she hired a nanny -- subsidized by tax breaks on part of the nanny's salary -- to care for her 10-month-old twins, Quitterie and Hermine.

When both women's twins reach 3 years of age, they will qualify for the free government preschool programs that most French children attend until kindergarten.

"The child-care system in France is very well thought out," said Staub, sitting on a sofa on a recent Saturday afternoon with feverish 8-year-old Margaux on one side, fidgety 6-year-old Jules on the other, and one of the twins on her lap. "Everything is organized to make mothers' lives easier."

The French system also fosters different attitudes about working mothers. French working moms say they feel far less guilt than friends in the United States or Europe because French society recognizes children are well cared-for while mothers are at work.

As a result, French women are not only having more children than their European counterparts, but far more of them work outside the home than in most European countries. Three-fourths of all French mothers with at least two children are employed.

"In Mediterranean countries and Germany, it's work or children," said Marie-Therese Letablier, research director of the Center for Employment Studies. "In France, it's work and children."

"French society encourages mothers to work," Staub said. "The way work hours and vacation time are organized also help families a lot. I have 36 days of paid holidays per year -- it's great to spend time with your children."

In the summer, French families can send their children to generous summer camp programs. Government recreation centers in virtually every French village and urban neighborhood offer a full day of activities, including trips to museums, farms and swimming pools -- along with snacks and three-course lunch -- for fees ranging from about 65 cents to $12 a day, based on family income.

At the same time, private French firms and services also cater to big families with working parents.

Staub's pediatrician makes house calls when her children are sick or need checkups, a practice common in rural and urban areas.

"Society evolves quickly and also makes life easier for working mothers," Staub said.

"I refuse to go shopping on weekends, and waste our family time on that. I order everything on the Internet and have it delivered at home."

Researcher Corinne Gavard contributed to this report.

Monitoring A Little-Noticed War (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

On Monday, 94 people died and 150 were injured when a truck loaded with explosives rammed into a military convoy in Sri Lanka. The government blames the Tamil Tiger guerrillas — the pioneers of the suicide bombing — for the attack. The rebels have not said anything.

For more than 20 years, the Tamil rebels have waged a brutal war of independence against the Sri Lankan government, which is dominated by ethnic Sinhalese. Their opponents in Colombo are no innocents, and have made little effort to protect

DOJ_NMG_0082756

Tamil civilians as they wage a brutal counterinsurgency. In April, government security forces stood by for two hours as mobs burned Tamil homes and shops, killing 14 people.

A Buddhist-led government battling a Hindu separatist group in a land with no oil draws little international interest — and no pressure on either side to end such horrors. Hoping to change that, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Louise Arbour, called last month for international human rights monitors to be sent to Sri Lanka. All countries with influence, starting with the United States and Japan, should push the Sri Lankan government to agree.

Colombo is eager for international aid and support in its fight against the Tamil Tigers. With U.N. rights monitors bearing witness, the government may feel pressure to rein in army and police abuses. Monitors could also bolster the country's weak judicial system, which barely investigates crimes against Tamil civilians. The guerrillas, who count the forced recruitment of child soldiers among their crimes, are less vulnerable to international shame. But shining a spotlight might help persuade overseas Tamils to choke off funding.

Great China Bank Sale (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, meet ICBC. China's largest bank joins the ranks of publicly listed companies next week when it unveils what may be the world's largest-ever IPO in Hong Kong and Shanghai. But as with America's mortgage behemoths, investors are betting as much on implicit government support as on ICBC itself.

Headquartered in Beijing, the Industrial Commercial Bank of China Ltd. is China's largest commercial bank by total assets, loans and deposits. With more than 18,000 branches and $21.7 billion in 2005 operating income, it holds 15.4% of total loans in all Chinese banking institutions, according to its offering prospectus. For foreign investors hoping to profit from China's rapid economic growth, ICBC shares may seem just the ticket.

We hope this isn't lemmings jumping off a cliff. At around this time last year, China Construction Bank Corp., the nation's third-largest lender by assets, raised $9.2 billion. This year, Bank of China Ltd., the country's second-largest by assets, raised $11.2 billion in an IPO. Even mid-tier China Merchants Bank received so much demand for its shares that its underwriters exercised a 10% overallotment option.

Amid this excitement, it's easy to forget how and why the Great China Bank Sale started. In the mid-1990s, Beijing's policy makers realized that government-directed lending wasn't compatible with a rapidly expanding capitalist economy. So they created policy banks to lend on behalf of the public sector, leaving state-owned lenders free to dole out cash along commercial lines.

The problem was, the proper economic incentives weren't in place. Why lend on a commercial basis if your local provincial bureaucrat needs some cash? The money soon disappeared -- into pockets and bad projects -- and China's banks were back in the red. So China used its foreign-exchange reserves to recapitalize its banks, creating asset-management companies to take on tricky bad loans.

Since 1998, Beijing has injected $95 billion into the "big four banks," and carved out $305 billion of bad loans, according to Fitch Ratings. ICBC itself received a $15 billion state capital injection last year, plus a government-financed nonperforming-loan carveout of $85 billion. Foreign banks added an additional $20 billion; Goldman Sachs, Allianz Capital and American Express own 10% of ICBC's equity.

With all this money floating around, why worry? Well, bailing out banks -- or the implicit guarantee of doing so -- implants perverse economic incentives. Investors will be betting that public-company standards will help transform ICBC's lending practices, but there's no guarantee that the companies it is lending to have been transformed. Communist Party officials also still populate Chinese banks' boards of directors.

Like other state-owned banks, ICBC is still swimming in nonperforming loans -- which are classified according to Chinese, not international, standards. Fitch estimates a nonperforming to total loan ratio of 4.7%. If you kick in so-called "special mention" loans -- debts that haven't gone bad yet, but might -- the ratio jumps to 9.2%. ICBC also has heavy exposure to manufacturing, transportation and energy industries that are highly cyclical.

DOJ_NMG_0082757

We're not here to give investment advice. But the comparison with the two U.S. "government-sponsored" mortgage giants is startling. Investors comforted by implicit American taxpayer support have had to endure several years of uncertainty and lower returns as fraud and false accounting have been uncovered at Fannie and Freddie. Perhaps that's a warning for ICBC investors.

DOJ_NMG_0082758

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bill Signing Clears Way For Trials Of Terror Suspects (USAT) 4
Bush Signs Detainee Legislation (LAT) 4
Bush Signs New Rules To Prosecute Terror Suspects (NYT) 5
Bush Signs Bill On Terror Prosecution (AP) 6
Bush Signs Rules For Terror War (WT) 8
Bush Signs Terrorism Measure (WP) 8
Law's Reach Extends To Jails In U.S. (LAT) 9
Bush Signs Bill On Detainee Interrogation (MCT) 11
Bush Signs Law Creating Tribunals For Terror Suspects (Update3) (BLOOM) 12
Prosecutors Want To Question Reid (USAT/AP) 13

Homeland Response:

GAO Calls Radiation Monitors Unreliable (WP) 13
Suit Seeks Data On Immigration Profiling Of Arabs (NYT) 14
Arab-American Group Files Suit Against Homeland Security Over Alleged Profiling (FINDLAW/AP) 15
Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works (USAT) 15
We Don't Need Our Own MI5 (WP) 16
Many Ground Zero Workers Gain Chance At Lawsuits (NYT) 17

War News:

Commander: Mistakes Made In Afghanistan (AP-Y) 18
British General Faults U.S. For Taliban Resurgence (WT) 19
British Troops Withdraw From Afghan Area (NYT/AP) 19
US Presses Iraq On Amnesty Issue (FT) 20
Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police (NYT) 20
U.S. Must Win War, McCain Says On Visit (MJS) 22
Kerry: Bush Assurances On Iraq A Blunder (AP) 23
Troops Try To Curb Warfare North Of Baghdad (LAT) 23
U.S. Forces In Balad To Help Stem Carnage (USAT/AP) 24
U.S. Forces Move To Quell Sectarian Violence In Balad (MCT). 25
Tense Reprieve As Iraqi Forces Seal River Town (WP) 26
U.S. Forces Patrol Balad After Violence (AP) 27
Training Regimen Problems Afflict U.S. Army Program To Advise Iraqis (WSJ) 28
655,000 War Dead? (WSJ) 31
Barney And Baghdad (NYT) 33
Military Honors For A Changing Front (WP) 33
Farewell On A Dark Tarmac (WP) 34
Somalia Simmers (WP) 36

DOJ:

Harry Jaffe: D.C.'s New Top Lawman Is A Stranger To Our Streets (WASHEX) 36
7 Departments Miss Senator's Deadline To List High-cost IT Projects (FEDTIMES) 37
Justice Task Force Looks Into Privacy (FCW) 37

Corporate Scandals:

Trial Judge Vacates Conviction Of Late Enron Founder Lay (USAT) 38
Conviction Of Enron's Lay Is Vacated By Judge (WSJ) 39
Judge Throws Out Kenneth Lay's Conviction (NYT) 39
Judge Revokes Lay's Conviction (WP) 40
JUDGE VOIDS CONVICTIONS AGAINST LAY (HC) 41
Enron Founder's Conviction Vacated (AP) 42
Judge Vacates Ken Lay's Enron Conviction (UPI) 43
McGuire's Option Deals Could Lead To Criminal Charges (MINNST) 43
UnitedHealth To Pay Departing CEO $5.1M A Year For Life; Value Of Options Hoard Unknown (FINDLAW/AP) 44
How UnitedHealth Spotlights Gap In Reform (WSJ) 45
UnitedHealth's Options Scandal Shows Familiar Symptoms (WP) 46
Guidelines Set For How To Audit Stock Options (WSJ) 47
If The Price Is Right (NYT) 48

Criminal Law:

House Page Program Leaders Discuss Trip (AP-Y) 49
Religious Right Finds GOP's 'Big Tent' May Be Too Roomy (LAT) 50
Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case (NYT) 51
Biz Groups Want Their Money Back (HILL) 53
Foley Set To Name Abuser (NYT/AP) 54
Seeking Post-Foley Unity (HILL) 54
Foley Scandal Turns Parents Into Web Sleuths (WSJ) 56
Cunningham Said To Help Two Contractors (AP-Y) 57
Bribes Cost Millions In Earmarks (WT) 58
Report Spells Out Abuses By Former Congressman (NYT) 59
Report: Staff Caved To 'Duke' (HILL) 60
Many In Government Helped Cunningham Or Yielded, Panel Finds (WP) 61

Republican Weldon Blasts 'liberal Attack Machine' For Publicity (AP) ... 62
Investigation Is Just Politics, Lawmaker Says (NYT) ... 63
Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Part Of Probe (WP) ... 64
Weldon's Itera Ties Long Known (HILL) ... 65
The Odor From Capitol Hill (NYT) ... 66
Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million (NYT) ... 67
Labor Leader Arrested For Racketeering (AP) ... 68
McLaughlin Pleads Innocent To U.S. Charges (NYS) ... 69
Dem Leader Charged (NSDY) ... 70
The Secret Life Of Labor King (NYDN) ... 71
St. Peters Mayor Likely To Plead Guilty (SLPD) ... 72
Ex-GBI Agent Sentenced In Kickback Deal (AJC) ... 73
Feds Charge Alleged Pa. Mob Boss With Trying To Kill Witness (NSDY) ... 73
Man Arrested On Child-porn Charges After Internet Sting (AP) ... 73
Grand Jury Indicts Capitol Intruder (HILL) ... 74
Noe Called Coin Funds An ATM, Ex-aide Says (COLDISP) ... 74
Coin Dealer's Ex-Ass't Speaks At Trial (AP) ... 75
Noe Considered The State's Rare-coin Fund 'an ATM,' One Of His Former Assistants Says (TOLB) ... 76
FBI Director Wants ISPs To Track Users (CNET) ... 77
FBI Chief Addresses Police Chiefs (BOS) ... 77
Ex-F.D.A. Chief Pleads Guilty In Stock Case (NYT) ... 78
UPDATE: Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (DOW) ... 78
Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (MRKTWTCH) ... 78
Ex-FDA Chief Strikes Plea Agreement In Stock Disclosure Case (FINDLAW/AP) ... 79
Trial That Could Out Feds Alleged To Have Bogus Degrees Delayed (GOVEXEC) ... 80
Man Pleads Guilty In 3 Idaho Slayings (FINDLAW/AP) ... 80
Ex-Stafford Man Admits Role In $10M. Stock Scam (ACP) ... 81
Crime In Florida Continues To Drop, Except Murder (AP) ... 82
U.S. Judge Again Rules Lethal Injection Procedure For Executions Is Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP) ... 82
U.S. Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Case (WSJ) ... 83
Man Is Convicted Of Two Counts Of Murder In L.I. Drunken Driving Case (NYT) ... 83
Williams Seeks $11 Million To Extend Anti-crime Package (WT) 84

Civil Law:

Agency FOIA Administration Found To Be Improving (GOVEXEC) ... 85
No Death Benefits For Studds's Spouse (WP) ... 86

Civil Rights:

California Letter Investigated For Warning To Immigrants (NYT) 86
Election Board Votes To Send New Letter To 305,000 Misinformed Voters (AP) ... 87
FBI Forwards Rylee Investigation To Justice Department (ADG)88
Study Finds Race Disparity In Breast Cancer Mortality Rates (CHIT) ... 89
Chris Rock's Mom Claims Discrimination (AP) ... 90

Antitrust:

Feds OK Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Bid (AP) ... 91
Kucinich Questions Giant Eagle Purchase Of Ohio Stores (PPG)91
Feds' Power To Renege On Immunity May Be Tested In U.S. Supreme Court (LAW) ... 92
Futures Giants To Merge (CHIT) ... 93
Chicago Derivatives Exchanges In $8bn Deal (FT) ... 95
Futures Shock Chicago Merc To Buy Board Of Trade (WSJ) ... 96
Chicago Exchanges Combine Thunder (WSJ) ... 99
2 Exchanges In Chicago Will Merge (NYT) ... 100
Exchanges Bank On Passing Antitrust Muster (CRAIN) ... 102
Tata Steel Offers $8 Billion For Corus (WSJ) ... 102
Lilly Sets Deal To Acquire Icos For About $2.1 Billion (WSJ) ... 103
Vivendi's Universal Sues Two Web Sites Over Video Sharing (WSJ) ... 104
Record Labels Turn Piracy Into A Marketing Opportunity (WSJ)104
Music Companies Sue 8,000 More In Anti-Sharing Fight (WP/AP) ... 106
Game Theories (WSJ) ... 106

Environment:

Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules For Nuclear Plant Guards (WP) ... 108
Benefits Of Fish Exceed Risks, Studies Find (WP) ... 109

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Faults FBI Sentinel Staffing Process (FCW) ... 110
DISPENSARY DIRECTOR GRANTED RELEASE ON $1 MILLION BOND (BCNW) ... 111
Marijuana Club Director Released On Bail (SFC) ... 111
Drug Probe Nets Eighth Guilty Plea (SSJR) ... 112
Nevadans To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana (AP) ... 113
U.S. Official Says Rise In Afghan Opium Production Leading To Purer Heroin In Europe (AP) ... 114
Afghanistan's Opium Production Soaring 'out Of Control,' U.N. Agency Warns (AP) ... 114
Opium Production Down In Golden Triangle (UPI) ... 115
UN Drug Agency Reports Sharp Fall In Golden Triangle Opium Production (VOA) ... 115
Drugs Group In Afghan Exit Order (BBC) ... 116
Review: Prisoner Flights Are Expensive (AP-Y) ... 116
Audit Faults 'Con Air' On Safety (WT) ... 116
Activists' Passion Turns To Violence (SEAPI) ... 117

Immigration:

Border-fence Bill Awaits Signing (WT) ... 119
Smugglers Seen Getting 'Sophisticated, Organized' (WT) ... 121

Tax:

Feds Indict Actor Wesley Snipes For Tax Fraud (LAT) ... 121
Actor Snipes Faces Indictment On Tax Fraud Charges (USAT)123
U.S. Indicts Actor Snipes In Tax-Avoidance Case (WSJ) ... 123
Wesley Snipes Is Indicted On 8 Counts Of Tax Fraud, Accused Of Seeking $12M In False Refunds (AP) ... 124

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs $532.8B Defense Spending Bill (AP-Y) ... 124
Law Caps Interest On 'payday Advances' To Servicemembers (USAT) ... 125

DOJ_NMG_0082760

Bush Sets Defense As Space Priority (WP) 125
New U.S. Space Policy Emphasizes Security (LAT) 127
New Space Policy 'Sets Up' Intel Turf War (UPI) 127
Sealed Filings Increase At High Court (LAW) 127
Bush Triad Visit On Tap (WXII) 129
Bush To Visit N.C., Shotwell To Attend (REIDRVW NC) 130
Liking Math Subtracts From Scores, Study Finds (AP) 130
Enjoying Math Not Always A Plus (USAT) 131
For Math Students, Self-Esteem Might Not Equal High Scores (WP) 132
Reid Faces FEC Complaint (HILL) 132
Legal Fees Are Drain On Lewis' War Chest (LAT) 133
Textile Makers Tap Political Opportunity (WSJ) 134

Other News:

Wholesale Prices Fell Last Month (USAT) 135
Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist (NYT) 135
Data Revive Fears Of US Hard Landing (FT) 136
Output, Pricing Data Indicate A Cooling Economy (WSJ) 137
Dow Industrials Retreat In Their 12000 Quest (WSJ) 137
Elder Bush Calls Economy Strong But Consumers Unsure (DMN) 138
Talk Of Raising Gas Tax Is Just That (WP) 138
Curing The World's Oil Addiction (LAT) 140
An Oil Habit America Cannot Break (WP) 140
Some Seeing Red Over Red-light Tickets (USAT) 141
Yes On All Judges (LAT) 142
Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year (WT/AP) 143
Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits (LAT) 143
Pirro: He's A Novice. Cuomo: She's Involved In A 2nd Investigati (NYT) 145
Elections May Leave Bush An Early Lame Duck (WP) 146
No Spoils For The Victors (NYT) 148
Which Way To Win? (WP) 149
What Democrats Would Do (WP) 150
Rove Foresees GOP Victory (WT) 151
Cheney Unsure Of GOP Control Of Congress (AP-Y) 152
There Goes The GOP Base — And Probably Both Houses (HILL) 152
Congressional Republicans Find Spending May Not Decide Races (WSJ) 153
Having Money Isn't Everything, But It Can Be Deciding Factor (HILL) 154
GOP Bright Spots Few In Senate Races (WT) 155
Funding Constrains Democrats (WP) 155
Congressman Says Earmarks Could Cost GOP Power (USAT) 157
Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists (USAT) 157
Dems Using Hourly Wage Issue Against GOP Rivals (USAT) . 158
GOP Shifts Back To A Basic Issue: Taxes (CSM) 159
Tax Questions Abound On Ballots Across Nation (WSJ) 160
Alarm Bells For G.O.P. In A Battleground State (NYT) 161
Republicans Put $700G In TV Ads In Ohio (AP-Y) 162
Pro-Republican Ads Stretch The Truth On Iraq To Influence Elections (MCT) 163
Colo. Opens Probe On Beauprez Attack Ad (AP-Y) 164
Political Ad Draws A Criminal Inquiry (NYT/AP) 165
Virginia's Senate Race (WP) 165
Don't Call Him Redneck (WP) 166
Familiar Themes Dominate Senate Radio Debate (CCT) 168
Different Approaches From Kean, Menendez (HILL) 169
Hoyer Remark 'Racist,' GOP's Steele Charges (WP) 170
Tyson Ready To Enter The Ring For Steele (WP) 171
Lieberman Urges Dems To Alter Their Ways (AP-Y) 172
Obama Kicks Off Book Tour, Weighs Presidential Bid (CHIT) .. 173
The Reliable Source (WP) 174
In Vodka Non Veritas (NYT) 175
The Wal-Mart Posse (WSJ) 176
A Treat Worthy Of Cinderella (NYT) 177
N. Korea Apparently Preparing Nuke Test (AP) 177
Seoul Warns Of Another N Korea Test (FT) 179
Hints Of Another N. Korea Test Seen (LAT) 180
U.S., Allies Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang (WT) 180
N. Korea Condemns Sanctions, Threatens 2nd Nuke Test (CHIT) 181
Rice To Push U.S. Allies To Inspect N. Korean Cargo (USAT) 182
Rice To Urge Radiation Inspections To Thwart North Korea (NYT) 183
U.S. Urges Vigilance On North Korea (WSJ) 184
Sanctions Against North Korea Must Be Firmly Enforced, Rice Says (MCT) 185
Rice Tries To Head Off Nuclear Arms Race (AP) 186
Kerry Blasts Bush Policy On North Korea (DMR) 187
Defector: Kim's Ouster Would Stop Nukes (AP) 187
U.S. Defector Ends Silence About Life In N. Korea (WT) 188
Letters To The Editor (WT) 189
Bush Supports Croatia Membership In NATO (AP) 190
Abbas Threatens To Dismiss Hamas Government (NYT) 190
Israeli Forces Conducting Raids Kill Four Palestinians In West Bank (WP) 191
Blair Criticizes Veils As 'Mark Of Separation' (NYT) 191
Council Seat Still Undecided After 22 Ballots (NYT) 192
Venezuela Stymied Again In U.N. Vote (WP) 193
Un Seats Continues To Elude Chávez (FT) 194
In UN Political Drama, It's All About The US (CSM) 195
Guatemala Leads But Can't Land U.N. Seat (AP-Y) 196
Venezuela Trails In Early Voting For Seat On Security Council (MCT) 197
A Model Of Modern Vitality, France Devises A Baby Boom (WP) 198
Monitoring A Little-Noticed War (NYT) 199
Great China Bank Sale (WSJ) 200

DOJ_NMG_0082761

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bill Signing Clears Way For Trials Of Terror Suspects (USAT)

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Some of the most notorious names in the war on terror are headed toward prosecution after President Bush signed a law Tuesday authorizing military trials of terrorism suspects.

Imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and awaiting trial are Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks; Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be 9/11 hijacker; and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaeda cells.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said in a White House ceremony.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the trial system set up by the administration was unconstitutional and required approval from Congress. The Justice Department had argued that trying prisoners in wartime has always been a constitutional power of a president.

After the ruling Bush pushed Congress to approve a system for military tribunals. He also insisted Congress authorize CIA agents to use tough methods to interrogate suspected terrorists that are not cruel or inhumane.

Bush said Tuesday the interrogations have yielded valuable information that has helped prevent terror attacks.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," he said.

Democrats, most of whom voted against the measure in the House and Senate, decried the law.

"We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history," Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin said. "It allows the government to seize individuals on American soil and detain them indefinitely with no opportunity to challenge their detention in court."

The new law — called the Military Commissions Act of 2006 — prohibits detainees from using federal courts to challenge the constitutionality of their confinement.

The American Civil Liberties Union called it "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history."

The legislation, which sets the rules for court proceedings, applies to those selected by the military for prosecution.

During campaign appearances around the country, Bush has criticized Democrats who voted against the law, suggesting they would not protect the country from another terrorist attack.

"With the distance of history, the questions will be narrowed and few: Did this generation of Americans take the threat seriously? And did we do what it takes to defeat that threat?"

Republican House leaders assailed the Democrats for seeking more legal rights for terror suspects who are not U.S. citizens.

"The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

The White House has not disclosed what interrogation techniques might be used. It has said that doing so would help the enemy resist those techniques. White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush would probably eventually issue an executive order that describes his interpretation of the standards but those documents are not usually made public.

CIA Director Mike Hayden sent a note to employees after the Bush signing saying it gives them "the legal clarity and legislative support necessary to continue a program that has been one of our country's most effective tools in the fight against terrorism."

"We can be confident that our program remains — as it always has been — fully compliant with U.S. law, the Constitution and our international treaty obligations."

Bush Signs Detainee Legislation (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed new legislation Tuesday providing for the detention and prosecution of terrorism suspects, and the Justice Department moved immediately to request the dismissal of dozens of lawsuits filed by detainees challenging their incarceration.

Bush signed the legislation in an elaborate East Room ceremony, calling it a "vital tool" in the administration's war on terrorism, while Republican Party officials immediately unleashed campaign broadsides, charging that the measure's Democratic critics advocate freeing terrorists.

The new law thus became both part of the administration's final campaign push to preserve its congressional majority in the midterm election and the beginning of a new chapter in fashioning a judicial process for those captured around the world in U.S. military and counterterrorism operations.

The law is bound to generate new and contentious legal challenges that likely will leave U.S. policies on detainees in an uncertain state. Beside the request that federal courts throw out detainees' lawsuits, judges also will be asked to decide new legal questions that again may end up before the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, human rights groups said it is far from clear how the new law will be implemented, and the CIA has asked Justice Department lawyers to review interrogation guidelines.

The legislation sets new ground rules for the CIA to conduct interrogations and allows for the prosecution of terror suspects before military tribunals. Bush said the measure enables the U.S. to bring to justice the coordinators of the Sept. 11 attacks and allows the CIA to continue an aggressive interrogation program that he said had disrupted additional terror strikes.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said, sitting at a table with a sign posted on the front that said "Protecting America." The president said he signed the new law "in memory of the victims" of Sept. 11.

He was surrounded by military officers, members of his Cabinet and lawmakers who helped pass the bill. Several dozen protesters chanted slogans outside in the rain branding the measure an affront to civil liberties.

The enactment of the law -- four months after the U.S. Supreme Court said that an earlier scheme for handling terror cases violated U.S. law -- was good news for Bush as casualties have mounted in Iraq and his handling of the war on terror has come under intensifying criticism.

The signing ceremony was part political rally for a GOP that is struggling to retain control of Congress three weeks before a pivotal midterm election. Republican leaders said the legislation showed that they were a party of strength and assailed Democrats for not supporting the measure.

"The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said.

The Justice Department moved swiftly to enforce one of the law's most controversial provisions. Within two hours of the signing ceremony, department lawyers notified the U.S. appeals court in Washington that the new law had been enacted, "eliminating federal court jurisdiction." The court is overseeing dozens of lawsuits filed on behalf of prisoners held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Lawyers for the detainees responded with their own filing Tuesday, requesting time to present legal arguments that the new law violated the U.S. Constitution. The appeals court took no immediate action.

The detainee's lawyers, who had won victories on behalf of their clients in two previous cases against the administration that went to the Supreme Court -- involving detainees Shafiq Rasul and Salim Ahmed Hamdan -- said they were confident they would prevail once again.

"We beat them in Rasul. We beat them in Hamdan. Now, they have tried to beat us in Congress. I don't think it will work," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York advocacy group that has represented a number of the detainees. "They have been slapped down twice. I think they will be slapped down again."

The administration has identified about two dozen suspects it plans to put on trial, including accused Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who, along with 13 other high-profile suspects, was recently transferred from CIA custody to Guantanamo Bay.

The rules do not affect the vast majority of the estimated 435 prisoners being held at the Cuban military prison. Unless the military decides to bring charges, most of the detainees will remain in legal limbo, without the opportunity to challenge their status, under the new law.

Bush said the new interrogation rules would allow the CIA to restart a program of tough questioning of terrorist suspects that ground to a halt more than a year ago, in the wake of a congressional debate over legislation banning the use of torture and questions about whether rough treatment of detainees would subject operatives to prosecution for war crimes.

A senior administration official said that the CIA has not yet finalized a list of interrogation tactics or procedures, but when it does, it will submit its new program to the Justice Department for a legal review, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the CIA effort. Once it gets the blessing of Justice, the program will be brought to Congress, the official said.

"The CIA will have to brief its program to an oversight committee," said the senior official. "This is the beginning of the conversation, not the end."

Bush Signs New Rules To Prosecute Terror Suspects (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — President Bush signed legislation Tuesday that creates new rules for prosecuting and interrogating terrorism suspects, a move Mr. Bush said would enable the Central Intelligence Agency to resume a once-secret program to question the most dangerous enemy operatives in the war on terror.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Mr. Bush said at a ceremony in the East Room of the White House.

He called the bill "a way to deliver justice to the terrorists we have captured."

But the C.I.A. program is unlikely to resume immediately, because the law authorizes Mr. Bush to issue an executive order clarifying the rules for questioning high-level detainees and the order has not been written. Many experts believe that the harsh techniques the C.I.A. has used, including extended sleep deprivation and water-boarding, which induces a feeling of drowning, will not be allowed.

With the midterm elections three weeks away, Mr. Bush hoped to use the bill signing to turn the political debate back to the war on terrorism, a winning issue for Republicans, and away from scandals like the Mark Foley case, which have dominated the news in recent weeks. The president said he was signing the measure "in memory of the victims of September the 11th."

The law sets up a system of military commissions for trying terrorism suspects that would allow evidence to be withheld from defendants in certain instances. It also strips the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear petitions from noncitizens for writs of habeas corpus, effectively preventing detainees from going to court to challenge their confinement.

More than 500 habeas suits are pending in federal court, and Justice Department officials said Tuesday that they would move swiftly to dismiss them under the new law. That will inevitably spark a challenge by civil liberties lawyers, who regard the habeas-stripping provision as unconstitutional, a view shared by many Democrats on Capitol Hill.

"Congress had no justification for suspending the writ of habeas corpus, a core value in American law, in order to avoid judicial review that prevents government abuse," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The bill signing drew protests outside the White House from human rights advocates, some dressed in orange jumpsuits of the sort worn by detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. They gathered around a black coffin painted with the words "the corpse of habeas corpus"; some were arrested after refusing to move away from the White House gates.

Joining the president at the bill signing were senior members of his war cabinet, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the C.I.A.. In an e-mail message to C.I.A. employees, General Hayden called the measure a "very public vote of confidence by Congress and the president in the skill and discipline of C.I.A.'s officers."

Leading Republican lawmakers, among them Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who balked at the initial White House version of the bill and forced a much-publicized compromise, were also on hand. But the third leader of that Republican rebellion, Senator John McCain of Arizona, was noticeably absent.

Mr. McCain, a likely presidential contender in 2008, skipped the ceremony to go to Wisconsin to campaign for a Republican House candidate, John Gard, and was later headed to Sioux Falls, S.D., to address the Chamber of Commerce. A spokeswoman said the senator's absence was "purely an issue of scheduling."

The bill was prompted by a Supreme Court ruling, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, that invalidated the system of military commissions Mr. Bush had set up for trying terrorism suspects, saying they required Congressional authorization. The court also required suspects to be treated in accordance with a provision of the Geneva Conventions, Common Article 3, which prohibits cruel and inhumane treatment, including "outrages upon personal dignity."

The ruling prompted Mr. Bush to acknowledge the existence of the secret C.I.A. program. Last month, he announced he was moving 14 high-level terrorism detainees out of C.I.A. custody and to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay. He called on Congress to pass a bill setting up military commissions and establishing new standards for interrogation so the C.I.A. program could go forward.

Bush Signs Bill On Terror Prosecution (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 17, 2006

Some of the most notorious names in the war on terror are headed toward prosecution after President Bush signed a law Tuesday authorizing military trials of terrorism suspects.

The legislation also eliminates some of the rights defendants are usually guaranteed under U.S. law, and it authorizes continued harsh interrogations of terror suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0082764

Imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and awaiting trial are Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be 9/11 hijacker, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said in a White House ceremony.

The Pentagon expects to begin pre-trial motions early next year and to begin the actual trials in the summer.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that trying detainees in military tribunals violated U.S. and international law, so Bush urged Congress to change the law during a speech on Sept. 6 in the White House East Room attended by families of the Sept. 11, 2001, victims. He also insisted that the law authorize CIA agents to use tough — yet unspecified — methods to interrogate suspected terrorists.

Six weeks later, after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the bill, Bush signed the new law "in memory of the victims of September the 11th."

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said. "I have that privilege this morning."

Civil libertarians and leading Democrats decried the law as a violation of American values. The American Civil Liberties Union said it was "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history." Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin said, "We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history."

"It allows the government to seize individuals on American soil and detain them indefinitely with no opportunity to challenge their detention in court," Feingold said. "And the new law would permit an individual to be convicted on the basis of coerced testimony and even allow someone convicted under these rules to be put to death."

The legislation, which sets the rules for court proceedings, applies to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq. It does apply to 14 suspects who were secretly questioned by the CIA overseas and recently moved to the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay.

The swift implementation of the law is a rare bit of good news for Bush as casualties mount in Iraq in daily violence. Lawmakers are increasingly calling for a change of strategy, and political anxieties are jeopardizing Republican chances of hanging onto control of Congress.

Bush has been criticizing Democrats who voted against the law, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, during campaign appearances around the country. He has suggested that votes against the law show that Democrats would not protect the country from another terrorist attack.

Republican House leaders, in a tough battle to maintain their majority, echoed those criticisms Tuesday in an attempt to get some political points out of the legislation they supported. "The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

Bush noted that the law came amid dispute.

"Over the past few months, the debate over this bill has been heated, and the questions raised can seem complex," he said. "Yet, with the distance of history, the questions will be narrowed and few: Did this generation of Americans take the threat seriously? And did we do what it takes to defeat that threat?"

A coalition of religious groups staged a protest against the bill outside the White House, shouting "Bush is the terrorist" and "Torture is a crime." About 15 of the protesters, standing in a light rain, refused orders to move. Police arrested them one by one.

The legislation says the president can "interpret the meaning and application" of international standards for prisoner treatment, a provision intended to allow him to authorize aggressive interrogation methods that might otherwise be seen as illegal by international courts. Bush said such measures have helped the CIA gain vital information from terror suspects and have saved American lives.

After Bush signed the law, CIA Director Mike Hayden sent a note to employees saying it gives them "the legal clarity and legislative support necessary to continue a program that has been one of our country's most effective tools in the fight against terrorism."

"We can be confident that our program remains — as it always has been — fully compliant with U.S. law, the Constitution and our international treaty obligations," Hayden wrote.

The White House has said that disclosing the techniques that are used would give the enemy information to resist those techniques. White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush would probably eventually issue an executive order that would describe his interpretation of the standards, but those documents are not usually made public.

Snow rejected the idea that Americans should be able to see and judge the standards for themselves, particularly in the aftermath of illegal abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison.

DOJ_NMG_0082765

"The only way accountability doesn't exist is if you believe that the military is not committed to it," Snow said.

Bush Signs Rules For Terror War (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed into law new rules for detaining and trying terrorism suspects, and authorizing the CIA to use strong interrogation techniques to try to break up terrorist plots.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Mr. Bush said in a ceremony in the White House's East Room, calling the bill a defining symbol of U.S. commitment to defeating terrorists.

The ceremony marked the end of a six-week push for the bill, during which Mr. Bush and top Republicans in Congress fought over specifics. Democrats attacked the entire framework of the CIA program.

The CIA had detained and interrogated about 100 terrorism suspects over the past five years in secret facilities. Mr. Bush last month declassified the broad outlines of the program so he could send Congress a bill to authorize and further legitimize the program.

The president identified six plots that were thwarted because of information gleaned from terrorism suspects who were detained under the program.

Amnesty International USA and other rights groups said they will fight the law, arguing that it will lead to interrogation techniques that most would consider torture. Democrats, meanwhile, said the CIA program is a disservice to American traditions of law and order. They also accused Mr. Bush of playing politics with the measure.

"Everything about this bill stinks of desperate election-year politics," said Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat. "After repeatedly saying, 'Time is running out,' President Bush decided to wait 19 days to sign this bill in an attempt to keep the Republican scandals from drowning his message on the evening news."

The bill passed the House by a 250-170 vote and the Senate by a vote of 65-34. In both chambers, most Republicans voted in favor and most Democrats against.

The CIA program went dormant over the summer and the remaining detainees were transferred, but White House press secretary Tony Snow would not say yesterday whether it had been restarted.

"I am not at liberty to divulge any further details about what may have happened in the last two hours since the law was signed," he said.

Although most of the focus has been on the CIA program, the bill also authorizes military commissions to try terrorism suspects. The provision was a response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that such commissions were appropriate, but needed specific approval from Congress.

Mr. Bush called the framework for trials lawful, fair and necessary. Democrats say rights are curbed excessively, and they expect court challenges and overturned convictions.

Meanwhile, 16 protesters from a variety of religious groups opposed to the counterterrorism bill were arrested yesterday morning near the White House. The demonstrators shouted, "Bush is the terrorist" and "Torture is a crime."

Lt. Scott Fear of the U.S. Park Police said the demonstrators were charged with impeding access to a White House entrance.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, attended the signing ceremony. He said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks, should be the first person tried.

"Family members of the 9/11 victims, America's citizens and the people of the civilized world fully expect the prosecution of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed. Let's do it," he said in a letter to Mr. Bush.

Mr. Snow said it will be at least a month before trials begin.

Bush Signs Terrorism Measure (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

President Bush enacted controversial changes in the system of interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects yesterday, setting the rules for the trials of key al-Qaeda members in a step that he says will help protect the nation.

Surrounded by members of his Cabinet and legislators, Bush signed the changes into law during a White House ceremony as more than 100 protesters stood outside in the rain chanting slogans denouncing the measure as a violation of fundamental American traditions.

The new law imposes tight limits on defendants' traditional courtroom rights, including restrictions on their ability to examine the evidence against them, to challenge their incarceration and to exclude evidence gained through witness coercion.

DOJ_NMG_0082766

The president said the extraordinary measure is justified by the extraordinary circumstances of the fight against terrorism. "It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," he said, before signing the measure. "I have that privilege this morning."

Bush said the new law will allow the United States to prosecute captured terrorism suspects for "war crimes," and bring to justice the al-Qaeda operatives who plotted the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the October 2000 suicide bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen, and the August 1998 truck bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The bill also spells out the specific interrogation techniques that are outlawed, while granting retroactive legal protection to military and intelligence personnel who previously participated in rough questioning of terrorism suspects. That provision allows the administration to continue a once-secret CIA program for detaining terrorism suspects and using tough interrogation techniques on those believed to have information about plots against the United States, Bush said.

"This program has been one of the most successful intelligence efforts in American history," Bush said. "It has helped prevent attacks on our country. And the bill I sign today will ensure that we can continue using this vital tool to protect the American people for years to come."

With the midterm elections coming on Nov. 7, congressional Republicans immediately seized on the new law, which was opposed by most Democratic lawmakers, as evidence of their commitment to protect the country against terrorist attacks.

"Capitol Hill Democrats have yet to offer any solutions or formulate any serious national security policy on how to keep America safe in a post-9/11 world," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a statement.

Some Democrats, meanwhile, criticized Bush for signing a measure that they say violates the nation's civil liberties protections. "It is a sad day when the rubber-stamp Congress undercuts our freedoms, assaults our Constitution and lets the terrorists achieve something they could never win on the battlefield," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.).

Human rights advocates have questioned the value of information obtained through aggressive methods, and the military last month abandoned tough interrogation techniques. "No good intelligence is going to come from abusive practices," Lt. Gen. John F. Kimmons, the Army deputy chief of staff for intelligence, said last month in announcing the Army's new interrogation policy.

Bush approved the prosecution of "unlawful enemy combatants" before special military commissions shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, but trials were suspended pending the outcome of appeals questioning their legality in federal court. In June, the Supreme Court struck down the commissions, saying they had not been authorized by Congress and violated the Geneva Conventions. Consequently, the Bush administration pressed Congress to pass a bill to legalize them and to endorse many of the methods used by U.S. intelligence officials to get information from terrorism suspects.

Even with enactment of the legislation, White House press secretary Tony Snow said, trials of terrorism suspects are months away, at least.

The legislation was approved by Congress late last month and is already being challenged by several lawsuits. "This issue is clearly going to be in the courts for years," said Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "It is unconstitutional and un-American."

Law's Reach Extends To Jails In U.S. (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military tribunals bill signed by President Bush on Tuesday marks the first time the right of habeas corpus has been curtailed by law for millions of people in the United States.

Although debate focused on trials at Guantanamo Bay, the new law also takes away from noncitizens in the U.S. — including more than 12 million permanent residents — the right to go to court if they are declared "unlawful enemy combatants."

No one has suggested that the Bush administration plans to use its newly won power to round up large numbers of immigrants.

But before Tuesday, the principle of habeas corpus meant that anyone thrown into jail in the U.S. had a right to ask a judge for a hearing. They also had a right to go free if the government could not show a legal basis for holding them. The Latin term for "you have the body," habeas corpus is considered one of an accused person's most basic rights.

Many legal scholars predict the law's partial repeal of habeas corpus will be struck down as unconstitutional.

"This is an outright slap at the Supreme Court, and it is heading for invalidation," said Eric M. Freedman, a law professor at Hofstra University and an expert on habeas corpus. "This is a core principle of law that was established by the prisoners who were tossed into the Tower of London by the king, and it was preserved in the Constitution. Now, Congress is saying it doesn't apply to this disfavored group of prisoners."

DOJ_NMG_0082767

The new law says: "No court, justice or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States who has been determined … to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant or is awaiting such determination."

In early drafts, the bill would have cut off habeas corpus only for unlawful combatants detained "outside the United States" and at Guantanamo Bay. However, the final version deleted that phrase.

Now, it not only bars the men held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention in court, it also closes the courthouse door to noncitizens who are arrested in Los Angeles or Chicago and held by the military as a possible "unlawful enemy combatant." The new law also defines this term broadly to include not just terrorists and fighters, but also people who have "materially supported hostilities against the United States."

Although an American citizen can be arrested as an "enemy combatant," he or she can challenge the government's action in court.

Some legal experts say the fate of this limited repeal of habeas corpus is uncertain because it is unprecedented.

"This is one of the great unresolved questions because this has never happened before," said Duke University law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, a critic of the Bush administration. "The question is whether this is an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus."

The Constitution makes clear habeas corpus can be suspended, but only during extreme emergencies. It says, "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

In the most famous example, President Lincoln suspended habeas corpus during the Civil War.

Habeas corpus does not always work in favor of the detained. During World War II, the Supreme Court heard the case of the more than 100,000 Japanese Americans who were interned but ruled they were being held legally because of a wartime emergency.

Bush administration lawyers have said this, too, is wartime and the attacks of Sept. 11 were akin to an invasion. Moreover, Congress has now endorsed the president's power to hold "enemy combatants."

But others say the court will not find support in the Constitution for the new law. The law does not qualify under any of the tests for suspending habeas corpus spelled out there, said John D. Hutson, a former judge advocate general of the Navy and dean of the Franklin Pierce Law School in New Hampshire.

"This is not a time of rebellion. There has not been an invasion, and there's no evidence the 'public safety' requires it," Hutson said. "Let's not kid ourselves. This is not about an invasion. It is about the embarrassment of holding people who, if they got to court, could show they should not have been held."

Still, the outcome of any case that reached the Supreme Court would be hard to predict because the justices have been closely split when faced with a clash between civil liberties and wartime powers.

In June, the court divided 5-3 on whether Bush had the power, acting on his own, to set up a system of military trials at Guantanamo Bay. The justices had taken up a writ of habeas corpus filed on behalf of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a onetime driver for Osama bin Laden who was charged with conspiring to kill Americans.

The five-justice majority struck down Bush's rules and said they must be written into law. Three others dissented. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. recused himself, but had backed the plan when he was an appeals court judge.

Now, Congress has written the president's rules into law and seeks to prevent the courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing a challenge to them.

Pepperdine University law professor Douglas W. Kmiec said Congress and the White House were on solid ground in seeking to cut off legal appeals from foreign fighters held by the U.S. military abroad, including at Guantanamo Bay.

"I would say habeas has no application to wartime detention outside the United States," said Kmiec, who has generally defended the Bush administration.

After World War II, the Supreme Court ruled German military prisoners held by U.S. authorities had no right to challenge their detentions through a writ of habeas corpus, he noted.

But detentions within this country have been seen differently, he added. "This is one of the most difficult questions posed by this act. There is no question that a habeas right has existed within the territorial United States for citizens and legal residents," Kmiec said.

A test case could head to the Supreme Court in a few months. Armed with the new law, government lawyers Tuesday told judges in Washington they should throw out pending cases filed on behalf of the men held at Guantanamo Bay. Their lawyers are sure to appeal to the high court.

The government could also move to cut off further court hearings for Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, the only person now being held in this country as an enemy combatant.

DOJ_NMG_0082768

A native of Qatar who was a graduate student at Bradley University in Peoria, Ill., Al-Marri was arrested in December 2001 and declared an enemy combatant by the president in 2003. Government officials alleged that he was a secret Al Qaeda operative.

"He has not been charged with anything. It's atrocious and un-American," said Lawrence Lustberg, Al-Marri's lawyer. "We believe this case is headed for the Supreme Court."

Bush Signs Bill On Detainee Interrogation (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush signed legislation Tuesday establishing new rules for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists, but the fight over how to deal with detainees is far from over.

The new law is already under attack in court, and no one is likely to be brought to trial under the new rules anytime soon. Even some lawmakers who voted for the legislation questioned its constitutionality.

Although the law's future is uncertain, critics and supporters agreed that its enactment marks a major shift in the nation's approach to terrorism and some legal principles. Programs that Bush launched in secret now have the full support of Congress.

The Military Commissions Act of 2006 clears the way for the CIA to resume aggressive interrogations in secret prisons and denies suspected terrorists the right to challenge their detentions in civilian courts. It also permits the use of evidence obtained through coercion and lets the president draw the line between acceptable interrogation techniques and impermissible torture.

While Bush hailed the legislation as a potent weapon against terrorists, critics called it a stain on America's reputation as a champion of human rights and civil liberties.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said at a crowded White House signing ceremony. Shortly after Bush signed the legislation, CIA Director Michael Hayden told agency employees that the law "ensures that we can detain and interrogate key terrorist figures" without fear of prosecution for war crimes.

The American Civil Liberties Union called the new law unconstitutional, un-American and "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted." Most of the provisions in the law apply only to non-citizens who have been declared "unlawful enemy combatants."

"The president can now - with the approval of Congress - indefinitely hold people without charge, take away protections against horrific abuse, put people on trial based on hearsay evidence, authorize trials that can sentence people to death based on testimony literally beaten out of witnesses, and slam shut the courthouse door for habeas petitions (challenging the detentions)," said Anthony Romero, the organization's executive director.

Congress approved the bill last month after intense behind-the-scenes negotiations between the White House and three leading Republican senators - Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. Although the bill was presented to Congress as a compromise, Bush emerged the clear winner.

"The president has gotten everything he wants and more," said Jeffrey Addicott, a former Army lawyer and director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University law school in San Antonio. "There can really be no doubt that Congress believes we are in a state of war."

Addicott, who strongly supports the new law, said the shift means that Congress is willing to roll back traditional legal protections in the pursuit of terrorists.

"You have to have a lower standard of due process or you'll never be able to prosecute these war criminals," he said.

But critics said the nation should maintain high legal standards, even in a time of war, to send a message to the rest of the world.

"The fundamental fairness of the American people and legal system are among our greatest strengths in the fight against terrorism," Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said. "We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history."

The Center for Constitutional Rights, which has filed two challenges to the law on behalf of detainees, said it would fight the changes "at every turn, using every tool at our disposal, until we reverse this affront to the rule of law."

Legal experts said the anticipated court battles make it unlikely that any of the roughly 435 detainees at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, would face trial before a military commission anytime soon.

Fourteen suspected terrorists, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, have been transferred from CIA custody to Guantanamo to await trial. Another 60 to 80 Guantanamo detainees are considered likely candidates for trial.

"No one is going to trial in the near future," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia. "I don't think anyone will be tried during his (Bush's) presidency."

DOJ_NMG_0082769

Legal scholars on both sides of the issue agreed that the law is most vulnerable to challenge on the issue of denying detainees access to civilian courts unless they're U.S. citizens. The ability of suspects to challenge their imprisonment, known as the right of habeas corpus, dates back to the Magna Carta in 1215 and is considered a bedrock legal principle.

Bush expressed confidence that the newly approved system for dealing with detainees will survive court challenges. Others aren't so sure.

"Congress could have done it right, and didn't, but the next line of defense is the court," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, told The Philadelphia Inquirer after he voted for the bill. "I think the court will clean it up."

Bush Signs Law Creating Tribunals For Terror Suspects (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, October 18, 2006

Oct. 17 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush signed legislation to allow the trial of suspected terrorists by military tribunals, and his administration immediately used the law to challenge suits by hundreds of Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The government took its first action under the new Military Commissions Act, which Bush said ``provides a way to deliver justice to the terrorists'' captured after the Sept. 11 attacks. The American Civil Liberties Union said the law will make Guantanamo and other detention facilities a ``legal no-man's land.''

Among those who will be brought to trial under the law is Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind. He and 13 other terrorism suspects, who were labeled ``high value'' and had been held in secret overseas prisons operated by the Central Intelligence Agency, were transferred last month to the U.S. facility at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Shortly after Bush signed the measure, the Justice Department sent a letter to a U.S. appeals court in Washington saying the new law strips hundreds of other Guantanamo detainees of their right to a court hearing to challenge their confinement. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit is considering whether to dismiss the suits by detainees who haven't been charged with war crimes.

In addition to setting up military commissions to try suspected terrorists, the law gives the president wide latitude to interpret the Geneva Conventions in deciding what interrogation techniques would be permissible.

Water Boarding

Senator John McCain, a key architect of the bill, said the intent is to outlaw practices such as simulated drowning -- known as water boarding -- sleep deprivation and putting detainees in stress positions. The Arizona Republican's opposition to the president's original proposal for the tribunals forced the administration to compromise on its provisions.

The law continued to draw criticism from some Democrats and groups such as the ACLU and Amnesty International.

ACLU Executive Director Anthony Romero, in a statement, called the law ``unconstitutional and un-American.'' Amnesty International said it would let the U.S. hold suspects indefinitely without charge or trial.

Under the law, detainees who haven't been charged with a crime can no longer go to federal court to contest whether they are being properly held as ``enemy combatants.'' Instead, they must go through a military review, with a limited right of appeal to the D.C. Circuit.

Fewer Rights

Lawyers for more than 200 Guantanamo detainees say such military reviews would provide fewer rights than a federal court suit, and that the Constitution doesn't allow the U.S. to take away their right to challenge their detention by asking a federal judge to issue a writ of habeas corpus.

The Guantanamo detainees won a 2004 Supreme Court ruling allowing them to challenge their detention in federal court. After the cases returned to a federal trial court in Washington, two judges issued conflicting rulings on whether the inmates could continue to pursue their claims. The D.C. Circuit hadn't ruled on the cases by the time Congress approved the new law in September.

Republicans highlighted Democrats' opposition to the new law. House Majority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, said in a statement that ``Democrats' partisan opposition to this program, at the urging of the radical leftist element of their party, provides further proof that they continue to put politics ahead of addressing the security concerns of the American people.''

U.S. Personnel

Democratic Representative Edward Markey of Massachusetts said the law would endanger U.S. personnel overseas who are captured by the nation's enemies.

While Bush was signing the law, a group of protesters demonstrated outside the White House fence chanting ``stop torture'' and ``shame on Congress, shame on Bush.'' At least 16 people were arrested when they blocked an entrance to the White House grounds, said Scott Fear, a spokesman for the U.S. Park Police.

DOJ_NMG_0082770

Bush sought the legislation after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Congress had not authorized tribunals for bringing terrorism suspects to trial. The Senate gave final approval to the bill 65-34 on Sept. 28 and the House endorsed it the following day, 250-170.

``Over the past few months the debate over this bill has been heated, and the questions raised can seem complex," Bush said today. ``Every member of Congress who voted for this bill has helped our nation rise to the task that history has given us."

Legal Procedures Needed

Administration spokesman Tony Snow said suspects won't be brought to trial immediately. ``I think it's a month or two, at least," because of the need to set up legal procedures and for suspects to obtain attorneys, he said. He also declined to predict how soon CIA interrogations would resume or what ``precise questioning techniques" would be used.

``Some of these people are so bad their host governments don't want them back," Snow said.

About 150 people were invited to the signing ceremony in the East Room of the White House, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Peter Pace, CIA Director General Michael Hayden and current and retired military officers, lawmakers, advocacy groups, congressional and agency staff.

Prosecutors Want To Question Reid (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 18, 2006

BOSTON — Federal investigators told a judge Tuesday that they want to question would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid because it is likely he has important information about terrorist activities.

Prosecutors said in U.S. District Court they don't believe Reid is entitled to a public defender now that his criminal case is over.

Reid, a British citizen and self-described follower of Osama bin Laden, pleaded guilty in 2002 to trying to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight with explosives hidden in his shoes. He is serving a life sentence at a maximum-security federal prison in Florence, Colo.

In April, a judge extended a 2003 order allowing Reid to continue to be represented by federal public defenders. At the time, Reid could have been called as a witness in the trial of al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. Reid was never called as a witness.

U.S. District Judge William Young said he would keep in place the orders continuing Reid's representation by public defenders, noting that under those orders, the government can contact Reid only after giving notice to his lawyers and having them present for any interviews with him.

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Farmer said investigators want to talk to Reid without an attorney present to develop a “personal rapport,” which would be difficult to do with an attorney or any third party in the room. Farmer said federal agents believe Reid could have information on terrorism plots that could be carried out. He said al-Qaeda plots are known to “have long gestation periods.”

Judith Mizner, one of Reid's public defenders, said Reid has repeatedly made it clear he will not talk to investigators without an attorney present. She expressed skepticism about prosecutors' claim that they only want to talk to Reid and do not plan to interrogate him for the purpose of charging him with additional crimes.

Young urged prosecutors and Reid's lawyers to consider bringing the case to a federal judge in Colorado.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Calls Radiation Monitors Unreliable (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security's plan to spend $1.2 billion deploying next-generation nuclear-detection equipment at U.S. ports and border crossings cannot be justified, given test results that showed the devices are unreliable, congressional investigators warned yesterday.

The department ignored its own tests showing the new monitors could not meet a standard of detecting enriched uranium 95 percent of the time, according to the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm. When the nuclear material was shielded, detection rates ranged from 17 percent to 53 percent.

DHS also understated the project's costs by up to $181 million, GAO officials wrote to the leaders of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees.

DOJ_NMG_0082771

The department's cost-benefit "analysis does not justify its recent decision to spend $1.2 billion to purchase and deploy" the new radiation portal monitors, the GAO reported. Homeland Security "relied on potential future performance to justify the purchase," the agency said.

The report came four days after President Bush signed a $3.4 billion port-security bill that, among other things, requires new monitors to be deployed at the nation's 22 busiest ports by the end of 2007. Congress raced to pass the legislation last month before recessing for the midterm elections.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland. And we're going to win the war on terror," Bush said at a signing ceremony Friday.

In separate legislation last month, however, Congress barred full-scale production of the devices until the department certifies "a significant increase in operational effectiveness."

The GAO report warns that the Bush administration risks repeating earlier failures. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the government spent $300 million on radiation monitors that could not tell uranium from cat litter or ceramic tile. They also had high false-alarm rates.

Existing monitors cost about $55,000. The new screening machines now cost at least $377,000 each, the GAO reported.

DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen said the GAO missed the fact that the department is continuing to test and review devices produced by Thermo Electron Corp., Raytheon Co. and Canberra Industries Inc., which were awarded the business in July.

The DHS is testing 80 devices under a one-year contract before deciding whether to move ahead with a five-year program to deploy 1,400 screening machines at ports and border crossings.

"That 95 percent rate of effectiveness is a standard that we maintain. We are not going to put devices in the field unless they meet those high standards," Agen said.

Suit Seeks Data On Immigration Profiling Of Arabs (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

In an effort to establish whether the government is using prohibited profiling methods against Arab-Americans and Muslims, a civil rights group filed a suit yesterday against the Homeland Security Department and one of its branches, Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The suit, by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, asked the Federal District Court in the District of Columbia to compel the immigration agency under the Freedom of Information Act to release the nationalities of 237 people arrested for immigration violations in October 2004.

The agency announced the arrests at the time in an effort to disrupt possible terrorist threats in the presidential elections.

Over the past two years, two previous requests by the committee to obtain the information through standard channels failed. Refusing to release the nationalities leaves open a possibility that immigration laws are being disproportionately enforced against Arab-Americans and Muslims, said Kareem Shora, the new executive director of the committee, which is based in Washington. The organization is not seeking individuals' names or their dispositions in the courts.

In one letter denying the previous requests, the immigration agency said releasing the information would harm its law enforcement efforts by divulging where it was concentrating its resources.

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Dean Boyd, would not elaborate on that statement. Mr. Boyd did restate that the agency did not enforce immigration laws on the basis of race, religion or ethnic origin.

More than 160,000 individuals were deported last year "from virtually every country around the globe," he added.

Arab-Americans and American Muslims have widespread suspicions that the spotlight is focused on them regarding accusations of terrorism, particularly around any election season, to spread concern among other voters and to intimidate them from speaking out. Mr. Boyd strongly objected to the idea that political considerations were involved in any aspect of enforcing immigration law.

"We conduct enforcement actions every day and certainly don't time them for any political reason," he said, adding that the months leading up to an important event like elections were an obvious time to step up law enforcement.

The antidiscrimination committee's request was in part prompted by a news release from the immigration agency that gave the nationalities of eight men who were arrested, and six were Arabs, Mr. Shora said.

Three databases that track immigrants were used, he said, and one has mostly Arabs or Muslims. Mr. Shora was referring to the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System, a hastily created database that tracks visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0082772

All those 25 countries except North Korea have Muslim or Arab majorities, and the 80,000 men who registered were overwhelmingly Arabs and Muslims. Using that database, the committee says, would mean unfairly enforcing immigration laws amid just one community and violate the laws against profiling.

Arab-American Group Files Suit Against Homeland Security Over Alleged Profiling (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lubna Takruri, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-An Arab-American civil rights group filed a lawsuit Tuesday against the federal government in a bid to obtain information about the nationalities of more than 230 people arrested for immigration violations.

The suit, filed by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, names the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and its Immigration and Customs Enforcement unit as defendants.

It was filed under the Freedom of Information Act in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia after two years of unsuccessful attempts to learn the nationalities of individuals arrested in 2004 under a law enforcement operation intended to disrupt potential terrorist threats before the presidential election.

The Washington-based group believes the operation improperly used the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System - a government database created after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorists attacks to track visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries - to profile Arab and Muslim visitors to the United States. The domestic registration system required males from 24 Arab and predominantly Muslim countries and North Korea to register with immigration authorities. The registration requirement has since been phased out, but the database of information still exists.

The 2004 operation became known as the "October plan" after the FBI sent an e-mail advising its field offices and Homeland Security agencies of "extraordinary measures" from the first week of October 2004 through the presidential inauguration.

The FBI's internal e-mail, obtained by CBS News, called for "aggressive - even obvious - surveillance" intended to give the impression that the government was targeting immigration violators who might be a threat, even if they had not committed a crime.

Authorities arrested 237 people during the operation. And, "every single one had violated immigration laws, regardless of nationality," said Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Boyd said race, ethnicity and religion played "absolutely no role" in the operation.

"It was simply an effort to target immigration violators who may have posed an elevated public safety threat in the weeks leading to the presidential election," he said.

The Arab-American organization wants to find out if the 237 people were disproportionately Arab and Muslim, because the registration database was made up of mostly Arab and Muslim men.

But the federal agency points out that in addition to the registration database, two other databases were used, including one of student visa holders.

With the national elections approaching, the group fears the registration database is being used to target Arab and Muslim men for general law enforcement purposes.

"The biggest factor is that we know that they carried out the October plan during the presidential elections - the most recent national elections we had," said Kareem Shora, the Arab-American group's national executive director. "Our fear is that since it happened during the last national elections, is something like that going to happen again soon?"

In the complaint filed Tuesday, the group does not seek names of the people detained or how they were sought out; It only requests their nationalities. The civil rights group asked for the nationality information in two FOIA requests last year but was denied.

But the Arab-American group is concerned that the registration requirements and the October arrests were presented as counterterrorism operations but instead turned into a way to enforce immigration violations.

In a letter responding to the FOIA requests, the agency said the information is exempt from the Freedom of Information Act because it was collected for law enforcement purposes and is an ongoing investigation. The civil rights group argues that getting information on just the nationalities of those detained would not jeopardize any law enforcement operation.

Scanners For Liquid Bombs In Works (USAT)

By Thomas Frank, Usa Today

USA Today, October 18, 2006

X-ray devices show carry-ons in 3-D

DOJ_NMG_0082773

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration, in a potential strategy shift, may screen carry-on bags with new three-dimensional X-ray machines that are better at spotting liquid explosives, guns and other weapons.

The 3-D machines have "an extraordinary ability to find" liquids, TSA chief Kip Hawley told USA TODAY. "They're a step beyond where we are today."

The TSA has limited the volume of liquids passengers can carry on planes since authorities foiled an alleged plot in London in August to bomb U.S.-bound planes with liquid explosives. Installing new X-ray machines would improve security and could ease the liquid restrictions, aviation consultant Richard Roth said.

The question for the TSA is whether to buy upgraded X-ray machines for $75,000 to $200,000 each or to wait possibly two years for better machines costing about $400,000. The TSA had planned to wait for the more expensive machines, which have the highest level of explosives detection. But, Hawley said, "if it's going to be two years, maybe it makes sense economically and security-wise to put an intermediate step in between."

The TSA will evaluate the machines in coming months. They provide more detailed images than the X-rays airports have used for 30 years. Those X-rays have been criticized by the Homeland Security Department's inspector general for inadequately spotting explosives, guns and knives. Upgraded X-rays "might significantly increase screeners' ability to detect" weapons, a 2004 report by the inspector general said.

"They're your best answer now," Roth said. "The technology is getting so good on those machines."

The upgraded machines, called multiview X-ray, scan from several angles to create three-dimensional images of items in a bag. Current X-ray machines use one image that can make a knife look like a pen.

"We may actually be able to speed security lines" by giving airport screeners more detailed images that reduce the number of bags they must hand-search for weapons, said Peter Kant of Rapiscan Systems, a leading manufacturer of airport X-ray machines.

Kant said the TSA's request for upgraded X-rays "is the first time in a few years they've opened up their evaluation" of technology that screens carry-on bags.

Multiview X-rays are used in European airports to scan checked luggage and at courthouses, embassies and other buildings.

"The technology is ready now," said Thomas Ripp, president of L-3 Security and Detection Systems, which has developed a machine being considered by the TSA.

The upgraded X-rays are roughly the same size and weight as the machines used at U.S. airport checkpoints. A $400,000, high-grade bomb detector made by Analogic is nearly twice as wide and long and four times as heavy as L-3's upgraded X-ray, according to specifications from both companies.

Analogic CEO John Wood said his Cobra machine is so much faster it could replace two X-ray machines and save money by reducing the number of screeners. The automated Cobra sounds an alarm when explosives are found instead of requiring a screener to spot them on an X-ray screen.

We Don't Need Our Own MI5 (WP)

By William J. Bratton

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

On July 5, 2005, police in Torrance, Calif., a small city bordering Los Angeles, arrested two men leaving a gas station after a robbery. That kind of crime predates Bonnie and Clyde. The next day, Torrance detectives executed a search warrant on the apartment of one of the suspects in my city, Los Angeles. There they found documents that seemed to give clues to the planning of attacks on locations in Los Angeles.

Immediately, Torrance called in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force. FBI agents, detectives from the Los Angeles Police Department and the county sheriff's department, and a team of analysts began to go through the documents. According to the indictment, they uncovered plans to attack U.S. military facilities in Los Angeles County and places where Jews gather, from synagogues to the Israeli consulate.

It appeared there might be other suspects involved. We needed to move quickly and quietly. That night, my phone rang at 3 a.m. It was the LAPD command center notifying me that bombs were going off on London trains at the height of the city's rush hour. I knew we had to address security concerns for our own rush hour.

This is the world of a big-city police chief today. A terrorist plot in your own back yard, another unfolding half a world away. You need the agility to react to both, sometimes simultaneously.

In both cases, my efforts were linked seamlessly with the Los Angeles office of the FBI and its Joint Terrorism Task Force and Field Intelligence Group. This is the new normal.

DOJ_NMG_0082774

I have security clearances and identification that give me unfettered access to the FBI's offices here. I am briefed on classified operations and worldwide threats whether there is a connection to Los Angeles or not. The FBI understands the need for information-sharing.

Lately people have been calling on Washington to create a new domestic intelligence agency, without police powers -- like Britain's MI5 -- to take over from the FBI and be the lead in gathering and analyzing intelligence as it relates to terrorism. The argument goes that the "FBI culture" is that of a criminal investigative agency driven to make arrests and bring prosecutions and that the bureau does not have the instinct to draw back and look at the wider picture as a purely intelligence-driven agency might. I disagree.

Today, FBI intelligence analysts sit side by side with LAPD and sheriff's analysts in a Joint Regional Intelligence Center here. Our investigations are intelligence-driven. When we don't have enough information, we can gather intelligence for weeks, months or even years. When the intelligence tells us there is a threat to public safety, we can move in and make arrests.

A new agency that would gather intelligence and then go to law enforcement to take action would add an unnecessary step. If the problem before Sept. 11, 2001, was that the right hand didn't know what the left hand was doing, how would a third hand help?

America's police departments have achieved a higher level of synergy with the FBI on intelligence and investigations than at any other time in history. If it's not broken, let's not try to fix it. The writer has been police commissioner of Boston and New York City. He is currently the police chief of Los Angeles.

Many Ground Zero Workers Gain Chance At Lawsuits (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

A federal judge has rejected the city's claim that it is protected by law from being sued over the way it handled rescue and recovery operations at ground zero. The ruling opens the way for lawsuits by thousands of workers who say they were made sick by exposure to toxic substances during the 10-month cleanup.

Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of United States District Court in Manhattan rejected the city's motion to dismiss the lawsuits. In a 99-page decision released yesterday afternoon, he stated that state and federal statutes do provide some immunity for the city, its private contractors and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey for actions undertaken in response to an enemy attack. However, the judge said that protection is not universal and varies by time and place, making it necessary to hear the details of individual cases.

"The fact-intensive nature of the issue makes its resolution unsuitable for resolution by motion," Judge Hellerstein concluded. "Discovery, additional proceedings and a more extensive factual record, and perhaps a trial, will be required."

Michael A. Cardozo, the corporation counsel for the city, said in a statement that although the judge ruled that the legal case can proceed, he made it clear that the issue of immunity would be determined on a case-by-case basis.

"We believe that as the facts fully emerge, the complex decisions that were carefully and thoughtfully made during the months after 9/11 will demonstrate the enormous good work done by the city and its contractors, and the absence of any legal liabilities," Mr. Cardozo said.

David Worby, the lawyer who is leading the legal action on behalf of the workers, called the decision a clear victory for the firefighters, police officers and construction workers who say they became sick after responding to the Sept. 11 crisis.

"The bottom line of what the court is trying to say is that these are not the kind of decisions for these heroes that should be settled by summary judgments," Mr. Worby said. "They should have their day in court."

Mr. Worby said that when he spoke to some of his clients after the decision was released, they cried. "It all started with people telling them what they had was just a cough, and it's taken three years to prove that that was not true," he said.

In his decision, Judge Hellerstein outlined proceedings in which up to 3,000 ailing workers would have a chance to describe what happened to them; whom they were working for at the time they got sick; when they were at ground zero; and what protective gear was available to them while on the site.

In all, more than 8,000 workers have filed suit against the city and dozens of its contractors who worked on the cleanup of ground zero.

The other cases would be heard in subsequent proceedings.

While some of the cases could end up going to trial, the judge offered to appoint a special master, with the approval of the parties, who could engage in mediation and speed resolution of the claims.

"If even a minority of plaintiffs suffered serious injuries to their respiratory tracts arising from the acrid air of Sept. 11, their claims deserve to be heard when a recovery could make a difference to their lives," Judge Hellerstein wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0082775

James E. Tyrrell Jr., a lawyer with the Washington firm Patton Boggs who is leading the city's defense in this case, said the city was clearly disappointed that "the court is not in a position to conclude that either all or some substantial portion of actions taken can be treated as being covered by immunity at this time." While partly rejecting the immunity claims by the city and the Port Authority, Judge Hellerstein dismissed the charges against Con Edison and Silverstein Properties, which had been named as defendants because they held leases on ground zero property.

The judge ordered a conference to be held on Nov. 3 to consider the appointment of a special master and other issues.

The city's substantial legal costs are being covered by a special captive insurance company that was created when Congress established a $1 billion insurance fund in 2003.

WAR NEWS:

Commander: Mistakes Made In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, October 18, 2006

The U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan failed to follow through as it should have after ousting the Taliban government in 2001, setting the stage for this year's deadly resurgence, the NATO commander in the country said Tuesday.

The mistake consisted of adopting "a peacetime approach" too early, British Gen. David Richards told Pentagon reporters. He said the international community has six months to correct the problem before losing Afghan support, reiterating a warning he issued last week.

"The Taliban were defeated. ... And it looked all pretty hunky-dory," Richard said of the environment at the end of 2001. "We thought it was all done ... and didn't treat it as aggressively as ... with the benefit of hindsight, we should have done."

Progress on security, rebuilding and good government didn't meet Afghan expectations, and this year the "Taliban exploited ... this sense of frustration amongst the people," Richards said in a televised conference from Afghanistan.

While it is unusual for a commander to criticize an ongoing military operation, Richards' comments came days after another British officer offered a much harsher assessment of the other U.S.-led war, in Iraq.

Asked for comment on Richards' remarks, Defense Department spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said Afghanistan was and is one of the world's poorest nations.

"It will take years of hard work by the Afghan people and the international community to reverse the effects of decades of occupation and civil war," he said. "Nonetheless, there has been significant economic growth and donor efforts to improve living conditions across the country," including improved health care, school enrollment, roads and other projects.

Vician said U.S. resources put into Afghanistan have increased — 21,000 American troops are there now compared with 9,500 in March 2003. He said 81 percent of Afghans have access to health care compared with 8 percent in 2001; 2.5 million have benefited from irrigation and road projects linking farms to market; and 5 million students are in schools, 34 percent of them girls.

Insurgent bombings, ambushes and rocket attacks have surged this year. Since the Taliban was overthrown, many of Afghanistan's former rulers are thought to have found sanctuary across the border in Pakistan.

Five years later, NATO forces, along with Afghan army and police forces, plan a series of operations throughout the country this winter to do road building and other reconstruction projects in more secure areas and bolster security to prepare for reconstruction in less secure regions, Richards said.

Richards said that if there is not measurable improvement in six months, Afghans may choose "the rotten future offered by the Taliban" rather than the hopeful future that the coalition offered but didn't deliver.

"This is not just my view but that of many others," he said.

Bush administration critics have charged the Afghan campaign is lagging because the administration focused troops and other assets away from that country too quickly in order to plan and execute the invasion of Iraq, which they view as a diversion from the war on terror.

Just last week, Gen. Richard Dannatt, Britain's army chief, set off a political storm by calling for troops to be withdrawn "soon" from Iraq in part because their presence made the situation worse.

He later said he meant a phased withdrawal over two or three years.

Richards commands about 31,000 forces in Afghanistan. NATO early this month took command of 12,000 U.S. troops there, extending its security mission to all of Afghanistan.

The transfer of command gave NATO the biggest ground combat operation in its history, putting Richards in charge of the largest number of U.S. troops fighting under a foreign commander since World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0082776

In "a tough summer" of fighting, NATO forces beat back the Taliban in southwestern Kandahar province, a former Taliban stronghold. "I think we have now established the psychological ascendancy over the Taliban" militarily, Richards said.

"We have now — with the government and with the international community — to exploit the window of opportunity ... that we now have as a result of military success," he said.

Asked why he was sure a new effort can achieve what wasn't done before, Richards said:

"I'm optimistic that we have understood the issue ... learned our lessons, and now can take this forward aggressively to deliver on the promises."

British General Faults U.S. For Taliban Resurgence (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

The British commander of the allied forces in Afghanistan said yesterday that his U.S. predecessors moved too quickly from the 2001 invasion to a "peacetime approach," allowing the ousted Taliban to regroup and stage a counteroffensive this year in the southern provinces.

Gen. David Richards, whose NATO command this month took control of the 31,000 allied troops in Afghanistan, said that in 2001, "the Taliban were defeated, weren't they? You know, wonderful work by a lot of people, mainly American and Afghan, and it looked pretty hunky-dory."

But the general told reporters at the Pentagon that the Taliban was able to regroup because American forces remained somewhat isolated. The Afghan army was not established to the point that it could fill security roles in Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace, and other southern towns.

"The benefit of hindsight, you know, we thought it was all done, success was there and we could adopt a sort of peacetime approach to it and didn't treat it as aggressively as a problem," he said. "Your forces were doing a great work, but they were almost in isolation because the Afghan army and police weren't there to help at that stage."

He said there also was a "disconnect" in what the U.S.-led humanitarian and reconstruction effort could provide and what the Afghan people expected.

"The Taliban exploited it," Gen. Richards said. "They exploited this sense of frustration amongst the people who just didn't see all the good things that have been talked about."

Asked about Gen. Richard's remarks, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, told the Associated Press, "It will take years of hard work by the Afghan people and the international community to reverse the effects of decades of occupation and civil war. Nonetheless, there has been significant economic growth and donor efforts to improve living conditions across the country."

Gen. Richards said the new tactic has been to retake control of Taliban areas, move in reconstruction programs and maintain a security presence. He is giving the allies six months to start showing the Afghans that they can expect better services and security. If not, the alliance risks losing the populace to the insurgents.

"I think that's why I'm optimistic that we have understood the issue broader, the way I've just analyzed, learned our lessons and now can take this forward aggressively to deliver on the promise," said Gen. Richards, who led British troops in strife-torn Northern Ireland. "I will now construct a security operation that allows that work to start and then will ensure a continuing level of security, so that it can go on."

The allies seemed caught off guard this spring, when the Taliban began surprise attacks on southern Afghan towns.

The coalition eventually poured more troops into the south and mounted major air and ground operations, routing the Taliban, whose spokesman conceded they had to retreat.

"We had to fight and fight we have," Gen. Richards said. "There is no doubt anymore that NATO can fight if and when it's required to do so, and it inflicted the biggest single defeat on the Taliban that had occurred since 2001."

NATO's new tactics played out this week in the Musa Qala district of Helmand province. Allied forces left the area after weeks of bloody fighting. Security will be handled by tribal chiefs and Afghan forces, with NATO on an emergency recall status.

Gen. Richards commands a force that includes troops from Britain, the United States, Canada, the Netherlands and Denmark.

British Troops Withdraw From Afghan Area (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 17 (AP) — British troops pulled out of a once restive district in southern Afghanistan on Tuesday after reaching an agreement with tribal elders for Afghan forces to take over security.

DOJ_NMG_0082777

NATO also announced a new countrywide military operation with Afghan troops intended to maintain pressure on Taliban fighters during the fall and winter and pave the way for long-promised development after the most bitter fighting in five years.

Officials said on Tuesday that fighting across Afghanistan had killed 44 suspected Taliban militants.

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman in Kabul, said the decision to withdraw British soldiers from the Musa Qala district in Helmand Province followed an agreement with tribal elders and the provincial governor and was supported by President Hamid Karzai. "There has not been any contact with the Taliban, and they are not involved in this," Mr. Laity said.

He said the soldiers were leaving because there had not been a major clash in the district in 35 days. Musa Qala was an area where resurgent Taliban militants put up stiffer resistance than expected when about 4,000 British soldiers deployed to Helmand Province last spring.

US Presses Iraq On Amnesty Issue (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

The Bush administration is pressing the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki to issue a "broad" and "painful" amnesty for insurgents in spite of intense opposition to the proposal from politicians both in Iraq and the US, according to a senior administration official.

Amid growing anxiety in Washington over Iraq's escalating sectarian violence, the US is advocating more determined moves towards a national reconciliation with the Sunni community that dominates Iraq's insurgency. It also wants a tougher line on the Shia militias.

"You need the government to move forward with a programme – it should include an amnesty in a broad fashion, a comprehensive amnesty proposal," the senior US official, who asked not to be named, told the Financial Times. The official was not explicit about the terms of the proposed amnesty, but he said: "No successful amnesty is not painful or sweeping."

As the US grapples with reversing policy decisions made under the initial occupation authority of Paul Bremer, officials told the FT the Iraqi government should implement major changes in the strategy of weeding out former Ba'ath party members from Iraq's public administration.

The senior US official said this policy should go from a "broadly wielded to a very narrow focus on a very limited cadre of individuals."

US pressure on Baghdad to act swiftly has engendered a growing lack of confidence between Mr Maliki and the White House. This appears to have triggered a 15-minute telephone call to the Iraqi prime minister from President George W. Bush on Monday, a call designed to reassure the Iraqi leader that the US was not setting a deadline for his government to stand on its own feet.

The amnesty issue is divisive in both Iraq and the US, where the emotional question of how to honour American war dead – now at 2,750 – has become entangled in the debate over the merits of an early US withdrawal.

The White House has avoided giving explicit endorsement of a sweeping amnesty.

When Mr Maliki initially announced his reconciliation programme in June, members of the US Congress expressed outrage at his proposal to pardon insurgents who had killed US soldiers. Under a barrage of criticism, Mr Maliki backtracked.

However, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US envoy in Baghdad, has supported the concept of a broad amnesty. He said in July he would try to work with Iraqi leaders to "find the right balance between reconciliation and accountability" so that the US dead remained honoured.

Suggestions of an amnesty have also been opposed by Shia parties advocating tougher security measures against the insurgents. A conference to discuss the plan was recently postponed.

One senior Iraqi official said the amnesty would be discussed "at the right time" and that it would not, in any case, include anyone who had been incriminated in violence.

Another senior official insisted that an amnesty would have little impact. "It would be seen as a sign of weakness by the insurgents – that's the mentality here," he said.

Iraq Removes Leaders Of Special Police (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 17 — The Iraqi government removed the country's two most senior police commanders from their posts on Tuesday, in the first broad move against the top leadership of Iraq's unruly special police forces.

DOJ_NMG_0082778

The two generals had led Iraq's special police commandos and its public order brigade, both widely criticized as being heavily infiltrated by Shiite militias. Their removal comes at a crucial time for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has come under intense American pressure to purge Iraq's security forces of the militias and death squads that operate within their ranks.

Iraqi politicians, both Shiite and Sunni, have grown increasingly anxious in recent weeks that eroding public and Congressional support for the war in the United States might prompt a major shift in American policy, particularly if the November midterm elections bring gains for the Democrats.

Senior American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, have issued stark warnings to the Maliki government of growing American impatience, especially at the government's failure to stop the scourge of death squads operating with the knowledge or support of the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police.

For Mr. Maliki, these concerns have taken on a keen personal edge, exposed Monday when the White House revealed that Mr. Maliki asked President Bush in a telephone call whether there was any truth to rumors that the Americans had plans to replace him "if certain things don't happen within two months," in the words of Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Bush reassured Mr. Maliki of American support.

The American military also applied pressure to militia networks on Tuesday. Iraqi and American troops arrested a senior aide to Moktada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric. The aide, whom the military did not name but who was identified by a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, was arrested on suspicion of having directed kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunnis and Shiites, and of attacking Americans.

Mr. Maliki will also have to consider the criticisms of senior American military commanders who, in background briefings with American reporters in recent weeks, have spoken with exasperation about the government's failure to tackle issues that have exhausted public confidence among Iraqis — above all the virtual impunity with which Shiite and Sunni death squads allowed to operate.

The reordering of the police forces, beginning with the suspension of an entire Iraqi police brigade this month on suspicions that some members may have permitted or even participated in death squad killings, appeared to be one of the first serious attempts to address some of those American concerns.

The two generals, Rasheed Fleyah and Mahdi Sabeh, both Shiites, had been in their posts since the previous government, under which abuses by largely Shiite police forces began. Iraq's Sunnis deeply fear the police commandos that grew out of control soon after a coalition of Shiite parties came to power last year.

Mr. Maliki faces a nearly impossible task in weeding out the militias. Their influence runs deep in Iraqi society; they are present in the guard forces of Iraqi politicians, at the doors of mosques and even on college campuses. Iraqis of different sects and ethnicities do not trust one another after years of oppression under Saddam Hussein and militant violence since the American invasion.

The central question in the special police is who will replace the two men. An Interior Ministry spokesman, Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf, said a replacement has been chosen, but that his name could not be released until adequate security arrangements had been made for his family. His job — to command both branches of the special police that are set to be combined into one — will be one of the most dangerous in Iraq.

Iraq's interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, said Friday that he had already fired more than 3,000 employees, and that, with Mr. Maliki's approval, no one was too senior to be immune. It was not clear, however, how much more of a purge would be needed.

Another serious problem for American officials is Mr. Maliki's refusal to allow a major crackdown on Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army. This has been a long-smoldering issue for the Americans, who faced two uprisings by the Shiite militia in April and August 2004, only to have Mr. Sadr escape outright defeat when Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most powerful Shiite cleric in Iraq, intervened, allowing Mr. Sadr to keep large parts of his militia intact.

Since then, the militias have mushroomed, with some portions splintering off into criminal fiefdoms. American commanders have contended that the Mahdi Army will eventually have to be crushed if Iraq is to achieve lasting stability. But Mr. Sadr controls one of the largest blocs of seats in Parliament, so the Shiite-led governments of Mr. Maliki and his predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, have both depended on Mr. Sadr's political support and repeatedly resisted any showdown.

The arrest of Mr. Sadr's aide, which took place in the early hours of Tuesday, enraged Mr. Sadr's followers, who called for citywide demonstrations on Wednesday.

A spokesman for Mr. Sadr identified the man as Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, the head of Mr. Sadr's office in the poor Shiite neighborhood of Shuala. He denied the charges against the sheik, who was taken, according to the spokesman, while performing a Shiite ritual. The military said one other person was also arrested.

In the face of resistance by the Iraqi government, the American military has shifted to a campaign of attrition against the Sadr forces. There have been a series of raids in recent months similar to the one carried out in Shuala on Tuesday morning, each of them aimed at major figures in Mr. Sadr's network. American commanders have said that some of the targets have been rogue groups that have broken with the Mahdi Army, becoming little more than independent criminal gangs. But others, including the cleric arrested in Tuesday's raid, appear to have been important figures in Mr. Sadr's power structure.

DOJ_NMG_0082779

Reflecting the political sensitivities involved, the American forces, in announcing the raids, have studiously avoided any reference to Mr. Sadr or the Mahdi Army.

Mr. Maliki strongly criticized American forces on national television in August after a raid in Mr. Sadr's stronghold, a sprawling district of cinderblock houses and fluttering Shiite flags called Sadr City.

Mr. Sadr has denied that his militia is involved in criminal enterprise or sectarian killings, but it is impossible to tell just how implicated the senior leadership is. Some senior aides have gone into hiding.

Fresh evidence that Mr. Sadr's militia is at the forefront of the sectarian killings carried out by Shiites came this weekend, when armed men said by residents and local officials to be wearing black clothing, typical for Mahdi fighters, went on a rampage in Sunni areas north of Baghdad, killing 38 men, in reprisals for the beheading of 14 Shiite workers from the town of Balad.

While officials in Balad reported that local Shiites had carried out the killing, one Mahdi Army fighter in Baghdad said by telephone on Tuesday that reinforcements from the capital had gone to the area after Friday Prayer to help in the killing.

The fighter, who said his brother and uncle had participated, provided the following account of the violence. Fighters from Sadr City filled three transport trucks, and drove to the Shiite village of Dujail, not far from the location of the killings. They spent the night in a Shiite mosque, and after praying on Saturday morning, set off to a rural area called Door al-Senaa, where the Albu Heshmeh tribe, a hard-line Sunni Arab tribe, had settled.

The Mahdi Army member said fighters came from other areas as well, including Shuala, the district where the aide to Mr. Sadr was arrested, in an apparently unrelated incident. Some of the men dressed in Iraqi Army uniforms. Soldiers were also among them, he said.

The fighter's account could not be independently verified, but it was consistent with other chronologies of the violence provided by residents and local police and government officials. The fighter said one Shiite fighter had been killed and two wounded. He said Shiites attacked Sunni checkpoints in Door al-Senaa and on the outskirts of Balad.

On Tuesday, American and Iraqi forces continued to patrol the area, a military spokesman said. Amir Abdul Hadi, the mayor of Balad, said 17 mortars were fired into Balad's primarily Shiite center on Monday night. The American military put the total death toll for four days at more than 60. As of Tuesday morning, another 6 had been killed and 10 wounded in mortar attacks in Balad, the military said.

American forces have detained two Iraqi police officers believed to have been involved in the beheading of the Shiite workers from Balad, the military said.

Sunni residents of Balad said Shiites had come into their homes and forced them to leave. Ali Aziz, 35, said he had moved Friday to stay with relatives in Dhuluiya, a Sunni area across the river, and came back after the weekend to find his house burned.

The police restructuring will move Generals Fleyah and Sabeh to advisory roles in the ministry, General Khalaf said. The Associated Press reported that they were wearing suits instead of the military fatigues typical of the commando forces here at the time of the announcement.

Authorities found 30 bodies across Baghdad on Tuesday, an Interior Ministry official said.

U.S. Must Win War, McCain Says On Visit (MJS)

By Steve Schultze

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 18, 2006

Appleton - U.S. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Tuesday the United States should "accelerate as much as possible" the Iraqi government's assuming a lead role in the Iraq war and taking over many of the responsibilities handled by American soldiers.

But McCain strongly endorsed the continued U.S. role in the war and said he opposed setting any date for withdrawal of American forces.

"The consequences of failure in Iraq are catastrophic," McCain said during a campaign appearance for state Assembly Speaker John Gard of Peshtigo, the Republican candidate for the 8th Congressional District seat.

"We cannot lose it, and I believe we still have the capacity to win," said McCain, a leading Republican presidential prospect for 2008. McCain spoke at a rally and also at a private luncheon fund-raiser for Gard at the Copper Leaf Hotel.

Gard will continue to attract the attention of top-name Republicans. First lady Laura Bush is scheduled to appear at a fund-raiser for Gard next Tuesdayin De Pere.

McCain said the U.S. should not announce a withdrawal date in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0082780

McCain said he was impressed with Gard's record in the Legislature, where Gard has served for 19 years, the last three as Assembly speaker. McCain said he was unfamiliar with the views of Gard's Democratic opponent, Appleton physician Steve Kagen.

McCain repeated his support for immigration reform legislation that includes some means for illegal immigrants already in the U.S. to achieve citizenship - a stance at odds with Gard's strict "no amnesty" position on immigration. McCain cautioned, however, that the amnesty law approved 20 years ago didn't work.

He endorsed the idea of a guest worker program in which non-citizen immigrants could be in the U.S. legally for jobs.

Kagen held a news conference across the street from the Gard-McCain event in which he accused Gard of hypocrisy for using McCain to campaign for him, saying McCain's view on immigration is at odds with Gard's.

Kerry: Bush Assurances On Iraq A Blunder (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, October 18, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry said Tuesday that President Bush committed "a gigantic blunder" by giving top Iraqi officials assurances that U.S. forces would remain indefinitely in the war-torn country.

Kerry argued that his 2004 rival should have pressured Iraqi leaders to set aside their differences and focus on making progress in assuming responsibility for security, a move that could lead to a reduction in U.S. troop levels.

"The absence of pressure I find is an enormous blunder that gives the Iraqi politicians a free pass to continue the status quo that most Americans understand is a failure, that's not working," Kerry said. "I'm amazed by it."

Kerry is a possible 2008 presidential candidate. He spoke to reporters after appearing at a campaign event with Iowa gubernatorial candidate Chet Culver.

The Massachusetts senator was responding to Bush's 15-minute telephone conversation Monday with the Iraqi prime minister. Bush called Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to quell rumors that the United States planned to set a deadline for Iraqis to assume security responsibilities. In his conversation, Bush said there was no deadline and that American troops would remain as long as they were needed.

Bush's comments can be compared to his "bring it on" challenge to terrorists, Kerry said.

"I think the president committed a gigantic blunder of the proportion of 'Bring it on,' " said Kerry. "When he has a conversation with the prime minister of Iraq and he climbs out and he says that he told him he doesn't have to worry, we're going to be there as long as it take, you've given a message that they can take as long as they want."

Kerry said even Republicans such as Sens. John Warner and Chuck Hagel are calling for a new strategy in Iraq, and Bush needs to get that message.

Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said Kerry's comments "proves he will say and do anything to try to recapture his 15 minutes of fame."

"While President Bush and prime minister al-Maliki are committed to beating the terrorists in Iraq, John Kerry is devoted to convincing Iowans that he is somehow more capable of defending America this time around," Diaz said.

Troops Try To Curb Warfare North Of Baghdad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

Openly sectarian attacks, targeting scores of people in killings and kidnappings, draw attention to the divided area around Balad.

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops sought to restore order Tuesday to a lush farming district north of the capital where more than 100 Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims have disappeared or been brutally killed in sectarian fighting in recent days.

Thirteen carloads of Shiites from the town of Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, were reported Tuesday to have been kidnapped the previous night. Their fate was unknown.

U.S. military officials tallied at least 63 killed in fighting between Shiite and Sunni villagers around Balad since Saturday. Witnesses and police gave higher estimates of fatalities. The violence has been notable for its character of open warfare and its overtly sectarian targeting.

In addition to the Iraqi dead, four U.S. soldiers were killed Tuesday morning when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, disclosing no further details. At least 63 U.S. soldiers have been killed in Iraq this month.

DOJ_NMG_0082781

In Balad, the sectarian fighting first broke out Friday, when at least 19 Shiites were kidnapped and beheaded. The next day, Shiite militiamen abducted and executed dozens of Sunni residents, occasionally pulling people from their cars and setting fire to their bodies. Sunnis then began firing rockets into the mostly Shiite town, killing at least half a dozen people.

Men in police uniforms seized unused Iraqi police checkpoints near Balad on Monday and Tuesday night, according to witnesses and security officials.

Witnesses also reported that large groups of men — identified by locals as Sunni Arab insurgents — carrying AK-47s were flooding Sunni Arab areas east of Balad, positioning rocket launchers and mortars in the villages outside the town. The men demanded identification from passing drivers.

"They stopped us," one Shiite resident of the area said by telephone. "They asked me, 'Are you Sunni or Shiite?' I told them I'm a member of the [Sunni] Mashadani tribe, and showed them a fake identification card."

Four mortar rounds landed in Balad on Monday night and early Tuesday, killing one person and injuring four, a hospital official said.

The provincial governor called Tuesday for an immediate tribal summit. Security forces also sealed off the nearby Shiite town of Dujayl in an effort to prevent a similar outbreak.

U.S. forces began providing assistance to Iraqi military units at the request of Iraqi civic and military leaders.

"We continue to conduct our normal patrols in the city and provide support for Iraqi security forces as they lead operations in stopping the sectarian violence in Balad," said Army Lt. Col. Jeff Martindale, commander of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division. "We are also providing counter-fire support against terrorists conducting indirect fire attacks against innocent civilians in Balad.

"By coordinating all of our efforts, we have seen a marked decrease in violence in the past 24 hours," Martindale said.

Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and once-dominant Sunni Arabs have been locked in civil conflict across Iraq for months. Hundreds of corpses are found scattered throughout religiously mixed central provinces each week.

At least 50 Iraqis were killed and 44 injured in violence around the country Tuesday.

Balad and Dujayl are particularly vulnerable to sectarian strife. The Shiite towns, with strong ties to clerics in southern Iraq and in Iran, lie in the middle of a heavily Sunni Arab area sympathetic to the insurgency.

The Shiites' vulnerability gives the militias popular support, and the government's weakness gives the latter free rein.

The Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has been unable to tame the violence or the Shiite militia groups that answer to powerful parties in his coalition.

Under pressure from U.S. officials and Iraqi politicians to show changes in a police force widely believed to be infiltrated by the militiamen, Iraq's interior minister has reshuffled a pair of key positions under his control, a spokesman said Tuesday.

Mehdi Ghrawi and Rasheed Fleih, both generals commanding specialized police units in the field, have been reassigned as "part of a routine restructuring process," Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem Khalaf told reporters. Under the restructuring plan, the two generals' posts will be combined and given to one as-yet-unnamed commander.

Khalaf insisted that neither man was implicated in death squad activity. He said Fleih will take over a post in the branch's intelligence division while Ghrawi will become deputy police chief for the capital.

Amid rumors here that the U.S. might back a change in the government of Iraq, former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, a favorite of U.S. Embassy officials, returned this week to Iraq, where he rarely appears though he heads a 25-seat parliamentary bloc.

"His presence is important during this period because the country is passing a crucial stage, during which all leaders of political movements and the politicians must be present in the country," said Wael Abdul Latif, a member of Allawi's coalition.

Modest efforts to diminish the power of radical militias and their political allies often spark civil disturbances or violence. Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's followers called for a massive demonstration in northern Baghdad today to protest the arrest of a leader of their movement.

*

daragahi@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Raheem Salman in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baghdad, Dujayl and the Iraqi cities of Mosul, Basra, Samarra and Tikrit contributed to this report.

U.S. Forces In Balad To Help Stem Carnage (USAT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

USA Today, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082782

BAGHDAD — U.S. forces were patrolling the streets of the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday after five days of sectarian violence killed 95 people.

Iraq's 4th Army, which took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, had been unable to stem recent bloodshed in Balad. The slayings of 17 Shiite Muslim workers there Friday set off revenge killings of Sunnis by Shiites.

Minority Sunni Arabs in the city of 80,000 have been fleeing across the Tigris River in small boats, Balad police commander Brig. Nebil al-Beldawi said.

He said gunmen wearing black uniforms — trademark clothing of Shiite militiamen — had clashed with residents of Duluiyah, a predominantly Sunni city on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite Balad. Al-Beldawi said the fighters were keeping food and fuel trucks from entering Duluiyah.

Forty mortar rounds hit Balad overnight and into the morning Tuesday, killing at least four people. The death toll in the area reached at least 95 in five days of fighting, police said.

The conflict between Shiites and Sunnis in the Balad area illustrates the threat to the region if Iraq moves toward dividing into three federal states — Shiites in the south, Sunnis in the center and Kurds in the north. Iraq's oil wealth is concentrated in the north and south.

Regions such as Baghdad and areas immediately to the north, including Balad, are now home to Shiites and Sunnis. Both groups would be expected to fight hard to maintain control of their territory, especially in the capital.

Last week the Shiite-dominated parliament voted to allow moves toward establishing federal states after an 18-month waiting period, despite the objection of nearly all of the Sunni and some Shiite lawmakers.

Iraqi officials, particularly Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, are under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and for violence elsewhere.

The Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week. There is concern that the Shiite-dominated police and security forces have been infiltrated by fighters, who are allied to Shiite political groups.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal had anything to do with militia activity. “Because of their sacrifices and their experience, both of these leaders were named to high-ranking posts,” Khalaf said, flanked by Filah and Sabbih.

The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence. It said 600 of the 3,000 dismissed personnel will face prosecution.

U.S. Forces Move To Quell Sectarian Violence In Balad (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. military has sent troops to the Iraqi city of Balad and the surrounding area to help re-establish order after Iraqi troops and police were unable to quell a surge of violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims over the weekend that left at least 57 people dead.

Confirmation that American troops have been sent back to Balad came as Iraq's bloodletting continued. At least 700 Iraqis have been killed so far this month nationwide, according to numbers provided by police in Iraq's largest provinces. In addition, 58 U.S. soldiers have died so far this month, a trend that if it continues will make October one of the deadliest months for Americans since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

The decision to send American troops into Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, was another setback for U.S. hopes that Iraqi forces will be able to take control of security for the country. Violence has increased steadily throughout Iraq despite an increase of tens of thousands of American-trained Iraqi soldiers and police, and U.S. officials concede that their strategy of training Iraqi troops to replace Americans hasn't worked.

U.S. authorities had turned over responsibility for Balad's security to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 4th Iraqi Army Division, in April.

American forces began returning to the city Saturday and are patrolling there, though it was unclear Tuesday whether Balad and the surrounding area have been pacified.

U.S. Lt. Col. Jeffrey Martindale, the commander of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division, said in a statement released Tuesday that his troops were patrolling alongside Iraqis in Balad. "By coordinating all of our efforts, we have seen a marked decrease in violence in the past 24 hours," the statement quoted Martindale as saying.

Residents, however, said that Balad and the nearby town of al Dulyiyah remained under the control of armed groups that had targeted the residents and may have killed as many as 100 in four days of violence.

DOJ_NMG_0082783

The violence in Balad and al Dulyiyah underscores how explosive the rivalry between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities has become and how ineffective Iraqi security forces often are. Residents said some Iraqi police officers had contributed to the slaughter.

Balad is populated primarily by Shiites. Sunnis, however, are the dominant sect in the province, Salah al Din, whose capital, Tikrit, is the birthplace of Saddam Hussein. Samarra, where an explosion Feb. 22 devastated the sacred Shiite Askariya shrine, is in Salah al Din. The shrine bombing touched off Iraq's current sectarian bloodletting.

Accounts of what took place over the weekend vary, with residents, Iraqi police and American officials giving differing numbers of dead.

U.S. officials say the violence began last Friday when gunmen kidnapped at least 19 Shiites in Balad and murdered them. On Saturday, according to the American account, gunmen seized 38 people in the Sunni town of al Dulyiyah, exactly double the number of Shiites killed the day earlier. Their bodies later were dumped in Balad.

Two U.S. military officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak on the subject, tied Friday's kidnappings and murders to the trial of Saddam Hussein on charges that he ordered the killings of 148 Shiite residents of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982. Dujail and Balad have Salah al Din's only significant concentrations of Shiites.

What happened after Saturday's kidnappings and murders is unclear. Residents say that as many as 100 Sunnis were killed around Balad as Shiite militias took control of the region. American officials said they couldn't confirm that figure.

Residents said Shiite police commanders were involved in some of the killings and that U.S. forces, several thousand of whom are based at nearby Camp Anaconda, made no effort to stop the bloodshed.

So far, American and Iraqi forces have detained two Iraqi police officers allegedly involved in the killings of the Sunnis from al Dulyiyah, Martindale said.

Tense Reprieve As Iraqi Forces Seal River Town (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 17 -- Police and black-clad Shiite militiamen toting machine guns sealed off the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday, guarding against attacks by Sunni insurgents flooding into towns just north of Baghdad, vowing revenge for four days of violence in which dozens of Sunnis were killed.

Calm largely returned to Balad by Tuesday, with Iraqi army troops forcing Shiite militia fighters out of police cars that the militiamen had commandeered for the attacks, said residents reached by telephone in the cut-off town. American troops patrolled the city and guarded one end of a Tigris River bridge that links Balad with Duluiyah, a Sunni farm town also at the epicenter of the outburst of sectarian conflict.

On the Duluiyah end of the bridge, angry Sunni insurgents gathered in force, clutching their PKC machine guns and rocket launchers, standing their tense watch. Abu Achmed, a fighter in the Islamic Army, a Sunni insurgent movement, held a machine gun but wished for more.

"If I had a nuclear bomb, I would wipe it out," the insurgent fighter, who refused to give his full name, said as he stared at Balad across the bridge. "I would level it."

Since Friday, a Shiite militia campaign of killing and expulsion targeting Sunni families served both to deepen sectarian tensions in Iraq and expose the inability or unwillingness of the Shiite-dominated government to control the attacks. The government is headed by two Shiite religious parties whose militias led the campaign, according to local residents, Shiite community leaders, police and hospital officials. Forces of the country's heavily Shiite police forces watched the cleansing campaign, or took part in it, the witnesses said. The Interior Ministry denied the allegation.

Militia attacks on Sunnis in and around Balad ended only when large numbers of Iraqi army troops, seen as more neutral than Iraq's police, were deployed. By Tuesday, all but four or five Sunni families had fled. Until recently, members of the town's Sunni minority had lived and intermarried peacefully with Shiite neighbors for generations.

"What shall I say to Bush, to the armed men, to Maliki?" cried Um Mustafa, sheltering in a stranger's home on the outskirts of Duluiyah, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. She was with her 11-year-old son, Mustafa, and 7-year-old daughter, Reaam. Fleeing Balad this past weekend, the family had watched Shiite militiamen dressed in black beat her pleading husband in the face with rifle butts and take him away. The next day, her phone calls traced her husband's body to the Balad hospital morgue.

"What have I done that my husband gets killed in this way?" she said. "I have Mustafa. And I will teach him how to avenge his father's death by the Mahdi Army, and take his revenge, from them."

DOJ_NMG_0082784

In Balad, mosque loudspeakers that days earlier had cried out for all Sunnis to leave called for their return, promising that the Mahdi Army militia of powerful Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr would protect them.

Drawing on centuries-old codes of revenge, the Sunni fighters in Duluiyah responded by demanding that Balad, encircled by Sunni towns, surrender the militia fighters responsible for the killings -- or face retaliation.

Armed men stopped 13 vehicles near a police checkpoint south of Balad on Monday night and took them and their occupants away to an area known to be a Sunni insurgent dumping ground for murder victims, provincial police said.

The sectarian bloodletting was triggered Friday in Duluiyah when Sunni insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite farmworkers. Balad hospital officials said at least 80 Sunnis were shot to death, many after torture with electric drills. The U.S. military said it had recorded 57 killings. In a statement Tuesday, it said six civilians in Balad had been killed by mortar rounds that were launched, residents said, from Duluiyah. U.S. forces had arrested two Duluiyah policemen suspected of working with insurgents in the killing of the 17 farmworkers, the military said.

The military statement, issued Tuesday morning, cited a "marked decrease in violence" in Balad over the past 24 hours and credited joint operations by Iraqi and U.S. forces for the reprieve.

In attacks elsewhere in Iraq, the Interior Ministry said at least 65 bodies had been found around Baghdad since Sunday night. Bombs and other shootings killed at least 20 other people, including four college students and a female doctor shot to death in the southern city of Basra.

A report released Tuesday by the Brookings Institution-University of Bern Project on Internal Displacement cited Iraqi government data that 234,600 Iraqis were displaced since February, when the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra triggered a wave of violence, especially by Shiite forces. The total was probably low, since many of the displaced had likely sheltered with families, the study said.

"It is likely that sectarian violence is causing lasting change to Iraq's social and demographic make-up," the report stated.

On trial for his life on genocide charges, deposed president Saddam Hussein spoke to the rising violence outside his heavily guarded courtroom in Baghdad's Green Zone. "We are one people, as Iraqis, we have Arabs and Kurds," Hussein said, holding a Koran he has kept at his side throughout his trial. "The only party that benefits from division is Zionism."

Shiite militia leaders say Hussein's decades of ruthless Sunni minority rule paved the way for the sectarian slaughter exploding now. Asked about Iraq's bloodshed, a top Shiite political leader, Abdul Aziz Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, made the same argument.

"The reason is obvious, a great change in Iraq has taken place," he said. "The people who were governing Iraq were unjust. Such people are gone, and I hope for good."

Aldin reported from Duluiyah and from outside Balad.

U.S. Forces Patrol Balad After Violence (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 18, 2006

U.S. forces were back patrolling the streets of the predominantly Shiite city of Balad on Tuesday after five days of sectarian slaughter killed 95 people, violence that surged out of control despite the efforts of Iraq's best-trained soldiers.

Iraq's 4th Army took command of the region north of Baghdad a month ago, but had been unable to stem recent attacks in Balad, where the slayings of 17 Shiite Muslim workers on Friday set off revenge killings by Shiites.

Minority Sunnis, who absorbed most of the brutality in the city of 80,000 people, have been fleeing across the Tigris River in small boats, Balad police commander Brig. Nebil al-Beldawi said. On the outskirts of the city, two fuel trucks were attacked and burned.

The police commander said gunmen wearing black uniforms, trademark clothing of Shiite militiamen, had clashed with residents of Duluiyah, a predominantly Sunni city on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite Balad. Al-Beldawi said the militants were keeping food and fuel trucks from entering Duluiyah.

The conflict between Shiites and Sunnis in the Balad area illustrates the threat to the region should Iraq move toward dividing into three federal states — controlled by Shiites in the south, Sunnis in the center and Kurds in the north.

Regions such as Baghdad and areas immediately to the north, including Balad, are now home to Shiites and Sunnis. Both groups would be expected to fight hard to maintain control of their territory, especially in the capital.

Last week, over the objection of nearly all Sunnis and some Shiites, the Shiite-dominated parliament voted to allow moves toward establishing federal states after an 18-month waiting period.

Dividing the country would close Sunnis off from oil wealth, which would end up with the Kurds in the north and the Shiites in the south. Sunni lands are largely desert or agricultural belts along the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

DOJ_NMG_0082785

Forty mortar rounds poured into Balad overnight and into the morning, killing at least four people, bringing the death toll in the area to at least 95 in five days of fighting.

Gunmen in police uniforms hijacked 13 civilian cars and abducted their occupants at a checkpoint outside Balad on Monday night, Salahuddin provincial police reported. They remained missing Tuesday.

Elsewhere in Iraq, 36 people were killed Tuesday in violent attacks and 16 more corpses were found in the capital, their hands and legs bound and showing signs of torture, police reported.

According to an Associated Press count, October is on track to be the deadliest month for Iraqis since the AP began tracking deaths in April 2005. In October, 767 Iraqis have been killed in war-related violence, an average of 45 every day.

That compares to an average daily death toll of about 27 since April 2005. The AP count includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

Iraqi officials, particularly Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, are under intense pressure to disband Shiite militias believed responsible for most of the killings in Balad and heavy involvement in violence elsewhere.

The fighters, allied to Shiite political groups, are widely believed to have infiltrated the Shiite-dominated police and security forces and to be allowed freedom to attack Sunni Muslims without fear of arrest or interference.

In apparent response to that pressure, the Interior Ministry, which runs the Iraqi police, removed two officers in charge of commando units as part of a restructuring plan announced last week.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the ministry's spokesman, said Maj. Gen. Rashid Filah and Maj. Gen. Mahdi Sabbih were transferred from their posts, but denied their removal was a demotion or had anything to do with militia activity.

"Because of their sacrifices and their experience, both of these leaders were named to high-ranking posts," Khalaf said, flanked by Filah and Sabbih.

The ministry said last week it had fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and that it intended to change top commanders as part of a restructuring plan designed to bolster its ability to combat violence. It said 600 of the 3,000 dismissed personnel will face prosecution.

The U.S. military symbolically handed control of parts of Salahuddin province to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 4th Iraqi Army Division on April 15. That region included Balad and Duluiyah, as well as surrounding villages. Full control of the province was officially turned over to the 4th Army on Sept. 18.

Under such shifts of control, U.S. forces do not necessarily withdraw, but are deployed to local bases to stand by as backup. Since the latest security crackdown in Baghdad, however, U.S. forces from many regions have shifted to the capital, causing a drawdown of American troop strength in some regions of the country.

On Sept. 7, the U.S. military handed over control of Iraq's armed forces command to al-Maliki's government. Previously, the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, commanded by Gen. George Casey, gave orders to the Iraqi armed forces through a joint American-Iraqi headquarters and chain of command. Senior U.S. and coalition officers controlled larger units, which were in turn commanded by Iraqi officers.

Now, the chain of command flows directly from al-Maliki in his role as Iraqi commander in chief, through the Defense Ministry to an Iraqi military headquarters. From there, the orders flow to Iraqi units on the ground.

As the violence in the Balad region was reaching full pitch on Saturday, the AP asked the U.S. military in Baghdad if American forces were involved in trying to quell the killing.

"As of this time, the (U.S.-led force in Iraq) has not been asked to provide any assistance," the military said in a return e-mail. A request for information on Sunday went unanswered.

In response to the same question on Monday, the military responded that U.S.-led forces were "partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad."

On Tuesday morning, the military said the U.S.-led force was again "partnering with and assisting the Iraqi police and army by providing quick reaction assets. The Iraqi police and army are currently manning numerous checkpoints around Balad."

By late Tuesday, the military had not responded to questions about when the U.S. military first was asked to intervene and how many American forces were involved.

Training Regimen Problems Afflict U.S. Army Program To Advise Iraqis (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

One of the biggest shocks for Lt. Col. Nick Demas and his troops came before they even deployed to Iraq.

The colonel's soldiers, most of them inexperienced reservists from Maryland, had been tapped to serve as advisers to the Iraqi army. Their job was to live with, train and mentor an Iraqi force buffeted by poor morale, desertions and corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0082786

President Bush has touted such advisory teams as key to the U.S. strategy for stabilizing Iraq and bringing American troops home. So Col. Demas and his troops expected some of the best instruction the Army had to offer. What they got was a "phenomenal waste of time," the colonel wrote from Iraq last fall, in a report to his superiors.

"In my 28 years of military service I have never seen such an appalling approach to training," he wrote. "Nowhere else in the Army system would this have been acceptable." His soldiers received only a few hours of instruction in Arabic language, Iraqi culture and advising foreign forces, says Col. Demas, who had previously served in Special Forces units. (Read Col. Demas's after-action report.1)

Other advisers have been just as scathing. "By the time the training was finished, soldiers were demoralized, motivation was nonexistent and the team motto came from the Jo Dee Messina lyric, 'my give-a-damn's busted,' " wrote Lt. Col. James Goodwillie, who led advisers in Iraq, in a review that was passed to senior Army officials last fall. (Read Lt. Goodwillie's after-action report.2)

Senior U.S. military officers in Iraq and the Pentagon say their primary focus is getting Iraqi forces to take over more of the fighting as quickly as possible so U.S. forces can pull back. The 10- to 12-man advisory teams are central to that effort.

In recent weeks, Army officials overseeing the advisory program have begun to acknowledge the gap between the Army's words and deeds. This summer, after two years of biting reviews, the Army rushed to revamp the training advisers receive. It also has begun to assign more experienced troops to advisory teams. "I think we are going to be doing it much, much better than what you have seen in the past," says Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff.

Internal Army reviews and interviews with dozens of advisers show that, thus far, the Army hasn't treated the advisory program as a priority. The job has often fallen to the military's less seasoned second team: reservists, guardsmen and retirees called back to active duty. A 48-page Army study, finished in May and marked "For Official Use Only," concluded that 10- to 12-man advisory teams are too small and "do not have the experience to advise in the various areas they are assigned."

The teams have had to scrounge for equipment that is routinely allocated to big combat units. Advisers going through training today are warned in a PowerPoint briefing: "You will not have all the radios, weapons, night vision devices and field gear issued to a U.S. battalion."

To date, the U.S. has trained and equipped about 307,800 Iraqi army and police forces, up from 196,600 a year ago. But three years into the war, these Iraqi forces don't seem to be improving fast enough to curb surging violence. Daily attacks in Iraq have risen to record levels, and attrition among Iraqi forces remains high. In areas like the restive al Anbar Province, Iraqi units have, on average, only 55% of the soldiers they are supposed to, senior U.S. military officials say.

Other factors, of course, are also contributing to the violence. Centuries-old sectarian grudges and political turmoil are feeding unrest. Both must be addressed through some form of reconciliation, military officials say.

For many advisers, the growing turmoil has been frustrating. "I know we've made a difference. But the insurgency has also become better, more lethal and more capable in my time here," wrote Capt. Phillip Carter, who advised Iraqi police, in an email last month as he prepared to return home. "In theory things should get better with the development of capable Iraqi Army and police units. That's not happening."

To oversee the new training for advisers, the Army recently tapped one of its 10 combat divisions, the 1st Infantry Division, which had been scheduled to return to Iraq. Instead, its top officers and senior enlisted soldiers will remain at Fort Riley, Kan., to train advisers. When rebuilding the training program, the service started with a "blank piece of paper," says Brig. Gen. James Yarbrough, the division's assistant commander.

Top Army officials also are trying to change a culture that discourages good officers from taking advisory posts. Over the past decade, the path to success has been through conventional combat jobs in big brigades. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's top officer, uses a track analogy to describe the problem. The Army, he says, is full of specialists, or "single-event people." To prevail in today's wars, he says, he needs "pentathletes" with a broader range of experiences.

Last month Gen. Schoomaker's vice chief of staff stressed in a memo to Army officers that serving on an advisory team was "the Army's No. 1 personnel priority" and was exactly the kind of broadening experience the Army chief had been touting.

To fix the advisory program, some military officials say sweeping institutional change is needed. "When there is a limited pool of people for both kinds of jobs -- combat and advisory -- it's clear where the best people will go," says Dale Andrade, a counterinsurgency specialist at the Army's Center of Military History. "The military will always keep its best and brightest in traditionally important combat jobs. Only when forced will this change."

One option under consideration is to double the number of advisers to about 7,000, from about 3,500, by tearing apart some traditional combat brigades and assigning officers and senior soldiers to advisory teams. That would ensure that some of the Army's best officers would take advisory jobs. It would also allow Army officials to double the size of the teams -- which the officials say are too small -- to about 20 troops each.

DOJ_NMG_0082787

But doing so would require a change in mind-set for the Army, where training centers and personnel systems are built almost entirely around the 4,000-soldier brigades. It would also be risky. As the number of big U.S. combat brigades decreased, Iraqi units and their advisers would have to pick up the security slack.

The military has recently built a model advisory program -- on a much smaller scale -- for use in other parts of the world. In 2005, the Marine Corps formed a new "Foreign Military Training Unit" to train and mentor troops in places like Chad, Tunisia and the Republic of Georgia. Marines must compete for a spot in the unit. Those who are selected go through six months of intensive training in language, culture and advising foreign forces. Many follow up with two-month cultural immersion tours in places like Morocco.

"We are taking a long-term approach. We want the same people going back to the same places, building relationships and rapport," says Col. Michael Peznola, who heads the unit.

Starting From Scratch

In Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps have had to build a much larger program from scratch -- and in a hurry. When the war kicked off in 2003, U.S. officials had no inkling that an advisory program would be necessary. The last time the Army oversaw such a big effort was in Vietnam, and Iraq wasn't supposed to be anything like that war.

After Iraqi police and army forces cratered under insurgent attacks in the spring of 2004, the U.S. military began rushing advisory teams to Iraq. Their mission was to train Iraqi commanders, to track the development of Iraqi units and to try to prevent them from settling sectarian scores. If Iraqi forces were overwhelmed, the advisers were authorized to call in U.S. firepower to bail the Iraqis out.

To fill some advisory teams, senior commanders asked big combat brigades to give up some soldiers. Often the units gave up troops of a lower rank and experience level than desired, senior Army officials say. The brigades "had a requirement, but they often treated it like guidance and staffed it the best way they could," says Col. Sean Ryan, who served in Iraq with the command that oversaw development of the Iraqi army.

The Army also mobilized reservists for the mission, many of them part-time drill sergeants who had little experience in combat units. "They knew how to teach guys to march, dig fighting positions and fire weapons," says Col. Demas, who in 2006 led an advisory team of the reserve soldiers from Maryland.

The training was minimal. A class on how to oversee a large battalion and brigade staff, for example, consisted of a 90-minute lecture after dinner. Midway through, one sergeant, who hadn't ever served in a combat unit, broke in and complained: "I have absolutely no idea of anything you're talking about," wrote Col. Goodwillie, a senior adviser, in his review of the session.

Officers received only four hours of training on language and culture, and enlisted soldiers got two, according to soldiers who attended. To complete their training, advisers were instructed to guard mock ammunition dumps and to set up checkpoints to screen traffic for 12 days. Once they got to Iraq, advisers say, they never did anything like that.

Col. Demas says his team's primary duty in Iraq was to mentor the staff of a 600-man Iraqi battalion, teaching them to plan missions and analyze intelligence. But once the Iraqi battalion moved into heavy fighting north of Baghdad, the seven enlisted advisers on Col. Demas's 10-man team didn't have the experience to advise the Iraqi officers, the colonel says. Those seven Americans had never served on a U.S. battalion staff and lacked combat experience.

"They were superb soldiers -- dedicated and hard working. They could teach basic soldier skills, but not leader tasks," Col. Demas says. That job fell to Col. Demas and the two officers on his team.

Advisory teams elsewhere in Iraq spent much of their time worrying about even more basic problems, such as trying to get critical supplies for themselves and their Iraqi troops. The small teams are reliant on the big U.S. units for help fixing their Humvees and electrical generators. At Camp Taji, near Baghdad, Staff Sgt. Clyde Daly persuaded a friend to give him 15,000 bottles of Gatorade, which he kept in a locked supply room on the Iraqi side of the base. He traded cases of the drink to other U.S. units for supplies, favors, and help fixing equipment.

Master Sgt. Darren Williams, who served on a team in Diyala Province, says: "We had to beg for support. It was like pulling teeth."

Getting the Iraqis what they needed was even harder. "We'd spend more time working to keep the Iraqis fed and fueled than we would war-fighting," says Col. Jeff Lamb, who returned in July from advisory duty in Diyala Province. It took two weeks to persuade the Ministry of Defense to fire a corrupt food contractor that was serving spoiled food to the Iraqis, says Lt. Jason Karluk, who worked for Col. Lamb. He says it took him 60 days to get the Iraqis decent tents.

The harsh conditions and lack of supplies led to desertions. By the time Lt. Karluk left Iraq, the unit he was advising had shrunk to about 400 soldiers from 700, and the brigade had gone to about 1,600 from 2,400. His team's biggest accomplishment, says the 24-year-old officer, was simply "holding the [Iraqi] unit together."

Amid a barrage of criticism, the Army has begun to beef up training of advisory teams, adding about 50 hours of language and cultural instruction. Commanders say the cultural instruction, although much improved, still has a ways to go. "I'd grade ourselves at a C," says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, who recently began overseeing the advisory training effort at Fort Riley. "What we are doing is OK. It is Iraqi culture 101." He says he plans to tailor more of the instruction to the areas of Iraq where advisers will be working.

DOJ_NMG_0082788

Shortage of Role Players

Training exercises have been hindered by a shortage of Iraqi role players. At its major training centers, the Army brings in 250 Arabic speakers to play townspeople, mayors and police chiefs in mock Iraqi villages. At Fort Riley, there were only about a dozen Arab-speaking role players last month, so American troops had to play Iraqi commanders and rank-and-file soldiers.

In early September, Lt. Col. Matthew Stanton led his 10-man advisory team through an exercise intended to teach them to advise Iraqi commanders as their troops search a small, hostile village for weapons and insurgents. When Col. Stanton and an "Iraqi commander" played by a reservist from Utah strode into the mock village, they were accosted by an Iraqi acting as the mayor. "We are sick of the Americans bringing Iraqis to search our villages," he screamed in Arabic. An Iraqi translated for the colonel.

Two dozen villagers began to chant angrily. The mayor demanded that Col. Stanton call off the search. "You'll have to discuss this with the Iraqi commander," Col. Stanton replied. Then he began to walk away.

The Iraqi mayor exploded in anger. "Where are you going?" he screamed in Arabic. "I am talking to you!"

Afterward, the senior sergeant overseeing the exercise praised the team. But Col. Stanton and his men were less than satisfied. "I don't feel like we accomplished anything," said Maj. Eric Lindsay, the No. 3 officer on the team. Everyone nodded.

Over the next two days, Col. Stanton kept thinking back to his run-in with the Iraqi mayor. Finally, he tracked the man down in the barracks where he was living with other role players. The 47-year-old Iraqi, a Shiite Muslim who had left Baghdad in 2004, was dressed in a white mesh tank top, black shorts and sandals. A tattoo of a dagger, surrounded by Arabic script, adorned his arm.

"Why did you refuse to talk to me when the soldiers were searching my village?" the Iraqi asked. Col. Stanton explained that he was just an adviser, not the commander of the Iraqi forces. The Iraqi told him that it didn't matter. He said the colonel should have taken him by the hand and led him to the Iraqi officer he was advising. "I could have calmed down the entire village," the mayor told him. Col. Stanton scribbled notes in a green field notebook.

"We have been really thirsty for more instruction on how to be an adviser," Col. Stanton said afterward.

There is debate within the Pentagon over whether the advisory teams are too small to be effective. In May, the Center for Army Lessons Learned, based at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., recommended doubling the size of advisory teams to about 25 troops. The Army is built like a pyramid, with large numbers of inexperienced soldiers at the bottom. It has few experienced soldiers to spare. The suggestion alarmed personnel officials, says Col. Steven Mains, who led the study team, which traveled throughout Iraq.

As the situation on the ground in Iraq grows more dire, some officers argue the U.S. must improve the advisory effort quickly. In an article in a Marine Corps journal this summer, Lt. Col. Julian D. Alford, who recently commanded a 900-Marine battalion in western Iraq, outlined a plan to cut sharply overall U.S. troop levels by bolstering the advisory effort.

Col. Alford's Marines had fought alongside an Iraqi army brigade and their U.S. advisers to drive insurgents from Qaim, which had been a main entry point for foreign fighters coming into Iraq from Syria. He says he left Qaim in June convinced that advisory teams were too small to help Iraqi forces stand on their own.

"The Iraqis can't make it with the [advisory] teams we have now," he says. "They will fall flat on their face." But if the U.S. military doubles the size of the advisory effort, embedding more advisers in smaller Iraqi units where most of the fighting is done, he says, the Iraqis in his former region could hold off the insurgency. To field the larger teams, he would send only some of the senior enlisted troops and officers from big U.S. units, leaving junior troops at home. He would also give them far more language and cultural training.

"The real question is: How should we be organized, trained and equipped to fight these 21st-century wars?" he asks. "This is a different way of looking at warfare."

Write to Greg Jaffe at greg.jaffe@wsj.com6

655,000 War Dead? (WSJ)

By Steven E. Moore

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

After doing survey research in Iraq for nearly two years, I was surprised to read that a study by a group from Johns Hopkins University claims that 655,000 Iraqis have died as a result of the war. Don't get me wrong, there have been far too many deaths in Iraq by anyone's measure; some of them have been friends of mine. But the Johns Hopkins tally is wildly at odds with any numbers I have seen in that country. Survey results frequently have a margin of error of plus or minus 3% or 5% -- not 1200%.

DOJ_NMG_0082789

The group -- associated with the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health -- employed cluster sampling for in-person interviews, which is the methodology that I and most researchers use in developing countries. Here, in the U.S., opinion surveys often use telephone polls, selecting individuals at random. But for a country lacking in telephone penetration, door-to-door interviews are required: Neighborhoods are selected at random, and then individuals are selected at random in "clusters" within each neighborhood for door-to-door interviews. Without cluster sampling, the expense and time associated with travel would make in-person interviewing virtually impossible.

However, the key to the validity of cluster sampling is to use enough cluster points. In their 2006 report, "Mortality after the 2003 invasion of Iraq: a cross-sectional sample survey," the Johns Hopkins team says it used 47 cluster points for their sample of 1,849 interviews. This is astonishing: I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points.

Neither would anyone else. For its 2004 survey of Iraq, the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) used 2,200 cluster points of 10 interviews each for a total sample of 21,688. True, interviews are expensive and not everyone has the U.N.'s bank account. However, even for a similarly sized sample, that is an extraordinarily small number of cluster points. A 2005 survey conducted by ABC News, Time magazine, the BBC, NHK and Der Spiegel used 135 cluster points with a sample size of 1,711 -- almost three times that of the Johns Hopkins team for 93% of the sample size.

What happens when you don't use enough cluster points in a survey? You get crazy results when compared to a known quantity, or a survey with more cluster points. There was a perfect example of this two years ago. The UNDP's survey, in April and May 2004, estimated between 18,000 and 29,000 Iraqi civilian deaths due to the war. This survey was conducted four months prior to another, earlier study by the Johns Hopkins team, which used 33 cluster points and estimated between 69,000 and 155,000 civilian deaths -- four to five times as high as the UNDP survey, which used 66 times the cluster points.

The 2004 survey by the Johns Hopkins group was itself methodologically suspect -- and the one they just published even more so.

Curious about the kind of people who would have the chutzpah to claim to a national audience that this kind of research was methodologically sound, I contacted Johns Hopkins University and was referred to Les Roberts, one of the primary authors of the study. Dr. Roberts defended his 47 cluster points, saying that this was standard. I'm not sure whose standards these are.

Appendix A of the Johns Hopkins survey, for example, cites several other studies of mortality in war zones, and uses the citations to validate the group's use of cluster sampling. One study is by the International Rescue Committee in the Democratic Republic of Congo, which used 750 cluster points. Harvard's School of Public Health, in a 1992 survey of Iraq, used 271 cluster points. Another study in Kosovo cites the use of 50 cluster points, but this was for a population of just 1.6 million, compared to Iraq's 27 million.

When I pointed out these numbers to Dr. Roberts, he said that the appendices were written by a student and should be ignored. Which led me to wonder what other sections of the survey should be ignored.

With so few cluster points, it is highly unlikely the Johns Hopkins survey is representative of the population in Iraq. However, there is a definitive method of establishing if it is. Recording the gender, age, education and other demographic characteristics of the respondents allows a researcher to compare his survey results to a known demographic instrument, such as a census.

Dr. Roberts said that his team's surveyors did not ask demographic questions. I was so surprised to hear this that I emailed him later in the day to ask a second time if his team asked demographic questions and compared the results to the 1997 Iraqi census. Dr. Roberts replied that he had not even looked at the Iraqi census.

And so, while the gender and the age of the deceased were recorded in the 2006 Johns Hopkins study, nobody, according to Dr. Roberts, recorded demographic information for the living survey respondents. This would be the first survey I have looked at in my 15 years of looking that did not ask demographic questions of its respondents. But don't take my word for it -- try using Google to find a survey that does not ask demographic questions.

Without demographic information to assure a representative sample, there is no way anyone can prove -- or disprove -- that the Johns Hopkins estimate of Iraqi civilian deaths is accurate.

Public-policy decisions based on this survey will impact millions of Iraqis and hundreds of thousands of Americans. It's important that voters and policy makers have accurate information. When the question matters this much, it is worth taking the time to get the answer right.

Mr. Moore, a political consultant with Gorton Moore International, trained Iraqi researchers for the International Republican Institute from 2003 to 2004 and conducted survey research for the Coalition Forces from 2005 to 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0082790

Barney And Baghdad (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

In the competition for the biggest "October surprise" of the 2006 election cycle, it might seem hard to top North Korea's nuclear test. But I'd suggest that in time we'll come to see the events unfolding — or rather, unraveling — in Iraq today as the real October surprise, because what we're seeing there seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive.

For those of you too young to remember, the Tet offensive was the series of attacks undertaken by the Vietcong and North Vietnamese armies between Jan. 30, 1968 — the start of the Lunar New Year — and June 1969. Although the Vietcong and Hanoi were badly mauled during Tet, they delivered, through the media, such a psychological blow to U.S. hopes of "winning" in Vietnam that Tet is widely credited with eroding support for President Johnson and driving him to withdraw as a candidate for re-election.

Total U.S. troop deaths in Iraq this month have reached at least 53, putting October on a path to be the third deadliest month of the entire war for the U.S. military. Iraqis are being killed at a rate of 100 per day now. The country has descended into such a Hobbesian state that even Saddam called on Iraqis from his prison cell to stop killing each other. He told insurgents, "Remember you are God's soldiers and, therefore, you must show genuine forgiveness and put aside revenge over the spilled blood of your sons and brothers." When Saddam is urging calm, you know things have hit a new low.

The violence in Iraq is not as coordinated as in Vietnam. You have small gangs of Sunnis and Shiites killing each other in sectarian clashes, Baathists and jihadists attacking U.S. and Iraqi forces in more organized efforts, Sunnis fighting with Kurds over turf in northern Iraq, and, on top of it all, rampant crime. Therefore, it's hard to identify a specific military order to step up the violence in Iraq, as in Tet.

But while there may be no single hand coordinating the upsurge in violence in Iraq, enough people seem to be deliberately stoking the fires there before our election that the parallel with Tet is not inappropriate. The jihadists want to sow so much havoc that Bush supporters will be defeated in the midterms and the president will face a revolt from his own party, as well as from Democrats, if he does not begin a pullout from Iraq.

The jihadists follow our politics much more closely than people realize. A friend at the Pentagon just sent me a post by the "Global Islamic Media Front" carried by the jihadist Web site Ana al-Muslim on Aug. 11. It begins: "The people of jihad need to carry out a media war that is parallel to the military war and exert all possible efforts to wage it successfully. This is because we can observe the effect that the media have on nations to make them either support or reject an issue."

It then explains that for jihadist videos of attacks on Americans to have the biggest impact, "Some persons will be needed who are proficient in the use of computer graphics including Photoshop, 3D Studio Max, or other programs that the people of jihad will need to design ... video clips about the operations."

Finally, the Web site suggests that jihadists flood e-mail and video of their operations to "chat rooms," "television channels," and to "famous U.S. authors who have public e-mail addresses ... such as Friedman, Chomsky, Fukuyama, Huntington and others." This is the first time I've ever been on the same mailing list with Noam Chomsky.

It would be depressing to see the jihadists influence our politics with a Tet-like media/war frenzy. But there are only two reasons now for the U.S. to remain in Iraq: because it thinks that staying will make things better or that leaving will make things drastically worse. Alas, it is increasingly hard to see how our presence is making things better. Iraq, under our nose, is breaking apart into so many little pieces that no political solution seems to be in the offing, because no Iraqi leader can deliver his faction anymore — and there does not seem to be an Iraqi center capable of coming together. While leaving would no doubt exacerbate the civil war, staying in Iraq indefinitely to prevent even more Shiites and Sunnis from killing one another is not going to fly with the U.S. public much longer.

Bob Woodward quoted President Bush as saying that he will not leave Iraq, even if the only ones still supporting him are his wife, Laura, and his dog Barney. If the jihadist Tet offensive continues gaining momentum, Mr. Bush may be left with just Barney.

Military Honors For A Changing Front (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan not only have changed the methods U.S. troops use to fight an urban insurgency, they also have caused the U.S. military services to change the way they look at honoring troops who are fighting on the difficult battlefields.

DOJ_NMG_0082791

The Marine Corps this year changed the rules that determine which Marines are eligible for the Combat Action Ribbon, an honor that previously required troops to both receive and return fire against an enemy. Recognizing that the deadliest and most effective enemy weapon in Iraq has been the roadside bomb, officials changed the criteria to include anyone who has been exposed to the detonation of such bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices.

"Prior to this, a service member had to be involved in a combat firefight to qualify," said Lt. Col. Jim Taylor, acting head of the Marine Corps' military awards branch. "There was a lot of heartburn over that, especially with the nature of the conflict in Iraq," he said.

Taylor said the Marines reviewed all cases in which the Combat Action Ribbon was denied during the operations in Afghanistan and Iraq in order to apply the new criteria, and out of about 3,400 such cases, 85 were found to meet the award's qualifications. About 75,000 Combat Action Ribbons have been issued for the two conflicts so far, Taylor said.

The Combat Action Ribbon has a series of colored bands, beginning with one wide blue and one wide yellow band; a set of narrow red, white and blue bands; another wide yellow band; and a wide red band.

The Marines are now in a second phase of review, during which all active-duty Marines can submit recommendations for the same award based on the new rules. The change means that thousands of Marines could qualify if they were directly exposed to a roadside bomb detonation. The next phase, set to begin in January, will allow all Marines who are no longer on active duty to apply for similar recognition, Taylor said. The change is retroactive to Oct. 7, 2001, the beginning of the war in Afghanistan.

The Army last year introduced its Combat Action Badge, which recognizes soldiers who are exposed to enemy action but are not officially in combat roles. That badge was designed to honor soldiers such as military police, truck drivers and fuel specialists who daily face the dangers of war -- such as roadside bombs -- in Iraq's urban battlefield.

The Army's award was also the first nonmedical combat distinction to honor women who are caught in battle, whereas previous similar honors were reserved for infantrymen. The change in the badge was made in recognition that any soldier fighting in Iraq or Afghanistan can come in contact with combat situations at almost any time.

Defense Department officials are also conducting the first thorough review of military-wide honors since 1996, hoping to standardize and clarify the criteria for several awards in light of the ongoing overseas wars. That review, which could take six to eight months, is expected to provide common language in all services for awards such as the Purple Heart, given for injuries during combat, and valor devices.

Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, said the department review will look at whether there is a way to honor troops who serve multiple tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, because currently they can receive only one recognition in either campaign. The review group also will examine whether some troops who are involved in the campaigns but are not actually in the field could be eligible for campaign awards.

One example Upton cited is the Air Force rule that an airman must serve in a theater of operations to earn a campaign medal, but that would exclude airmen who load weapons on bombers in the United States that then fly overseas on operations.

"The evolving nature of warfare demands that we review policies," David S.C. Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness, said in a statement. "For example, in the case of expeditionary medals, we must review how we define the operating 'box,' whether it is the theatre of direct action, or whether it might extend far beyond."

Farewell On A Dark Tarmac (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

SATHER AIR BASE, Iraq -- His commanders gave Airman 1st Class LeeBernard E. Chavis the proud emblem of their squadron-- a blue-and-yellow flag known as a guidon -- because they knew he would rather die than lose it.

The 21-year-old District native carried it from the unit's home base in the hills of Georgia to the sands of Kuwait and onto the streets of Baghdad, where, on Saturday, he was killed by a sniper as he tried to keep civilians away from a suspected roadside bomb.

"The colors have dropped," said Maj. Thomas Miner, commander of the 824th Security Forces Squadron, as he waited to escort Chavis's body onto a C-130 Hercules late Sunday. His bottom lip quivered and his eyes turned glassy. "But we've got to pick them back up."

More than 200 personnel from the squadron and other units stood in near-total blackness on a tarmac and saluted the man who became the unit's first combat fatality in Iraq. The guidon was solemnly carried forward, for the first time by someone else. Then a white unmarked truck pulled up and the door swung open.

"Reach for remains!" a voice barked.

DOJ_NMG_0082792

The sight of the coffin, draped in a large American flag and carried toward the plane by six pallbearers, slowly distorted the faces of 18 members of Chavis's sub-unit, known as a flight, who stood in two neat rows facing the makeshift charnel.

The bottom lip of one young woman in baggy fatigues quivered, and then she began to cry hysterically, her head bobbing up and down.

A chaplain intoned: "There is no greater love that can be displayed than for a person to lay down their life for others."

Another woman started to cry, and soon two men standing nearby joined her.

The chaplain continued: "His love is proven by this ultimate sacrifice."

The legs of several airmen buckled slightly. Within a few minutes, nearly the entire flight was sobbing uncontrollably. The face of Staff Sgt. Kyle Luker turned bright red as tears streamed down his cheeks.

This type of ceremony, known as a patriot detail, is rarely observed by anyone outside the military -- not by the president, not by members of Congress, not by the children or spouse of the fallen service member. The squadron commander allowed a Washington Post reporter embedded with an affiliated unit to witness, but not photograph, the ceremony for Chavis.

He was one of 2,767 members of the U.S. armed forces or employees of the Defense Department to have died so far in the Iraq war, according to the Pentagon.

With distant gunfire punctuating the night as the ceremony approached, Chavis's friends voiced questions about the war and this latest death. One asked: Was it worth the life of a 21-year-old about to propose to his girlfriend? Another wondered aloud: Who among us will die next? And a third asked: Why would God take the life of a devoted Christian who loved to sing gospel and write R&B songs?

"It makes you question almost everything" observed Luker, 27. Still, he said, "we're not here to ask the questions and get them answered. We're here to complete the mission. We'll worry about that stuff when we get home."

Squadron members sat on the dusty tarmac and remembered their friend: How he used to trash-talk while he sprinted on the basketball court. How he planned to join the FBI or the CIA or the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives once he left the Air Force.

And how he used to write songs expressing dreams of what he'd do after leaving the bloodshed of Baghdad behind. A few minutes before the coffin arrived, one of his best friends, Airman 1st Class Ro-Derick Taylor, chanted one of the songs that the two men wrote together:

Sometimes I wish that we could go
Sometimes to a place where no one knows
Sometimes when you and me could be alone
Sometimes, sometimes.

Waiting members of Chavis's squadron noted that his aggressive work in the turret of his Humvee had possibly saved their own lives. Luker, a hulking airman with a square jaw, appeared shaken. "We have to be strong," he said. "That's what Chavis would have wanted."

Chavis was born in the District and lived there until he was 6. Then his family moved to Hampton, Va., where he attended high school. His parents recently moved to Reston.

Last year, he did a tour in the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk, then rotated back to Georgia. There he got into a bit of disciplinary trouble, which his comrades declined to describe. But he begged to redeploy to the war zone, to Baghdad, and his commanders decided to give him a second chance. They gave him the guidon as a sign of their confidence in him.

His unit was attached to the 372nd Military Police Battalion, which trains Iraqi police in western Baghdad. His group frequently moved through the city streets in convoys, bound for training duty. On those trips, Chavis served as lead gunner, manning a .50-caliber machine gun in the turret atop the front Humvee. He was responsible for clearing a path for the rest of his team, laying down fire to provide cover if needed.

As his convoy rumbled through central Baghdad on Saturday just after 2 p.m., squadron members recounted, it came upon an Iraqi police unit that asked for help in dealing with a suspected roadside bomb. The unit began to set up a cordon; Chavis's job was to protect his fellow airmen and prevent civilians from rushing into the potential blast area.

Confused women and children tried to walk into the area, so Chavis rose out of the protection of his turret to try to shoo them away. "Keep away! Danger!" he shouted. Just then, a sniper from a nearby building shot him in the back of the head. He collapsed into the Humvee and died instantly.

On Sunday night, the pallbearers carried the coffin aboard the plane. Then almost the entire flight marched into the aircraft to pay final respects.

But one lanky airman couldn't move. His friends tried to push him forward, but he wouldn't budge. He continued to stare straight ahead as he cried and cried.

DOJ_NMG_0082793

Eventually, the mourners left the plane. Then the crew closed the plane's door. It was nearly pitch-black on the tarmac again. But by the winking, distant lights of the capital, it was possible to make out the unit's guidon, fluttering gently in the night sky.

Somalia Simmers (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

FOUR MONTHS ago an Islamic fundamentalist movement gained control of Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, after defeating an alliance of local warlords backed by the United States. Since then the Islamic Courts Union, as the alliance is called, has expanded its control over much of southern Somalia, including the port city of Kismaayo. It has alternatively negotiated and skirmished with a rival, internationally backed government that clings to a base in the western town of Baidoa. It has come to the brink of war with neighboring Ethiopia, which reportedly has sent troops into Somalia, and has won the support of Ethiopia's hostile neighbor, Eritrea.

The Islamic courts' central council has meanwhile come under the control of an extremist who is on the U.S. government's list of terrorists. One of its principal militia commanders is linked to murders of Western aid workers and journalists and is believed to be sheltering three members of the al-Qaeda movement who were involved in the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. There are reports that more foreign fighters are arriving in Mogadishu to join the movement, drawn by its call for jihad against Christians in Ethiopia.

What is the United States doing about this dangerous combination of an emerging terrorist base and possible regional war in East Africa? The sad and alarming answer is next to nothing. Since its allies were driven out of the Somali capital in June, the Bush administration has had few contacts and obtained scant intelligence about the Islamic courts. Officials maintain they don't even know for sure whether Ethiopian troops are in the country; the Somalis say they have seen and even fought them, but the Ethiopian government denies it.

In short, Somalia is looking more and more like Afghanistan in the late 1990s -- dominated by an Islamic fundamentalist movement that shelters al-Qaeda; prone to the meddling of neighbors; virtually ignored by the United States. Sadly, the chief difference is that, because of poor intelligence, even a military strike such as that attempted by the Clinton administration against Osama bin Laden in 1998 looks unfeasible.

The administration may have several international crises to worry about, but it cannot afford to neglect this gathering threat. It ought to appoint a special envoy to the region who could begin to work with the Ethiopian, Eritrean and regional Somali governments, and try to restrain them from touching off a regional war. The administration should seek contact with moderate elements in the Islamic courts (there are some) and encourage the ongoing mediation efforts of the Arab League. It should exercise greater control over the Somali coastline. It should consider giving diplomatic recognition to the breakaway northern region of Somaliland, which has a benign government. If the terrorist threat in Somalia cannot be eliminated by direct action, it must at least be contained.

DOJ:

Harry Jaffe: D.C.'s New Top Lawman Is A Stranger To Our Streets (WASHEX)

By Harry Jaffe

Washington Examiner, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Meet Jeffrey Taylor, who is suddenly and without much fanfare the most powerful law enforcement official in D.C. Taylor is a 41-year-old lawyer. He was born and raised in small towns in Northern California. He played high school football and got A's. He went to Stanford University and got a law degree from Harvard. He served as a prosecutor in San Diego, worked for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah — where he helped write the U.S. Patriot Act — and did a stint with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. Most recently, he was counsel to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez.

Now he's our top lawman.

What, among his stellar credentials, qualifies Taylor to become the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia? He has experience in fighting terrorists, but can he battle the terrorists who shoot up corners in Anacostia and shake down D.C. residents in Georgetown?

These are some of the questions Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton will have on her mind today when Taylor is scheduled to have his first meeting with our representative in Congress.

"He will be essentially a district attorney," says Norton, who was not consulted on Taylor's appointment. "The great majority of his cases will be criminal cases from the District of Columbia."

DOJ_NMG_0082794

I have not met Taylor, who lives with his wife on Capital Hill. I am not passing judgment on him. But it worries me when the top prosecutor in town has never worked our streets.

I wonder how a lawyer who has succeeded among the hard-core Republican elite and specialized in national security matters can direct homicide cases in the lawless lanes of D.C. Our U.S. Attorney's Office is unique. With 350 lawyers, it is the largest among federal prosecutorial operations. More importantly, it is the only one in the nation that handles both federal and local criminal cases. In every other major city, a local district attorney — elected or appointed — prosecutes local thugs. It is a sad and humbling aspect of Home Rule that we in D.C. have a federal appointee as our D.A.

Taylor succeeds Ken Wainstein, who moves up to run the Justice Department's new National Security Division. Wainstein was terrific for D.C. Like Taylor, he was a favorite at Main Justice, and he also held a top job at FBI headquarters; but Wainstein also worked as a line prosecutor here in D.C. for years. He locked up murderers. He knew our turf, he put his prosecutors in the community, he sent them after gang-bangers and local hoodlums. Jeff Taylor made his mark as an elite terrorist hunter. He helped create the Patriot Act. A few weeks ago he was Alberto Gonzales' top counselor on terrorism and national security.

My fear is that he will favor national security prosecutions over keeping D.C. residents secure. When Bill Clinton was president, Eleanor Holmes Norton helped select federal judges and the U.S. Attorney. George W. Bush appoints with little regard for D.C.'s needs.

No wonder Norton believes D.C. should have its own district attorney.Harry Jaffe has been covering the Washington area since 1985. E-mail him at hjaffe@washingtonian.com.

7 Departments Miss Senator's Deadline To List High-cost IT Projects (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, October 18, 2006

Seven departments have missed a deadline to detail their most expensive information technology projects for a Senate subcommittee.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., last month directed all agencies to submit lists by Oct. 13 of IT projects worth more than $250,000 to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on financial management, which he chairs.

"A non-response raises the level of concern . . . that there may be inefficiencies," said John Hart, a spokesman for Coburn. "The only way those questions can be answered is a complete response."

For each project, Coburn requested that agencies note the project's vendor, when work began, the project's original estimated cost and how much money has been spent so far. The letter also asked whether cost overruns have occurred, if a new cost estimate has been made and what that estimate is.

As of Oct. 16, the Agriculture, Energy, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Justice, State and Veterans Affairs departments had not responded, according to Hart. All other departments had either submitted the information or requested an extension, he said. Coburn has not yet reviewed the lists that were received, Hart added.

HUD spokesman Jerry Brown said the department had not responded because officials there mistakenly assumed they had 30 days to reply after receiving the letter on Sept. 25.

"We are still working to get [Coburn] the information," Brown said.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department contacted the senator's office on Oct. 16 and is creating a list.

None of the other departments responded immediately to requests for comment.

Coburn, a consistent critic of what he says is wasteful spending in areas such as federal travel, recently turned his attention to information technology expenditures, which have grown rapidly over the last five years. Coburn chaired a subcommittee hearing on the topic in September and said he will hold additional hearings on specific projects.

Following pressure from Coburn and from the Government Accountability Office, the Office of Management and Budget last month released lists of federal IT projects that are considered to be at high risk or that are on a management watch list. OMB puts projects on the high-risk list due to factors including importance to an agency and cost. The management watch list includes IT projects for which the business cases demonstrate one or more planning weaknesses.

Justice Task Force Looks Into Privacy (FCW)

By John Moore

Federal Computer Week, October 18, 2006

A task force has issued a series of recommendations regarding privacy in justice information systems.

The Privacy Technology Focus Group was chartered to examine the exchange of personally identifiable information, focusing on justice and public safety data. Last November, the Justice Department brought together a group of public- and private-sector specialists to look into privacy technology. The group's working teams covered areas such as access and authentication, data aggregation and dissemination, and identity theft.

A report issued earlier this month that stemmed from the focus group's activities offers suggestions. Some relate to the Global Justice Extensible Markup Language Data Model (JXDM). For example, the report recommends reviewing and creating privacy metadata in Global JXDM. That metadata would describe sensitivity, use limitations and other characteristics of data.

In addition, the report suggests funding and training to encourage state and local agencies to move toward Global JXDM, the National Information Exchange Model and a baseline definition of identity data elements. Global JXDM is an XML standard designed for criminal justice information exchange. The National Information Exchange Model extends Global JXDM to other information domains.

Other recommendations include:

Appointing a team of policy and technology specialists from the public and private sectors to assess and revise "Fair Information Principles as they relate to specific justice circumstances and technologies," the report states. Those principles come from government information-handling guidelines that have accumulated in the past two decades.

Developing a strategic plan to use anonymization in justice, public safety and homeland security initiatives to protect privacy while improving information sharing. "Anonymizing data permits multiple parties to correlate data from multiple sources without revealing personally identifiable information until or unless appropriate," according to the report.

Establishing a grant condition that requires applicants to address identity management within programs and systems development backed by national funding. The focus group's report was prepared under the auspices of the Office of Justice Programs' Bureau of Justice Assistance in conjunction with DOJ's Global Justice Information Sharing Initiative. The group's steering committee included representatives from DOJ, IJIS Institute, Global XML Structure Task Force and the National Network to End Domestic Violence Fund.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Trial Judge Vacates Conviction Of Late Enron Founder Lay (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 18, 2006

The late Ken Lay, the Enron founder who was convicted in May of deceiving investors about Enron's finances, is once again innocent in the eyes of the law.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the trial of Lay and his colleague Jeff Skilling in Houston earlier this year, issued an order Tuesday vacating Lay's conviction and dismissing the indictment against him.

"The court concludes that Lay's conviction must be vacated," wrote Lake in a 13-page opinion. "The indictment against Kenneth L. Lay is dismissed."

Ever since Lay died of a heart attack in Aspen, Colo., July 5, following his conviction at trial but before he had the chance to appeal the verdict, Lake's ruling has been widely expected. As a matter of law, a conviction against a criminal defendant is not final until the defendant has had the chance to appeal the verdict. Therefore, Lay's death short-circuited the full legal process to which he was entitled.

"Mr. Lay never had the chance to appeal," said Sam Buffone of Ropes and Gray, who represented the estate of Ken Lay. "We were eager to appeal."

Prosecutors fought an uphill battle against Lake's decision, arguing last month that he should postpone his ruling until Congress had the chance to pass a new law changing the ground rules for defendants who died before getting a hearing before an appellate court. But Congress never seriously considered the new law.

The ruling is a boost for members of Lay's family, who no longer face criminal forfeiture proceedings by the Department of Justice. After Lay was found guilty in May, Justice took steps to track down and seize $40 million from Lay, even though he testified in his trial that he was virtually bankrupt.

Justice, which plans to pursue forfeiture in civil proceedings, issued the following statement Tuesday: "Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial. We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

As for Skilling, Lay's co-defendant, the ruling has no impact. In May, jurors convicted Skilling, who served as CEO of Enron in 2001, of 18 separate criminal charges. He is slated to be sentenced on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082796

When Lay died in July, some Houston residents and former Enron shareholders vented their rage that he had escaped a prison term. Many, on the Web and on talk radio, demanded an autopsy. But an autopsy conducted in Aspen showed that Lay did indeed have heart problems, and that he died of natural causes.

Despite the dismissal of the indictment against Lay, some observers believe the former Enron CEO will never escape the shadow of his role in Enron's collapse. “He's innocent with an asterisk,” says Christopher Bebel, a Houston attorney who followed the case closely. “History will accurately record this episode, and the slate will not be wiped clean. When future generations look back, they will look at it as a situation where guilty verdicts were reached. A massive indictment was brought after $60 billion in market valuation evaporated, and a jury held him accountable.”

Conviction Of Enron's Lay Is Vacated By Judge (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake Tuesday vacated the conviction of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, who was convicted on May 25 on fraud and conspiracy charges and suffered a fatal heart attack on July 5. (Read the text of the ruling.1)

Established law in the judicial Fifth Circuit, which includes Texas, and elsewhere holds that when a defendant dies before he or she has the chance to complete an appeal, the conviction essentially gets wiped away.

According to Judge Lake's opinion, the government had argued that Mr. Lay's estate shouldn't get to keep the proceeds of fraud that would otherwise be subject to forfeiture and distribution to victims of the crimes. Judge Lake rejected this argument, citing precedent stating that an individual who suffered a loss may pursue reimbursement in civil court. Although the government had asked Judge Lake to defer his ruling so it could seek retroactive legislation in Congress to let the conviction stand, he said "the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent."

"We are pleased with the ruling and are glad that this brings to a close the criminal proceedings against Mr. Lay," said Ropes & Gray LLP's Samuel Buffone, the lawyer for Mr. Lay's estate.

"Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial," said Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman. "We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

Judge Throws Out Kenneth Lay’s Conviction (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 17 — A federal judge on Tuesday threw out the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Kenneth L. Lay, the former Enron executive, who died of heart failure in July while on vacation in Colorado.

Judge Simeon T. Lake III ruled that the conviction must be voided because Mr. Lay cannot pursue an appeal his guilty verdict.

The decision, which had been expected, prevents the government from trying to seize more than $43.5 million from Mr. Lay’s estate that prosecutors claimed he stole from Enron before it collapsed in 2001.

Mr. Lay, who was 64, died about six weeks after he and another former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, were convicted of spearheading the fraud that led to Enron’s collapse in December 2001.

“We’re very pleased that the criminal case against Mr. Lay is now over,” said Sam Buffone, the lawyer who successfully filed the motions to have both Mr. Lay’s indictment and conviction dismissed. A jury found Mr. Lay guilty in May of six counts of conspiracy and fraud, and Judge Lake, in a separate trial, found him guilty of four counts of bank fraud.

Mr. Skilling, who was convicted of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, is scheduled to be sentenced on Monday.

Prosecutors has initially sought $139.3 million from Mr. Skilling and $43.5 billion from Mr. Lay. But after Mr. Lay’s death, the government moved to force Mr. Skilling to pay the entire $182.8 million.

Mr. Lay, who before his trial presented the image of an avuncular philanthropist who played golf with presidents, was often prickly and argumentative on the witness stand. He appeared sullen, shook his head dismissively and slouched in his chair throughout the four-month trial. Even after his conviction, he maintained that he had not committed any crimes and that, moreover, Enron was a healthy company brought down by unfavorable news coverage and the deceit of his chief financial officer, Andrew S. Fastow.

In his 13-page decision, Judge Lake cited established case law that required revocation of convictions if defendants die without opportunity to appeal. The Justice Department had asked the judge to delay ruling until Congress had time to pass legislation that would have retroactively allowed Mr. Lay's conviction to stand. But lawmakers recessed before considering the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0082797

Tuesday's decision will make it harder for former Enron employees and shareholders to lay claim to the millions in Mr. Lay's estate because they cannot point to his criminal conviction as proof of wrongdoing.

But, David Berg, a defense lawyer in Houston, said, "The civil suits are going after deeper pockets like the investment banks" that have been accused of participating in the fraud.

While many former Enron employees expressed outrage and Internet blogs seethed that Mr. Lay's conviction had been "erased from the books," others were resigned.

"I'm numb to the whole thing," said Tina Tennant, who was an executive assistant at Enron and is part of the class-action lawsuit. "It's over and it's really over now."

Judge Revokes Lay's Conviction (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

A federal judge in Houston yesterday wiped away the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Kenneth L. Lay, the Enron Corp. founder who died of heart disease in July, bowing to decades of legal precedent but frustrating government attempts to seize nearly $44 million from his family.

The ruling worried employees and investors who lost billions of dollars when the Houston energy-trading company filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001. It also came more than a week after Congress recessed for the November elections without acting on a last-ditch Justice Department proposal that would have changed the law to allow prosecutors to seize millions of dollars in investments and other assets that Lay controlled.

With the judge's order, Lay's conviction on 10 criminal charges will be erased from the record. "The indictment against Kenneth L. Lay is dismissed," U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III wrote in a spare, 13-page order.

Legal analysts said Lake's ruling closely hewed to a long-held doctrine called abatement, which allows a conviction to be vacated if defendants die before they are able to exercise their right to appeal. Courts typically rule that defendants' constitutional rights to challenge their convictions outweigh other considerations, and the law hesitates to punish the dead, the analysts said.

Samuel J. Buffone, a Washington-based lawyer for Lay, said the family was pleased with the ruling. "As far as we're concerned, this is the last step," Buffone said. "It's as if the indictment never occurred."

But governance experts said Lay's name forever will be linked with the era's most complex and far-reaching corporate fraud.

"A lot of lives were ruined, both the perpetrators' and the victims,' " University of Tennessee corporate governance expert Joseph V. Carcello said. "This happened on his watch. Even if he's not legally culpable, he's culpable as a manager."

Regulators at the Securities and Exchange Commission still may pursue their civil case against Lay's estate, but their task will be more difficult because they can no longer introduce the fact of his conviction and instead must prove again, in a resource-intensive trial, that he broke the law. The SEC case has been stayed pending resolution of the status of Lay's criminal conviction. The agency's five commissioners must decide in the weeks to come whether to proceed against Lay's estate.

The court ruling shifts the spotlight onto former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, 52, who is to be sentenced Monday on 19 fraud, conspiracy and false-filings charges. Skilling, Lay's protÃ©gÃ© and fellow defendant, handled day-to-day operations at Enron until his resignation in the summer of 2001 and faces more than two decades in prison.

Skilling is the sole survivor from Enron's top management ranks and the one most likely to pay a heavy price for his decision to vigorously fight the charges against him. Earlier this month, Skilling laid out several avenues for appeal, including jury bias, faulty instructions by the judge and what he called overreaching by prosecutors that infringed on his constitutional rights.

Former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, whom Skilling has painted as the man most responsible for the company's downfall, pleaded guilty to two conspiracy charges and gave damaging testimony against his onetime patrons. A separate federal judge in Houston last month sentenced him to six years in prison, a 40 percent reduction from the seemingly iron-clad deal his defense team had struck with the government. The leader of an Enron employees group later called the benefit to Fastow "a slap in the face."

The lead plaintiffs in a separate shareholder lawsuit against former Enron executives and other advisers accused of helping the company conceal its financial problems already have said they intend to focus their attentions not on Lay's family, but on investment banks with deeper pockets.

Days before Lay's death, prosecutors had filed court papers seeking to extract $43.5 million from his financial holdings, including $6 million in a recently matured investment and at least $1.5 million more that Lay used to cover part of the mortgage on a luxury apartment in Houston. The government said it intended to set aside the money in a special fund for Enron investors and employees. Now, federal prosecutors are seeking to hold Skilling responsible for Lay's share, over Skilling's objections.

DOJ_NMG_0082798

Separately yesterday, lawyers for the Lay family asked the court to release a $5 million bond that had been secured by the homes of several of Lay's five children. Federal prosecutors at the Enron Task Force declined to comment.

"Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. "We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron."

Lay, 64, collapsed in a rental home near Aspen, Colo., about a month after a Houston jury found him guilty of conspiring to mislead employees and investors about Enron's mounting financial problems. His death unleashed vicious criticism on the Internet and prompted conspiracy theories that were dispelled by a coroner's report and sheriff's deputies.

A man accustomed to flying in private jets and mingling with the Bush family, foreign diplomats and owners of professional sports teams, Lay was brought low by a widening scandal after disclosures that Enron had disguised billions of dollars in debt and manufactured revenue. He told the jury at his trial earlier this year that he was in the hole $250,000 after years of spending lavishly on homes, vacations and his five children.

Federal prosecutors baited Lay into displaying a short temper and a flair for micromanagement on the witness stand, and pounced when Lay could not explain why he sold more than $77 million in Enron shares back to the company in the months before its demise.

In recent weeks, Lay's family paid an undisclosed sum to settle a smaller civil case filed by former Enron employees over their pension and retirement funds.

Ken Horton, a former Enron manager who was laid off alongside thousands of others in December 2001, said he had steeled himself for the conviction to be extinguished after word of Lay's death three months ago. But Horton, who pegged his retirement and savings plan losses in the six-figure range, expressed "great" concern that he and former colleagues would never be made whole financially. Horton said he has received only $4,000 to date.

"If I got 10 cents on the dollar, I would be elated," Horton said.

JUDGE VOIDS CONVICTIONS AGAINST LAY (HC)

By Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, October 18, 2006

Ruling prevents U.S. from taking late Enron chief's assets, but civil suit still an option

The criminal case against Ken Lay came to an end Tuesday when a judge vacated his convictions and dismissed the indictment that brought him to trial.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake granted the request by Lay's estate to wipe out the convictions against the late Enron chairman, an outcome that was widely anticipated, given legal precedent. Lake also dismissed the indictment that was filed against him in 2004.

In his ruling, Lake cited a decision in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that makes a defendant's death before his or her appeals have been exhausted grounds for throwing out a conviction and dismissing an indictment.

The Department of Justice had argued against vacating the conviction, saying it would unjustly enrich Lay's estate by preventing criminal forfeiture proceedings to recover restitution for victims of Enron's downfall.

The government even proposed a law that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in such circumstances. That effort didn't succeed.

Lay died July 5 from heart disease, just weeks after a jury found him guilty on six charges of conspiracy and fraud and Lake found him guilty on four charges of bank fraud.

The same jury convicted former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling of 19 criminal counts. Skilling's sentencing is Monday.

Lake said in his 13-page ruling that current law is clear.

"Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow 5th Circuit precedent," Lake wrote.

Sam Buffone, an attorney representing the Lay family, said, "We're very pleased with the ruling and glad this finally brings to a close the criminal prosecution against Mr. Lay."

Lay's camp was expected to file a motion to release the $5 million bond posted after the jury found him guilty. The bond was secured by the mortgages of homes owned by three of his children.

SEC proceeding activeThough Lake's ruling thwarts the government's attempt through a criminal proceeding to seize what it claims would be millions of dollars in assets from Lay's estate, it doesn't preclude the government from doing the same through a civil action.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has a civil proceeding against Lay that it brought in 2004, but prosecutors could also file their own case.

The Justice Department hasn't said if it will go after Lay's assets via a civil proceeding. A statement from Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra on Tuesday, however, seems to indicate that's a possibility.

"We will continue to pursue all remedies available for restitution on behalf of the victims of the fraud at Enron," Sierra said. "Today's ruling does not change the fact that Mr. Lay was found guilty after a four-month jury trial and a separate bench trial."

Prosecutors could appeal Lake's ruling directly to the 5th Circuit, but Kirby Behre, a former prosecutor who has followed the case, wonders what grounds they would use for their arguments.

Ex-employees dismayedOne argument prosecutors could make is found in a September filing in which they asked Lake to delay his decision until Monday — when Lay was also slated to be sentenced — so Congress could consider their proposed law. Prosecutors noted it would be in the best interests of victims if such convictions stood, allowing the recovery of assets from the estates involved.

"But when you have various methods of reaching the same ends, such as making victims whole, just because one method is closed off doesn't mean an injustice is being carried out," Behre said.

It does not appear that attorneys for Enron shareholders will continue to pursue assets of the estate in the massive class action now pending, according to a source familiar with the case.

The judge's decision disappointed former Enron employees.

"It's not right for the victims of this crime and for the recovery of the money from his estate," said Rod Jordan, head of the Severed Enron Employees Coalition.

Will Perry, a former Enron Energy Services employee, said: "I don't think that should have happened. He was just as, if not more, guilty than Skilling."

However, Tracey Michel, a six-year veteran of Enron's information technology department, said she always saw Lay as undeserving of the charges, but she's also concerned about the ruling's impact on recovery for former employees.

"I think the people who worked for him took advantage of him," Michel said. "But I do think he should have given some money back."

Jurors in the Lay-Skilling case also weighed in.

Doug Baggett never thought the conviction would be vacated.

"I was surprised and disappointed, but I still have to respect and uphold the judge's opinion," he said. "I'm not a lawyer, but as someone who spent four months of their life in the courtroom, it's upsetting."

'That's how it is'Juror Carolyn Kuchera said the move was inevitable given what she understood the law to be.

"It's a disappointment, of course, but that's how it is," she said.

Lake also denied a motion from Russell Butler, who called himself a victim and had asked for an order of restitution.

Butler, a shareholder who said he lost about $8,000 in stock when Enron imploded, said he has asked his attorney to look into challenging the ruling.

"The jury has spoken, and the jury has found Lay guilty. His estate should bear the economic burden," said Butler, who works as the executive director of the Maryland Crime Victims Resource Center. "They've benefited from this like it never happened, and as for all the victims of Mr. Lay, we're ignored. The court never really addressed our arguments."

Chronicle reporter Purva Patel contributed to this report.

Enron Founder's Conviction Vacated (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press

AP, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON — A federal judge Tuesday vacated the conviction of Enron's late founder Ken Lay, wiping out a jury's verdict that he committed fraud and conspiracy in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

Lay was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two cases May 25. Enron's collapse in 2001 wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Lay died of heart disease July 5 while vacationing with his wife, Linda, in Aspen, Colo.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, in a ruling Tuesday, agreed with Lay's lawyers that his death required that his conviction be erased and his indictment dismissed. They cited a 2004 ruling from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found that a defendant's death pending appeal extinguished his entire case, because he hadn't had a full opportunity to challenge the conviction and the government shouldn't be able to punish a dead defendant or his estate.

DOJ_NMG_0082800

"On behalf of his estate, I'm really quite pleased with the ruling and glad this brings to a close the criminal proceeding against Mr. Lay. The judge engaged in a fair and reasoned application of 5th Circuit law," said Samuel Buffone, the attorney for Lay's estate.

Tuesday's ruling thwarts the government's bid to seek $43.5 million in gains that prosecutors allege he pocketed by participating in Enron's fraud. The government still could pursue that money in civil court, but they would have to compete with any other litigants pursuing Lay's estate.

Lake also denied a request from Russell Butler, who said he was a victim of Enron's collapse and had asked for an order of restitution based on Lay's conviction.

"With this ruling, the criminal case is over. It doesn't end the civil case or the ability of anyone to file or pursue a civil case against the estate," Buffone said.

Kelly Kimberly, spokeswoman for Lay's family, declined to comment, referring reporters to Buffone.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Justice did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Prosecutors offered no counter legal argument in the case, but asked Lake to hold off on a ruling until next week so Congress could consider legislation from the Justice Department that changes federal law regarding the abatement of criminal convictions. Congress recessed for the elections without considering the legislation.

In their motion to Lake last month, prosecutors Sean Berkowitz and John Hueston wrote that certain provisions of the proposed legislation would apply to Lay's case, including "that the death of a defendant charged with a criminal offense shall not be the basis for abating or otherwise invalidating either a verdict returned or the underlying indictment."

"Although the United States argues that applicable law might change at some unknown future date, the court is bound to follow Fifth Circuit precedent," Lake wrote.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001, when years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable.

Lay's co-defendant, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, is scheduled to be sentenced Monday.

Judge Vacates Ken Lay's Enron Conviction (UPI)

United Press International, October 18, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 17 (UPI) -- A Houston judge Tuesday vacated the indictment and criminal conviction of former Enron Corp. Chairman Ken Lay, who died July 5 of a heart attack.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's action followed a request by Lay's estate, the Houston Chronicle reported Tuesday.

The action, largely expected, lifts a cloud from Lay's name. He died just weeks after a Houston jury convicted him on six charges of conspiracy and fraud and, separately, Lake found him guilty on four charges of bank fraud.

That fraud is widely seen as the cause of the energy giant's collapse, which destroyed the pensions and investments of thousands.

In vacating Lay's indictment and conviction, Lake cited a 5th Circuit Court of Appeals decision that makes death, before the appeals process has been exhausted, grounds for tossing convictions and indictment. Justice Department lawyers had opposed the action.

Lake is scheduled to sentence Jeff Skilling, Enron's former chief executive and Lay's co-defendant, Monday.

McGuire's Option Deals Could Lead To Criminal Charges (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 18, 2006

Authorities are likely to take a deep look at the backdating activities at UnitedHealth, former prosecutors say.

The sheer size and persistence of stock-option backdating at UnitedHealth Group Inc. could be the basis of a criminal investigation, former federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Particularly vulnerable is Chief Executive William McGuire, the prime beneficiary of the backdating that allowed top executives to reap additional millions of dollars in profits by granting their options at times when UnitedHealth's stock was at low points.

"Because of the scale of the options granting, this has to be put in the egregious category, and that makes criminal prosecution more likely," said Christopher Bebel, a Houston securities attorney who once prosecuted white-collar cases for the U.S. attorney's office in Minnesota.

McGuire's unexercised options totaled more than $1.6 billion at the end of last year.

He resigned as chairman Sunday and will depart as CEO by Dec. 1 as the result of an independent investigation into the company's backdating practices.

UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay said the company has seen no indication from authorities of any criminal investigation.

The company previously has acknowledged that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department through the office of the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, best known for prosecuting Wall Street and securities matters.

Minneapolis attorney Doug Kelley, a former assistant U.S. attorney, said the involvement of the Southern District is a signal that criminal issues are being pursued. The SEC also can make recommendations to the Justice Department if it thinks criminal prosecution is appropriate, Kelley said.

Bebel said the report by an independent review group, the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr, will give federal regulators and prosecutors a starting point for considering whether to pursue civil and/or criminal cases.

"That will be an excellent road map for government attorneys. It will allow them to hit the road running and shave a few miles off of the marathon," Bebel said.

The report released Sunday said senior executives "failed to ensure that the option granting practices were appropriate."

The report also said SEC filings regarding the options and related accounting steps "were not accurate in certain respects."

Bebel said that failure to adequately report the backdating could be seen as a "material omission" in SEC filings.

The prominence of McGuire and UnitedHealth could make them more of a target than a smaller, less well-known company, Kelley said.

"Deterrence is one of the noted outcomes of criminal prosecutions in the white-collar area," he said.

Kelley also said the company's decision to reprice the options in question for McGuire, President Stephen Hemsley and other executives may be too little, too late for authorities.

"Their decision to reprice options, while admirable, will not forestall a criminal investigation," Kelley said.

McGuire reaped $427 million from stock-option exercises from May 1997 to February 2006, according to Thomson Financial. He exercised those shares for $68.6 million and sold them for $496.3 million. Of those, some were from options granted during the period under the backdating review.

The continued uncertainty over UnitedHealth's change in command was reflected on Wall Street on Tuesday when Moody's Investors Service downgraded both short- and long-term debt to a "negative" outlook.

"These are not issues that have quick fixes and will require a cultural change at the board of directors and senior management level, which will take some time to accomplish," said Stephen Zaharuk, a Moody's vice president.

Staff writer Patrick Kennedy contributed to this report. David Phelps · 612-673-7269 · dphelps@startribune.com

UnitedHealth To Pay Departing CEO $5.1M A Year For Life; Value Of Options Hoard Unknown (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-After being forced to step down over the company's compensation practices, UnitedHealth chief executive William McGuire will retire on $5.1 million (â,¬4.08 million) a year, according to the calculations of a watchdog group.

McGuire has agreed to retire by Dec. 1, and he stepped down from his post as chairman on Sunday. The move came after a company-sponsored investigation determined that many of the company's stock options were backdated to make them more favorable for the recipients, including McGuire, other executives, and thousands of UnitedHealth employees.

McGuire's retirement benefits include a $6.5 million (â,¬5.19 million) lump sum, according to Portland, Maine-based group The Corporate Library, which has criticized McGuire's pay before.

McGuire has stock options that were worth $1.78 billion (â,¬1.42 billion) as of the end of 2005. Their current value is not known. Investors have sold off UnitedHealth shares since questions about options backdating arose in March. Then, on Sunday, UnitedHealth said McGuire would re-price his options to the highest point in the year they were granted to remove any possibility that he got a favorable price.

McGuire's 1999 employment contract, which has been amended since then, has been criticized as too generous, but the severance provisions came into sharper focus on Monday now that he is leaving.

In mid-April, McGuire asked the company's board to stop issuing new stock options to him and some other senior managers, to cap an executive retirement plan, and to get rid of noncash perks. The company said in May that those changes had been adopted, although no amendments to McGuire's employment agreement were filed. UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay did not return phone messages seeking comment.

McGuire's base salary was $2.3 million (â,¬1.84 million) a year but he cleared more than $100 million (â,¬79.9 million) in years that he cashed in stock options.

Paul Hodgson, who researches compensation at The Corporate Library, said there are far too many elements of guaranteed pay in McGuire's contract.

His rising base salary triggers a rising bonus and a rising pension, Hodgson said.

"A board that agreed to this type of compensation was already compromised before stock option backdating became an issue," he said.

Executives such as McGuire usually take their retirement benefits as a lump sum, said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president and special counsel to Institutional Shareholder Services, a proxy advisory firm. That added up to $98 million (â,¬78.31 million) for former Exxon Mobil Corp. Chairman and CEO Lee R. Raymond when he retired at the end of last year.

At UnitedHealth, "This board didn't seem to do a very good job on negotiating on a lot of issues with McGuire, so I think it was probably par for the course," McGurn said. "Other boards have done just as poorly, so they're not alone."

McGuire could be forced to give up some or all of those gains, said James Cox, a professor of corporate securities law at Duke University. He said he thinks it's "very likely" that McGuire will have to give back his stock options.

"These are ill-gotten gains and they should be returned," Cox said.

But by re-pricing his stock options to eliminate any wrongful gain, McGuire has already gotten rid of his gain and shouldn't have to pay anything back, said Joseph Grundfest, a former member of the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a law professor at Stanford University.

"Let's assume that you gained a dollar because of misdating, and you shouldn't have gained that dollar. By giving that dollar back you've in effect disgorged the gains to which you're not entitled," he said.

How UnitedHealth Spotlights Gap In Reform (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A shocker in Sunday's report on the options heist at UnitedHealth Group Inc. is that Chief Executive William McGuire had an inside man on the company's board: William G. Spears, graduate of Choate and Princeton, a Harvard M.B.A., and the founder of a New York investment-management firm that bears his name.

Mr. Spears was head of the UnitedHealth board's compensation committee and also chairman of the "ad hoc" committee that negotiated Dr. McGuire's rich 1999 re-employment contract. That contract was signed in December of that year, according to the report released Sunday, but it included a grant of one million options dated back to Oct. 13 -- the day the company's stock price reached its low for the year.

The backdating meant Dr. McGuire's options, intended to give him an incentive to grow the company, were already "in the money" to the tune of about $12 million by the time he received them. A nice little bonus, even for a future billionaire.

In theory, Mr. Spears was an "independent" director. But the investigation, led by former SEC enforcement chief William McLucas, discovered he had close financial ties to Dr. McGuire. He served as trustee for two trusts benefiting the CEO's children and managed between $15 million and $55 million of the McGuire family fortune. In June 1999, just months before the employment agreement was renegotiated, Dr. McGuire also invested $500,000 to help Mr. Spears repurchase his money-management firm from a financial conglomerate that had acquired it.

TALKING BUSINESS

Email business@wsj.com1 and read reader comments Saturday at WSJ.com/TalkingBusiness2.

Lawyers for Mr. Spears argue all this was duly disclosed. They cite an email sent by the company's general counsel, David Lubben, Oct. 12, 1999, to its outside counsel. According to the McLucas report, that email indicated "disclosure of some 'conflict' had been made to the 'full' board."

Trouble is, no one on the board remembers being told of the relationship. Two directors told investigators they were "adamant that they believe they would have remembered had they been told." Board members insist they first learned of the Spears-McGuire financial entanglement in April of this year, when investigators uncovered the matter. The board put off dealing with it until this weekend, after completion of the McLucas report.

Mr. Spears told investigators he never focused on the grant dates of Dr. McGuire's options. He also told investigators it simply didn't occur to him that his financial dealings with the CEO might be a conflict of interest.

That is hard to swallow. It is also a perfect illustration of why directors need to be free of such financial ties. Mr. Spears is just the latest example of the quiet seduction that occurs on cozy corporate boards. He was supposed to be the shareholders' representative in negotiating with the clever Dr. McGuire. Surely, it was hard for him to play that part when his bread was being so generously buttered by the man with whom he was negotiating.

Much has changed since 1999. For one thing, the Sarbanes-Oxley law passed in the wake of the corporate scandals of 2002 now requires option grants to be reported in 48 hours -- making backdating extremely difficult, if not impossible. For another, corporate boards are under fire, and as a result spend a lot more time doing their jobs. They are likely to pay more attention to pesky details, such as options-grant dates.

Still, the UnitedHealth mess suggests there is more to be done. Sarbanes-Oxley put strict requirements on audit committees, but not on compensation committees. They should consist of truly independent directors and should work with truly independent compensation consultants. (Mr. Spears' ad hoc committee was advised by the now-defunct Arthur Andersen LLP, which was also the company's outside auditor, thus raising questions about a possible conflict.)

Beyond that, the UnitedHealth fiasco provides fuel for those who want to tighten the ties that bind directors to shareholders -- by, for instance, requiring directors to be elected by majority vote, or enabling large shareholders to place director candidates on the corporate proxy ballot, or giving shareholders an advisory vote on executive pay. All these proposals are gradually gaining ground in the U.S., and outrage over CEO pay is likely to ensure they keep moving ahead.

Shareholders, of course, have reason to be ambivalent about all of this. Dr. McGuire may have lined his own pockets, but he also lined theirs. His successor -- for now, Stephen Hemsley -- will find directors looking much more carefully over his shoulder. That may prevent the kind of compensation games that Dr. McGuire played. But it is unlikely to ensure the kind of extraordinary returns that Dr. McGuire delivered.

UnitedHealth's Options Scandal Shows Familiar Symptoms (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Anyone with health insurance from UnitedHealth Group knows what happens if you fail to fill in every box on the form, or attach the requisite back-up material, to get reimbursed for a $40 prescription. You're not going to see a dime until you've been put on hold for 30 minutes, faxed the paperwork twice to somebody in Minnetonka, Minn., and demanded to talk to a supervisor.

So imagine my surprise when I read this week about the loosey-goosey process UnitedHealth used to issue billions of dollars' worth of stock options to top executives over the past few years. According to a report prepared by lawyers at WilmerHale, the board of directors and its compensation committee didn't bother keeping good notes about their decisions regarding pay negotiations and stock options. And the documents authorizing those options conveniently left the date blank, so that someone -- even today, it's not exactly clear who -- could later pick the date that just happened to make the options as valuable as possible.

Isn't it odd that a company could be so persnickety when it comes to pinching pennies from doctors and patients, and so cavalier when it comes to lavishing executives with hundreds of millions of dollars of shareholders' money?

Or maybe it's not. Maybe what we have here is the most outrageous corporate scandal since Enron and WorldCom.

The crux of the UnitedHealth story concerns employee stock options. Just to review, an option lets the employee buy a share of the company stock at a predetermined "strike" price -- usually the market price at the time of issue -- and then sell it in the future, when and if the stock is worth more. The benefit to the employee is the difference between the strike price and the subsequent sales price. The cost to shareholders is that all their stock is now worth a bit less because the newly issued shares dilute their stake.

Thanks to clever reporting by the Wall Street Journal earlier this year, we now know that corporate executives have been routinely setting strike prices on dates when the shares hit temporary lows -- rather than the dates on which the options were issued, which is what most people assumed. It's yet another game played by corporate executives at dozens of companies to pick the shareholders' pockets. And it's the latest evidence of how executive compensation has become a cancer, eating away at the souls of even the most successful American corporations.

Consider the case of William McGuire, who over the past 15 years has transformed UnitedHealth from a struggling regional insurer in Minnesota into the second-largest health insurer in the country, largely through acquisitions of companies like Mid Atlantic Medical Services of Rockville. One in six Americans is a UnitedHealth customer. Under McGuire's leadership, the company's market value has risen to $60 billion. During that same period, he amassed stock options more valuable than those of any chief executive in history: $1.5 billion.

Even by today's standards, McGuire's compensation has been obscene. The big change came in 1999, when, in negotiations over a new contract, he demanded a pay package that would give him 2 percent of UnitedHealth shares. Significantly, McGuire insisted that he alone get to decide the timing of those options. And he wrote in a provision that he could be fired only upon a felony conviction, or failure to rectify a serious problem after repeated notices from the board.

The board of directors that agreed to such a lavish, one-sided contract included several luminaries: Tom Kean, the former governor of New Jersey and later chairman of the 9/11 commission; James Johnson, the former chief executive of Fannie Mae who created the culture that led to that company's costly accounting scandal; Gail Wilensky, a respected health-policy expert who once ran the Medicare and Medicaid programs; and former vice president Walter Mondale.

DOJ_NMG_0082804

What were these directors possibly thinking? We have some insight on that from William G. Spears, a Wall Street money-manager who was a member of the compensation committee in 1999. He explained to the Journal that if the board had refused to go along with McGuire's piggy requests, "Bill would take it as a signal that directors weren't enthusiastic about his leadership. That would be a distraction, at the very least. Bill takes these things as a benchmark of how directors feel about him."

Well, we wouldn't want Bill to feel unappreciated, would we? Particularly if you're Spears, and you're also managing millions of dollars in McGuire's personal assets, and serving as trustee for two trusts set up for the benefit of McGuire's children, and you just accepted an investment of $500,000 from McGuire to help finance the repurchase of your firm from a financial conglomerate. Such potential conflicts of interest are supposed to be reported to other directors, of course, as well as the shareholders in the company's annual proxy report. But that was just another tiny detail that somehow slipped through the cracks.

McGuire was not the only one to benefit from the directors' ineptitude. There was also his trusty chief operating officer, Stephen Hemsley, who upon being hired in June 1997 was presented with 400,000 stock options with an issue date of five months earlier. Hemsley told the WilmerHale lawyers that he "didn't recall focusing at the time" on the $2.9 million gimme he'd just been handed as a result of the backdating.

You might say that Hemsley comes honestly to his lack of focus and ethical sensitivity. Before coming to UnitedHealth -- I'm not making this up -- he'd spent the previous 23 years at Arthur Andersen, rising to chief financial officer. That's the same accounting firm that helped bring you Enron, WorldCom and Freddie Mac. And, you'll be shocked to learn, it's the same Arthur Andersen that served as a consultant to Spears and other members of UnitedHealth's compensation committee.

Around the same time that UnitedHealth directors were rubber-stamping McGuire's employment contract, they also approved another of McGuire's stock option initiatives. The company stock was in a slump, making worthless many of the options held by company executives, including 750,000 by McGuire. As McGuire explained it, morale was suffering and it was getting harder to retain key employees. Some companies had addressed this problem by "repricing" options -- lowering the strike price so the options were magically valuable again. But, as the WilmerHale lawyers put it so delicately, there were "disadvantageous accounting and disclosure ramifications" to repricing. Translation: bad publicity and a hit to earnings. So McGuire came up with the cute idea of having the board simply "suspend" the old options and issue new ones with a lower strike price.

The directors agreed. But the following August, after the stock price had risen substantially, the board also agreed to McGuire's request to "reactivate" the suspended options, essentially doubling the number of stock options issued. The motivation was unclear, but according to WilmerHale, these actions were never properly accounted for or reported to shareholders. Translation: accounting and securities fraud. And this little bit of double dipping added another $250 million to McGuire's net worth, the Journal reported.

One of the more interesting revelations from the WilmerHale report is that these and other outrages at UnitedHealth pretty much stopped following the 2002 passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, requiring directors and outside auditors to ensure that companies had adequate internal controls. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups have been running around the country, complaining the law has overreached, stifling American risk-taking and innovation. I wonder if backdating stock options is the sort of risk-taking and innovation the chamber has in mind.

In response to these revelations, you'd think UnitedHealth directors would at least have had the manners to apologize to shareholders, if not to resign. Instead, they've followed the well-worn path of insisting they did nothing wrong while taking steps to ensure it won't happen again.

After praising him for his "leadership, energy and vision," the board allowed McGuire to retire with his full pension and all his options. The good doctor graciously agreed to reprice his options from the most favorable to least favorable dates -- a concession that could cost him $200 million.

Hemsley was rewarded for his lack of focus by being named to succeed McGuire as chief executive. He was also directed to root out the senior executives in the legal, accounting and personnel departments who provided the bad advice on which the board and chief executive now say they have relied. Hemsley, too, has volunteered to reprice his options.

Spears announced his resignation from the board, which expressed "gratitude for his many contributions during his 15 years of service."

And, in a stunning example of the barn door and the departed horse, UnitedHealth's directors declared they would no longer award stock or stock options to top executives.

Guidelines Set For How To Audit Stock Options (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

The U.S. accounting-firm overseer issued long-awaited guidance for auditing the value of employee stock options.

The 28-page document comes at least a year after the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board began to develop advice on how to verify that companies are properly determining the cost of stock options. Companies have been required to treat stock options as an expense since as early as mid-2005 because of an accounting shift that still angers some businesses.

"The staff's questions and answers were developed to help auditors apply the existing auditing standards to this area appropriately and consistently, and I encourage auditors to review this guidance as they plan for calendar year-end audits," Tom Ray, the PCAOB's chief auditor, said in a statement.

In its guidance, the PCAOB reminds auditors that because companies typically must estimate the value of employee stock options because the prices generally aren't set in a market, there is a risk of producing misleading figures. As a result, the board said that auditors should be aware of possible pitfalls, such as how changes in assumptions can affect the fair value of the options.

For example, the PCAOB suggested that auditors should pay attention if a company chooses an expected volatility that is the lowest in the range of possible expected volatilities. The more volatile the stock price, the more valuable the employee stock option, and the higher the cost to the company.

The audit oversight board also offered guidance on when to use the Black-Scholes model, and when to use what is known as a lattice model. The Black-Scholes model for valuing employee stock options is more standardized, but a lattice model "might more fully reflect the substantive characteristics" of the employee stock option, the board said. In a lattice model, there are more variables, which means companies could more specifically tailor the value of stock options to factors that are specific to their companies.

Stock options give employees the right to buy stock at a preset price at a future date -- typically the same as the company's closing price on the date the option is granted. In July, the PCAOB issued separate guidance on stock options, saying that auditors might need to review earlier audits if they receive information that the stock options might have been backdated, or awarded retroactively when the stock price was lower.

If The Price Is Right (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

Buyout firms are engaged in an unprecedented feeding frenzy, gobbling up publicly traded companies like never before. While buyouts can set lagging businesses back on the right track, regulators and shareholders must be watchful to ensure that managers demand fair value for the companies.

In a typical buyout, a firm or consortium of firms purchases all the public stock in a company and takes the company private. The expression “leveraged buyout” refers to the large debt that usually finances this process — the way a homebuyer makes a down payment on a much larger mortgage.

The $33 billion acquisition of the hospital chain HCA earlier this year ranks as the largest leveraged buyout ever. Two firms recently bid $15 billion for Harrah’s Entertainment, the world’s largest casino operator. These deals are happening across the economy, as everyone from wealthy individuals to investment banks hunt for high-return investment opportunities. Even pension funds have gotten into the business, helping to fuel the trend.

According to Thomson Financial, buyout firms have spent $275 billion so far this year taking companies private, or over a quarter of the $1 trillion total for mergers and acquisitions. In the previous 20 years the highest share was 14.1 percent.

Leveraged buyouts have something of a bad reputation for what, in its worst form, is something like corporate looting. In those cases, a company’s balance sheet would be quickly loaded with high levels of debt to pay the buyers exorbitant dividends and management fees. They would then flip the debt-ridden company as quickly as possible, either to another buyer or through a public offering.

Done correctly, a buyout can be a very productive way to unlock a business’s real potential. Once a company is privately held, management can ignore the short-term dictates of the stock market and focus on the investments needed for long-term growth. A recent Harvard Business School study found that when bought-out companies were put back on the equity market they outperformed other initial public offerings and the market as a whole.

The main concern for shareholders, however, is the initial sale price. Corporate management can face conflicts of interest when the terms of a bid are better for top executives than shareholders. And management often leads a buyout itself, which discourages other prospective buyers from submitting competing bids and keeps the price artificially low.

DOJ_NMG_0082806

The Justice Department reportedly is looking into whether the old-boy network of private-equity firms has gotten a little too chummy, examining whether firms are colluding to keep prices low. It is a move we support. Too often public stockholders end up getting the raw end of these deals.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Page Program Leaders Discuss Trip (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

House page program overseers this week discussed a camping trip that Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took with two former pages and others in 1996, a congressional official said Tuesday. The trip is under review by the Justice Department.

The five-member House Page Board, three lawmakers and two House officials, took no action and did not have any information beyond recent news accounts of the trip, the official said.

The discussion indicates that the board is moving beyond the overly friendly e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages that ex-Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., sent to former male pages. The House ethics committee and the FBI are investigating Foley's approaches to the teenagers.

The congressional official is familiar with the Page Board discussion but was not authorized to be quoted by name about the meeting.

While the Page Board does not have investigators, they could ask Kolbe to meet with them.

When the Foley scandal became public in late September, House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the chairman of the Page Board, GOP Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, to investigate the page system.

"We want to make sure that all our pages are safe and the page system is safe," Hastert said.

Pages are high school students who perform errands for lawmakers, learn about Congress and attend classes at a congressional school.

Meanwhile, the ethics committee continued to call witnesses for closed-door testimony. On Tuesday, House Sergeant-at-Arms Wilson Livingood, a member of the Page Board, was questioned for less than two hours. He would not comment afterward.

The committee still has not heard from the former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl, who as a board member confronted Foley in the fall of 2005, along with Shimkus.

Their visit came after the House speaker's office learned that Foley sent e-mails to a 16-year-old former male page from Louisiana. While the e-mails were far milder than the sexually explicit instant messages Foley sent to other former male pages, they raised questions. Foley asked what the youngster wanted for his birthday and requested a photograph.

Shimkus has said previously that Foley told him and Trandahl that he was acting as a mentor and that nothing inappropriate had occurred.

Foley was ordered by Shimkus to cease all contact with the former page and assured Shimkus he would do so, the board chairman said. He also was advised to watch his conduct with current and former House pages and he gave assurance he would do so, Shimkus said.

The ethics committee also heard Tuesday from Paula Nowakowski, chief of staff to House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Boehner has said he spoke to Hastert about Foley earlier this year, but the speaker said he does not recall the conversation.

Boehner has said Hastert told him the Louisiana page's complaint "had been taken care of." The majority leader is scheduled to testify this week.

The Kolbe trip was discussed at a conference call of the Page Board on Monday.

The meeting was first revealed several hours later by the lone Democrat on the Page Board, Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan, who declined to say what was discussed. Kildee has been upset that Shimkus never told him about the problems with Foley.

Kolbe took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his former spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said last week.

A federal law enforcement official said last week an allegation related to the trip was given to the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix. It was not immediately clear whether it concerned any contention of improper activity by the retiring Kolbe — the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

The official described the inquiry as preliminary and as far narrower in scope than the federal investigation concerning Foley, who resigned Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit instant messages sent to former pages.

DOJ_NMG_0082807

A second law enforcement official said the 1996 Kolbe trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal matter. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Cline said last week the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister, who was on the three-night trip, said that nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the news media.

Religious Right Finds GOP's 'Big Tent' May Be Too Roomy (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — In recent years, the Republican Party has broadened its appeal with a "big tent" strategy of reaching out to voters who might typically be Democrats. But a debate is now growing within the GOP about whether the tent has become too big -- by including gays whose political views may conflict with the goals of the party's powerful evangelical wing.

Some conservative Christians, who are pivotal to the GOP's get-out-the-vote effort, are charging that gay Republican staffers in Congress may have thwarted their legislative agenda. There are even calls for what some have dubbed a "pink purge" of high-ranking gay Republicans on Capitol Hill -- and in the administration.

The long simmering tension between gays and the religious right within the GOP has erupted into open conflict at a sensitive time, just weeks before a midterm election that may cost Republicans control of Congress.

"The big tent strategy could ultimately spell doom for the Republican Party," said Tom McClusky, chief lobbyist for the Family Research Council, a Christian organization that champions marriage. "All a big tent strategy seems to be doing is attracting a bunch of clowns."

Now the GOP is facing a hard choice -- risk losing the social conservatives who are legendary for turning out the vote, or risk alienating the moderate voters who are critical to this year's midterm outcome.

"There's a huge schism on the right," said Mike Rogers, a gay activist who runs a political "outing" blog to combat what he calls hypocrisy among conservative gay politicians. "The fiscal conservatives are furious at the religious conservatives, because they need the moderates for economic policy. But they need the social conservatives to turn out the vote."

The latest incident to outrage social conservatives was last week's remarks by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the new federal AIDS program administrator. With first lady Laura Bush looking on, Rice swore in AIDS ambassador Mark Dybul, while his partner, Jason Claire, held the Bible. Claire's mother was in the audience, and Rice referred to her as Dybul's "mother-in-law."

"The Republican Party is taking pro-family conservatives for granted," said Mike Mears, executive director for the political action committee for Concerned Women for America, a lobbying group that promotes biblical values. "What Secretary Rice did just the other day is going to anger quite a few people."

It's not just anger at Rice that worries Republicans, but the possible effect on evangelical voters next month.

"For them to highlight that was totally a damper to the base that we need to turn out," said t he Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, a California lobbying group focusing on religious and social issues.

Adding to the disaffection among conservative Christians are the revelations in a new book charging that the White House used President Bush's faith-based initiative for political purposes while mocking evangelicals behind their backs.

The tension between gays and evangelicals in the GOP re-emerged in recent weeks during the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. The scandal drew scrutiny to the presence -- and behavior -- of gays in the Republican party, including Foley and several House staff members.

One evangelical leader, Family Research Council president Tony Perkins, said in a television interview last week there should be an investigation into whether gay congressional staffers were responsible for covering up Foley's habits of picking up men at parties and sending salacious messages to male pages.

Perkins also has questioned whether gay Republican staffers on Capitol Hill have torpedoed their priority issues, such as a Federal Marriage Amendment that would prohibit civil unions for gays. "Has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members and/or staffers?" he asked in an e-mail to supporters.

But some social conservatives deny they are interested in purging gay staffers from the party.

"We're not calling for what I've heard referred to as a pink purge," said McClusky. "We're asking that members (of Congress) might want to reflect on who's serving them. Are they representing their boss's interest?"

DOJ_NMG_0082808

Mears of the CWA observed that purging gays from the party would not necessarily help the evangelical cause in any case. "If you get rid of all the homosexuals in Congress and on the staff, you'd still have Republicans like Chris Shays (the congressman from Connecticut) and Susan Collins (the senator from Maine) pushing the gay agenda."

This week a list of allegedly gay Republican staffers has been circulated to several Christian and family values groups, presumably to encourage an outing and purge. McClusky acknowledged seeing the list, but said his group did not circulate it and had no intention of using it.

Still, for gay Republican staffers on Capitol Hill, it feels as if the noose is tightening. Fearful of having their names on such a list and losing their jobs after the election, they are trying to keep a low profile.

None of the gay Republican staffers contacted for this article would speak for the record. But Eric Johnson, a former Republican staffer who left the party over its anti-gay policies and now works for a Democrat on the Hill, said many of his old friends are worried.

"There's a real concern, a legitimate concern, about a lower glass ceiling -- preventing them from attaining higher positions in the party," said Johnson. "Most Republicans do lip service to the conservative side of gay issues. But on hiring practices, most of them have been pretty reasonable."

Indeed, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., a staunch opponent of gay marriage, has a campaigner manager who is gay. Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., who has compared gay sex to bestiality, has a press secretary who is out of the closet. Both senators are in perilous races for re-election -- and neither staffer would talk.

The GOP for some time has been a bit schizophrenic in its approach to gay issues. Political guru Karl Rove ran Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 by mobilizing opposition to gay marriage, even as Vice President Dick Cheney noted that consenting adults of any orientation should be free to marry, and his daughter Mary Cheney's partner was welcomed at presidential events.

Bush himself has gone out of his way to telegraph a personal friendship with gays. He recently re-appointed Israel "Izzy" Hernandez, a gay man who had been a personal aide to Bush in Texas, to be assistant secretary of commerce and head of an international trade office.

And the Republican National Party says its tent is open to anyone who shares Republican views.

"The Republican Party welcomes individuals from all walks of life," said RNC press secretary Tracey Schmitt.

Regarding the threat of losing support from social conservatives, she added: "Our core supporters understand that a Congress led by Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi would be devoid of a values agenda. They are mobilized and committed to electing Republican on Nov. 7."

Not every Republican thinks running against gays will work for the GOP again this year, as it did in 2004.

"Anti-gay politics isn't playing as well as it did two years ago" said Patrick Sammon, executive director of the Log Cabin Republicans, a lobbying group for gay Republicans. "It's shameful to use gay and lesbian people to score political points, but a corner's been turned. As polls keep moving in our direction, the party will become more inclusive."

Ex-House Clerk May Be A Key In Foley's Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — In the days after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, as elaborate battle plans were drawn to protect members of Congress and preserve government continuity, Jeff Trandahl, the clerk of the House, did something else. He obtained a commercial driver's license.

Mr. Trandahl wanted to be ready for the next emergency. Of all his responsibilities in Congress, a priority was safeguarding the high school students who work as pages. He arranged for buses to be parked nearby, so pages could leave their dormitories or the Capitol. If needed, he would drive them to safety.

His concern for the pages highlights the protection provided to the teenagers in their time here. But it also raises piercing questions about how years of whispers over a congressman's unwelcome advances could escape public notice until being exposed on a television news program.

Mr. Trandahl, a commanding behind-the-scenes player on Capitol Hill before stepping down last year, was little known outside Congress. But he has emerged as a central figure in the case of how the House Republican leadership dealt with the conduct of Mark Foley, the former representative whose sexually charged messages to Congressional pages have shaken the midterm elections.

As the House ethics committee pursues its investigation, few accounts are more crucial than Mr. Trandahl's in determining whether Republican leaders acted with enough urgency. He is scheduled to testify to the committee on Thursday, when he could corroborate — or contradict — accusations that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's behavior at least three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0082809

The House clerk, a vestige of the patronage system, serves at the pleasure of the speaker and, in recent years, Mr. Hastert's influential chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. House investigators are trying to deduce whether a deteriorating relationship between Mr. Van Der Meid and others in the Capitol, particularly Mr. Trandahl, had a role in the handling of the complaints about Mr. Foley.

As House clerk, Mr. Trandahl had a rare bird's-eye view of what was occurring beneath the Capitol dome. As a gay Republican, he also had a window into a subculture not widely discussed within his party.

Although he never dwelled on his sexuality, he also did not go to extreme lengths to conceal it, unlike Mr. Foley, who publicly acknowledged he is gay only after resigning this month.

Mr. Trandahl, 42, has told friends he was not a social friend of Mr. Foley and did not jeopardize pages' safety. He has declined to discuss the case publicly while it remains under investigation by the ethics committee and the F.B.I., which is trying to determine whether Mr. Foley broke laws by exchanging sexually explicit messages with current and former pages.

Interviews with more than 20 former colleagues and acquaintances, Republicans and Democrats alike, paint Mr. Trandahl as a fastidious manager with a penchant for playing by the rules. At the same time, the colleagues and acquaintances said, he was a keen inside player who mastered the art of navigating an institution that is structured to protect its own.

"When the rest of the trees blow down, Jeff Trandahl will be left standing up," said Craig Shniderman, executive director of Food and Friends, a charity here, who has known Mr. Trandahl for nearly a decade. "This is a pretty complicated situation, but I don't have any doubt that he did the right thing."

For seven years, Mr. Trandahl oversaw more than 300 employees, a $20 million budget and House functions. He also supervised the page program. And in the conflicting accounts and varying recollections about when Republican leaders learned of Mr. Foley's conduct, it is Mr. Trandahl who seems interwoven at each step along the way.

In the House, Mr. Trandahl had what amounted to an all-access pass, giving V.I.P.'s and friends tours through little-known corridors and up to the high arches of the rotunda. He guided many facets of House operations from an ornate second-floor office overlooking the Mall. Just a handful of politicians enjoyed a grander view of the Washington Monument.

Mr. Trandahl arrived in Washington in 1983, months after graduating from high school in Spearfish, S.D., to work in the office of Senator James Abdnor, Republican of South Dakota. After Mr. Abdnor was defeated three years later, he found his eager young aide a job on the House side of Capitol Hill, working for the senator's close friend Representative Virginia Smith, Republican of Nebraska.

By then, Mr. Trandahl had earned a degree in government from the University of Maryland and began to stand out as a consummate networker in a city filled with networkers.

He ascended to various positions in the House, seldom forgetting a name or face, and was an experienced insider in 1994 when Republicans took control of the House for the first time in four decades.

In 1998, Newt Gingrich promised to clean up years of patronage largess in the House, first by Democrats and then by Republicans, and appointed Mr. Trandahl acting clerk of the House. After unexpectedly becoming speaker, Mr. Hastert made Mr. Trandahl's appointment permanent.

Suddenly, Mr. Trandahl was a constitutional officer, standing barely more than arm's length from President Bush as he took the oath of office and presiding over the House at the dawn of each session of Congress.

"He wasn't seen as partisan," said George Shevlin, a friend of Mr. Trandahl who is a longtime Democratic staff member of the House Administration Committee. "He was seen as very dedicated to the institution. When things got to be too partisan, that seemed to bother him."

As clerk, Mr. Trandahl supervised the page program. So concerns involving their conduct were routed to him. Most every year, he sent at least some pages home for drinking alcohol, smoking marijuana or simply misbehaving.

Former pages and staff members say he guided the young Congressional errand runners with a fair, but strict hand, earning him the nickname J. T. Money.

"With the kids, money was like gold, and his word was like gold," Matt Frattalli, a former tutor at the Congressional page school, said. "There was no slack with him. You respected him and you feared him."

Over the years, people who worked with him on the Hill said, Mr. Trandahl received periodic complaints that Mr. Foley was acting too friendly to the pages or interns.

The House ethics committee is trying to determine whether Mr. Trandahl simply passed along the information to Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley, or whether he alerted the speaker's office that Mr. Foley's overfriendly behavior had grown beyond idle gossip.

Representative Jim Kolbe, Republican of Arizona, said he informed the clerk's office more than five years ago of concerns a former page shared about an inappropriate e-mail exchange with Mr. Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0082810

Last year, when Mr. Trandahl was alerted to e-mail messages that Mr. Foley had sent a former page in Louisiana, he confronted Mr. Foley with Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the page board.

By the time word of the e-mail exchange surfaced, Mr. Trandahl was making plans to leave Capitol Hill after 23 years. He had accepted a position as executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, blending politics with a lifelong passion for the outdoors.

Friends dismiss the suggestion that his departure was linked to the Foley case.

"This goofy notion that he vanished in a poof of smoke is wrong," said John Scofield, a Republican staff member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Before leaving, Mr. Trandahl received bipartisan praise from Mr. Hastert and the House minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California.

Some aides were surprised that Mr. Trandahl did not accept a lucrative lobbying position here. People close to him said he recoiled at the thought of returning to Capitol Hill to befriend members of Congress while pushing legislation for clients.

It was the culmination of a pattern, friends say, of never wanting to socialize on the Hill after long days and nights surrounded by politics and government.

"I don't control the actors," Mr. Trandahl once told The Aberdeen American News of South Dakota. "But I control every other part."

Now, he spends his spare time in Rappahannock County, Va., where he restored a brown A-frame house on the side of a rugged hill, overlooking waterfalls and a rippling creek filled with trout.

It is 72 miles, but a world away, from downtown Washington, where visitors travel across roads called Fogg Mountain, Fish Hawk Pass and Points of View Lane.

Biz Groups Want Their Money Back (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 18, 2006

The small group of lobbyists who gathered, checkbooks in hand, for a lunchtime fundraiser at Bistro Bis on Capitol Hill a few weeks ago had no idea that some of them would soon be scrambling to get those checks returned.

It was Tuesday, Sept. 26, and the recipient of their largesse was a veteran Republican lawmaker with a choice seat on the House Ways and Means Committee, former Rep. Mark Foley (Fla.). Just three days later, Foley's political career and personal life dramatically self-destructed when ABC News broke the story that Foley had carried on inappropriate Internet conversations with former congressional pages.

These lobbyists are not the only contributors looking to distance themselves from the Foley scandal and recoup the thousands of dollars they gave to help the incumbent, who did not face a competitive challenger, return to the House for his seventh term.

In the weeks since Foley's resignation and retreat into an alcohol-abuse rehabilitation facility, a number of corporate and trade association PACs also have sent word to Foley's campaign that they want refunds.

"I stopped payment on my check," said Andrew Shore, a lobbyist with Mayer Brown Rowe and Maw and a co-host of Bistro Bis fundraiser. Shore already got his uncashed check returned, he said. He estimated that eight lobbyists attended the luncheon and still more sent checks along.

By Friday, Sept. 29, some of them were placing calls to Foley's campaign office in Florida or to the Washington, D.C.-based Catalyst Group, which administered his fundraising: they wanted their money back.

That same evening, the Catalyst Group had severed ties with the campaign and begun referring inquiries to Florida. The Catalyst Group's Joe Rachinsky said they got about 20 calls between Friday and Monday from donors asking what to do.

Under federal election law, campaigns are not required to return contributions on request but anecdotal accounts from donors suggest that candidates typically agree to return money when asked.

The Hill contacted more than a dozen PACs that ranked among the biggest contributors to Foley's campaign and to his leadership PAC this election cycle.

Most did not return calls. Some PACs declined to comment, such as Altria Corporation, which gave $6,000 to the campaign and $1,000 to the leadership PAC, and the Independent Insurance Agents and Brokers of America, which contributed $6,000 to Foley's campaign.

But others disclosed that they have or plan to deliver letters to Foley's campaign treasurer Donna Winterson, also his sister, asking that their money be returned.

The PAC associated with the National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) is one of those that plan to do so. It will ask the campaign to return its $5,000 contribution but it doesn't have high hopes.

"More than likely, [Foley will] say no because he'll use it for his legal defense fund," the spokesman said, voicing concerns that might be shared by many corporate and association executives

The Federal Election Commission (FEC) can permit officeholders to convert their campaign coffers into legal defense funds, as well as other purposes spelled out in regulations. Recently, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) have diverted campaign money to their criminal defenses.

The National Association of Federal Credit Unions, like those Bistro Bis lobbyists, acted quickly to ask for its $1,000, said Dillon Shea, the group's political director. "When we learned that there were inappropriate and possibly illegal [instant messages] and e-mails sent to young [former] pages, we immediately sent a letter to Foley's treasurer requesting our contribution back." They have not heard back.

Likewise, the PAC associated with the insurance company AFLAC has asked that its $10,000 be returned and the American Health Care Association's PAC will send a letter this week requesting a refund of the $7,500 it gave to Foley's campaign this cycle.

United Parcel Service (UPS) spokesman David Bolger said company policy is to ask any candidate who withdraws from a race to return contributions. But the PAC asked for only half of the $10,000 it gave Foley this cycle. UPS wants the $5,000 it views as a general-election contribution to be refunded, Bolger explained. The company considers the other half to have been for the Sept. 5 primary election, and did not ask for it back, he said.

Although only a handful of PACs declared they had written to request their money be refunded, or would do so, more could follow.

Trey Hawkins, the political director of the Credit Union National Association, said it was too soon to decide about the $5,500 the group's PAC gave Foley's campaign. Similarly, William Robb, the physician who serves as treasurer for the PAC affiliated with the American Association of Orthopaedic Surgeons, said its board had not had time to discuss what steps to take.

Even if Foley's campaign abides by requests from PACs and individual donors that their money be returned, the former lawmaker has a sizeable war chest he could use to mount a legal defense against criminal charges, should any be laid against him.

According to disclosure forms filed by Winterson to the FEC on Oct. 11, Foley has $1.94 million in cash on hand, including $193,000 he raised in the third quarter of this year. His leadership PAC raised $1,500 during the same period and has a $14,100 balance.

Foley Set To Name Abuser (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 17 (AP) — Former Representative Mark Foley will reveal to the Archdiocese of Miami the name of the Roman Catholic clergyman he says abused him as a teenager, Mr. Foley's civil lawyer said Tuesday.

The lawyer, Gerald Richman, said the clergyman was still alive.

An archdiocese spokeswoman said the church had urged Mr. Foley to identify his abuser. Mr. Richman said the statute of limitations on sexual assault had expired long ago. He said Mr. Foley had not told him the name of the clergyman but has told another lawyer.

Seeking Post-Foley Unity (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Desperate to talk about something other than scandal, House Republican leadership staffs are coordinating a messaging blitz in an attempt to shift some emphasis back to national security and the economy before the Nov. 7 election.

With less than three weeks for the GOP to salvage its majority, the new media campaign is the first formal coordination between leaders' offices since they were fractured by the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) sexual explicit messages to underage former pages.

Aides to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) met yesterday in the Lincoln Room of the Speaker's Capitol suite to plan ways to help embattled Republicans sidestep national media and target local press.

"We have 20 days to get our message out," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "Our focus will be to expose that a Democrat majority would stand for higher taxes and national security policies of weakness and appeasement."

DOJ_NMG_0082812

Republicans are struggling to maintain their majority in the face of dismal poll numbers and stumbles by the White House and the elected leadership, particularly on the Foley matter.

Spending by the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) suggests that the field of vulnerable Republicans continues to expand. A handful of GOP lawmakers in safe seats also saw a modest drop in their internal poll numbers in the two weeks after the Foley scandal broke, aides to those members said last week.

In an effort to refocus House Republicans after two weeks of questions about whether Hastert's senior aides knew about Foley's history of inappropriate contact with pages, Boehner sent members a memo on Monday urging them to move their message beyond the Foley scandal and work to define congressional Democrats on national security and taxation.

"Just as we were looking forward to going home to talk about what we'd accomplished, the despicable conduct of former Congressman Mark Foley instead became the story," Boehner wrote.

He then explained that leaders took "action to engage the appropriate authorities to conduct a thorough review of all the facts.

"Having done this, Republicans are back on offense on the big issues facing our nation."

These House GOP efforts come as national Republicans try to rally staff, donors and volunteers amid widespread fear that the party will lose power in at least one chamber.

On Monday, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman urged GOP aides at the Capitol Hill Club to contrast the two parties on issues such as national security and the economy, an aide present said.

Mehlman walked staffers through some positive developments in states he had visited recently, such as Missouri and Ohio, and explained how he thought Republicans could still hold their majorities in both chambers despite the poisoned political environment.

Afterward, Republican pollster Ed Goas explained how the Foley scandal had a limited political impact and how some of the most recent polls underrepresented the GOP's base voters.

Republicans have seized on remarks by Democratic leaders in the House to suggest they would let President Bush's tax cuts lapse or even raise taxes to close the budget deficit. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has said she would include a provision in the rules package to implement pay-as-you-go budgeting rules, something conservative Republicans strongly support but that would require Congress to either make drstic cuts in feeral spending or raise taxes.

In his memo to members, Boehner includes a transcript from NBC's "Meet the Press" in which Pelosi, responding to a question about whether Democrats would raise taxes, said, "You put everything on the table and you decide what are the priorities for the American people."

Democratic aides said their party remains committed to middle-class tax cuts and charged the Republicans with making desperate political attacks.

"Republicans are playing the only hands they have by trying to create a distraction with desperate and false barbs," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "Leader Pelosi and House Democrats making fiscal responsibility a high ethical standard and middle class tax cuts a top priority must be a frightening prospect for the failed economic policies and ballooning budget deficits created by President Bush and his rubber stamp Congress."

Republican leaders in the House are working to coordinate with the White House and various committee chairmen to hold conference calls with local media in competitive districts in an attempt "to define Democrats before they define themselves."

"We'll promote the strong Republican positions of fighting the War on Terror and growing the economy to a near 12,000 stock market high," Bonjean said.

The conference office sent out statements by Hastert, Boehner, Blunt and Pryce yesterday commending Bush for signing a law reinforcing the administration's program to try terrorism suspects. Hastert and Boehner both took shots at congressional Democrats while Blunt and Pryce focused on the benefits of the law itself.

Republican staffers are widely discouraged about their chance of holding the House in November.

Despite leadership efforts to refocus the debate, the ethics committee continues to question members and staff about when leaders first knew about Foley's inappropriate contact with pages, ensuring that this story will remain in the news through the election.

House Sergeant at Arms Bill Livingood, who is one of six members of the House Page Board, and Boehner chief of staff Paula Nowakowski appeared before the investigative panel yesterday. Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose office sponsored one of the pages at the center of the scandal, is scheduled to appear today and Boehner is expected to answer questions tomorrow.

The Associated Press reported that members of the Page Board are interviewing former pages that took a rafting trip in 1996 organized by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.).

DOJ_NMG_0082813

Whatever comes out of the ethics investigation, Republican leaders will continue their efforts to frame the debate as the election approaches.

The staff is planning to meet each morning and convene daily conference calls to discuss strategy during the remaining days before the election, aides said, adding that they hope to include committee staff and up to 30 Republican press secretaries to help.

"We're working together to remind the American people of the clear choice they face this election," Blunt spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said.

Foley Scandal Turns Parents Into Web Sleuths (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro And Anjali Athavaley

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Lori Hahn of Sacramento, Calif., has made a habit of talking to her three teenagers about being careful whom they talk to online. Now, after the discovery that former Rep. Mark Foley sent sexually explicit instant messages to congressional pages, she says she is no longer taking any chances.

WATCH A VIDEO

1

Parents can use2 Web filtering software to help protect their children from online predators.

"The Foley news spurred me to take action," says Ms. Hahn, senior operations manager for a consulting firm, who days after the scandal broke installed IMSafer, a new program that promises to send her an email when sexual or predatory language appears in her children's IM conversations. "I trust their judgment. But I don't trust the people who are out there. The software gives me a little peace of mind."

The fallout from the Foley scandal has sent shockwaves through Congress and rattled employees across the country who are increasingly on edge about whether their boss is tracking their every online move. And, as new evidence about the vulnerability of kids online emerges in spurts, it is also jolting parents into better monitoring what their children say and do at their computers.

Tools that allow parents to prevent their kids from accessing Web sites with potentially objectionable content have been available for years, often offered free through Internet service providers. But in recent weeks, more parents are turning to pricey software programs that record not only what Web sites their kids visit, but also the content of their emails and instant messages. Some software comes bundled with services that flag suspicious behavior automatically, eliminating the need for parents to sort through the digital trail on their own.

In the two weeks since the scandal broke, sales of services that enable parents to monitor their kids computer use -- from Solid Oak Software Inc.'s $40 CYBERsitter Web filtering tool to a social-networking profile tracker from BeNetSafe LLC ($20 a month or $80 a year), have seen double-digit sales growth, according to the companies. SearchHelp Inc. of Syosset, N.Y., maker of software programs that allow parents to block Web sites, peek at their kids' computers in real time and receive text messages or emails when their children type or search for certain keywords and phrases -- saw online sales jump 10% during the same period. The news is also helping them get their product stocked in more mainstream retail locations, most recently at 191 Duane Reade Inc. pharmacies in the New York City area where the company's line of Sentry monitoring software was in stores this week.

Vendors have rushed to capitalize on the interest with new products. IMSafer Inc. fast-tracked the launch of software that creates an online record of suspicious words or phrases (like phone numbers or body parts) that surface in IM conversations. Since then, more than 600 people have signed up for the service, says Brandon Watson, founder and chief executive of the Houston-based company. The basic service is currently free but upgrades, such as the ability to monitor chats on social-networking sites like MySpace.com, will soon carry a $30 annual subscription fee.

More employers, meanwhile, are offering cyber-safety classes for employees grasping for advice on how to better protect their own kids online. ComPsych Corp., a Chicago-based company that provides employee-assistance services, reports a 20% increase in phone calls from parents who are concerned about cyber-safety since the Foley scandal broke. The company has also seen an increase in the number of employers who have requested counselors to come conduct cyber-safety classes, 90-minute sessions that review various online threats and provide tips on warding off predators.

With children spending more and more time online, protecting kids while they are at their computers is emerging as a huge concern. One in seven 10- to 17-year-olds who use the Internet have received a sexual solicitation or approach online, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Legislators are seeking a variety of ways to stamp out the problem by proposing new filtering and safety laws and by pressuring popular Web sites like News Corp.'s MySpace.com to better police their sites and enforce minimum-age restrictions.

Despite the warnings, experts say parents are still relatively complacent -- in part because they are intimidated by the software involved. Just 32% of online parents who have teens at home protect their computers with parental controls, according to Forrester Research, a market researcher. The vast majority of those use filters from Internet service providers because they are free and require little or no installation. AOL offers parental controls that can be tuned to the child's age or to block access to specific Web sites, for instance. Apple Computer Inc. and Microsoft Corp. offer similar options for some versions of their operating systems.

Only 10% of those who choose to monitor their kids invest in separate software purchased at a retail outlet, products that range from less intrusive applications that notify parents when suspicious activity occurs to nearly $100 programs that record exactly what appears on their kids' screens all the time.

Some of the newest products -- which must be installed on each machine being monitored and typically can't be disabled without the username and password of the person who installed it -- are designed to give parents the sense they are sitting at their kids' screens. SpectorSoft Corp. of Vero Beach, Fla., this month launched a new version of its surveillance software -- the $99.99 Spector Pro -- that lets parents scroll through a log of all the sites visited and emails and instant messages sent like a videotape on the computer they are tracking. The software, which resembles a product the company makes for corporate users, can be set to take pictures every second and to record keystrokes. Solid Oak Software, which has made a popular filtering software called CYBERsitter for years, last month launched SnoopStick, which allows parents to monitor their child's computer activities -- from IM conversations to Web browsing -- by plugging a USB drive into any computer.

But as with previous snooping software, problems such as high prices and installation glitches persist. Penny Herndon, a 44-year-old from Walnut Creek, Calif., recently tried to install SnoopStick on her daughter's computer, only to find that she was unable to connect to her daughter's computer from her own. Ms. Herndon, a forensic medical researcher, did finally get the connection working after customer service directed her to go to the start menu and to run a particular file. She says she hasn't had any problems since.

Cunningham Said To Help Two Contractors (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

Disgraced former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham parlayed his seat on the Intelligence Committee into at least $70 million in business for two contractors who in turn paid him millions in bribes, an investigator hired by the panel has concluded.

The investigator's report, released Tuesday by the committee's top Democrat, found that Cunningham had exploited weaknesses in the system for monitoring secret federal spending.

It said that he and at least one associate secured the cooperation — or at least the acquiescence — of many people. They included members of Congress and their aides who handled bills that directed money to certain programs, Pentagon officials who awarded the contracts and officials at agencies where the contract work was done.

"This was a lot of people to persuade, cajole, deceive, pressure, intimidate, bribe or otherwise influence to do what they wanted," the report's executive summary says.

In a sign of partisan divisions on the committee, California Rep. Jane Harman, its top Democrat, unilaterally released the five-page document after months of disagreement with the committee's chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. Together, the two had initiated the investigation, led by special counsel Michael Stern, and had hoped to release the findings jointly.

Harman said the committee must examine why "red flags" did not trigger greater scrutiny of Cunningham's activities, and she added that she and Hoekstra had worked on internal changes that must be made permanent. "The goal should be to make certain that no Cunningham of either party should be able to soil our committee again," Harman said in an interview.

Hoekstra said Cunningham's efforts to enrich himself are "reprehensible" and Harman's decision to release an internal committee document "is disturbing and beyond the pale." Her action "underscores her personal decision to politicize the committee and this critical inquiry," he said.

Now serving a sentence of more than eight years, Cunningham pleaded guilty in November to accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes from alleged coconspirators — government contractors Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes.

Wade, former president of MZM Inc., has also pleaded guilty to lavishing Cunningham with a yacht, cash, cars, antiques and meals over four years. Wilkes, who has not been charged, was the founder of San Diego-based ADCS Inc.

Cunningham's attorney, Lee Blalack, and Wade's attorney, Reginald Brown, both declined to comment on the report. Blalack said the committee has not provided him a copy of the document, and Brown said he and his client weren't contacted for the investigation.

Wilkes' attorney did not immediately return a call for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0082815

The House Intelligence Committee is charged with laying out intelligence spending priorities in an annual authorization bill, based on requests from lawmakers and government agencies. It then falls to the House Appropriations Committee, where Cunningham was also a member, to approve the spending.

Intelligence authorization bills are often quite broad, but some members are skilled at steering money to certain businesses.

The investigators found the committee authorized $70 million to $80 million in funding over five years that had been requested by Cunningham on behalf of Wilkes and Wade. When the legislation did not specify that the money go to companies associated with the two contractors, Cunningham still found ways to steer the funds by making his views known or using narrowly tailored language.

In one case spanning three years, Cunningham got the committee to direct to MZM a contract with a Pentagon unit called Counterintelligence Field Activity, despite aides' worries that it was a "pork barrel project and a waste of taxpayer money," the report says.

The investigators found that the committee's ability to conduct oversight of the work "appears to have been seriously impeded by the corrupt conspiracy between Cunningham and Wade."

The executive summary also acknowledges questions that remain unanswered:

· Stern's request to interview Cunningham has never been fulfilled. Harman and Hoekstra wanted to subpoena him, but Hoekstra didn't want to issue a subpoena only to have Cunningham invoke his Fifth Amendment protections, as his attorney has warned he would do. Hoekstra said discussions are continuing about Cunningham's testimony.

· Stern said "significant information" has remained out of reach. The House Appropriations Committee did not respond to requests to interview some of its staff, and follow-up requests to the Pentagon regarding some of its contracts have not been met.

· The report sees a need for law enforcement and national security agencies to examine Cunningham's dealings with foreigners. "While our review has not identified any national security breaches resulting from the Cunningham conspiracy, we are aware of dealings that that Cunningham had with certain foreign nationals," it said.

The investigations into Cunningham, Wade and Wilkes have included a number of figures whose alleged roles are only slowly coming into focus. They include the former No. 3 official at the CIA, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who retired this year under a cloud. Five federal agencies are looking into whether he used his position to improperly award classified CIA contracts to Wilkes, a close friend, and to others.

The report says more investigation is needed into Foggo's dealings with the intelligence panel, given his close relationship with former committee aide Brant Bassett. The investigator highlighted a June 2003 dinner with Bassett, Foggo, Wilkes and an unnamed individual at a Capitol Hill steakhouse.

The report said the unnamed individual managed a company that is involved in the investigation into whether Foggo abused his position. Through CIA spokespeople, Foggo has denied wrongdoing.

Foggo and Bassett tried to motivate other committee aides with "gifts of government trinkets such as carpets emblazoned with the words 'Global War on Terror,'" the report said. "At this stage, it is unclear whether these actions violated any law or regulation, but further inquiry is appropriate."

Bribes Cost Millions In Earmarks (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham inserted up to $80 million worth of earmarks for the contractors who bribed him into classified intelligence authorization bills between 2000 and 2006, bullying staff who became concerned, according to an interim report from a special House investigation.

The report, an unclassified five-page summary of a much longer document, is the fullest accounting to date of how Cunningham -- a California Republican now in federal prison after pleading guilty last year to bribery charges -- corruptly used his position on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence to steer government business to two contractors.

It says that over six years, Cunningham and co-conspirators Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes "repeatedly sought to use [the committee] to facilitate the objectives of the conspiracy, particularly through requests for congressional funding ... that benefited Wilkes, Wade and other companies," which it does not identify.

The interim report, written by a specially appointed outside counsel, was made public by the ranking Democrat on the committee, Rep. Jane Harman of California, over the protests of Chairman Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0082816

"The unilateral decision by Harman to break our bipartisan, written agreement ... by releasing an incomplete, internal committee document that has not been reviewed by the other committee members is disturbing and beyond the pale," Mr. Hoekstra said, accusing Mrs. Harman of attempting to "politicize the committee and this critical inquiry."

Hoekstra spokesman Jamal Ware said that the chairman and the majority staff became aware of Mrs. Harman's intention to release the document only a few minutes before it was made public.

Cunningham pleaded guilty last year to taking $2.4 million in bribes from Wade and Mr. Wilkes. Wade admitted bribing Cunningham and others, but coverage at that time focused on the abuse of Cunningham's position on the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense.

That subcommittee appropriates funds for U.S. intelligence agencies, and the intelligence committee also authorizes their spending. Earmarks can be added by either. Cunningham's membership on both panels, the report says, was "key to the success of the Wilkes/Wade funding requests."

Another key was Cunningham's "willingness to pressure and intimidate individual [committee] staff members" who became concerned about the projects he was supporting, according to the report.

Among the subjects that the report says are being investigated further by "appropriate law enforcement and national security agencies" are reported gifts to a Republican committee staffer from Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, a former ranking CIA official.

Report Spells Out Abuses By Former Congressman (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Former Representative Randy Cunningham pressured and intimidated staff members of the House Intelligence Committee to help steer more than $70 million in classified federal business to favored military contractors, according to a Congressional investigation made public on Tuesday.

The investigation found that Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican who is serving an eight-year prison sentence for bribery, repeatedly abused his position on the committee to authorize money for military projects, often over the objections of staff members who criticized some of the spending as wasteful.

The inquiry also found that despite numerous “red flags” about the propriety of a particular contract for work on a controversial Pentagon counterintelligence program, committee staff members for three years “continued to accept and support Mr. Cunningham’s growing requests for this project.”

Mr. Cunningham resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2 million in bribes from military contractors. His plea was mainly related to his activities as a member of the House Appropriations Committee.

The investigation’s report lays out for the first time how Mr. Cunningham maneuvered within the classified world of the Intelligence Committee to win secret contracts for two friends, Brent R. Wilkes and Mitchell J. Wade, both contractors.

Lawyers for Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Wade declined to comment on the report. A lawyer for Mr. Wilkes was traveling outside the country.

The report is another embarrassment for Congressional Republicans, who, three weeks before Election Day, are trying to contain the damage from accusations that former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, made sexually explicit remarks in e-mail messages to Congressional pages. The report on Mr. Cunningham was made public by Representative Jane Harman of California, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee.

Ms. Harman’s action drew a rebuke from Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan and chairman of the committee, who called the release “disturbing and beyond the pale.”

In an interview, Ms. Harman said Tuesday that the public had a right to see the conclusions of the inquiry, which was led by Michael Stern, an outside special counsel, and completed in May. She said she had been pushing for months for the committee to produce an unclassified version of the report.

“I thought it would be out in early August,” she said, “well ahead of the election season.”

Only the five-page executive summary of the report was released. The full 59-page report remains classified.

Several crucial witnesses, including Mr. Cunningham, Mr. Wilkes and Mr. Wade, were not interviewed for the investigation.

Mr. Cunningham’s positions on both the Intelligence Committee and the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee gave him an advantage in obtaining classified spending provisions called earmarks.

In theory, the Intelligence Committee is supposed to authorize classified expenses before the Appropriations Committee puts them into military spending bills. But in practice, the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee has sometimes originated classified earmarks on its own, and the Intelligence Committee depends on the appropriators for its spending requests. By serving on both panels, Mr. Cunningham had influence over the entire classified budget process.

DOJ_NMG_0082817

The inquiry found no evidence that staff members of the Intelligence Committee had profited or expected to profit from Mr. Cunningham's dealings. It also concluded that committee staff members had been suspicious of Mr. Wade and "disinclined to provide him any favorable treatment."

At the same time, committee staff members repeatedly acceded to Mr. Cunningham's demands to steer money to Mr. Wade's company, MZM Inc. The report describes how Mr. Cunningham worked to gain support within the Intelligence Committee for a program run by MZM at the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency of the Pentagon.

The counterintelligence program has been criticized by civil liberties groups, which say it authorizes military officials to spy on Americans under the guise of protecting domestic military bases.

But as a result of a "corrupt conspiracy" between Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Wade, the inquiry found, the Intelligence Committee's ability to monitor the counterintelligence program effectively "appears to have been seriously impeded."

The report cited Mr. Wilkes's close friendship with Kyle Foggo, formerly a top administrator at the Central Intelligence Agency, who helped manage the agency's dealings with contractors. The inquiry found that Mr. Foggo also worked with Intelligence Committee staff members, including Brant G. Bassett, a former C.I.A. officer, on classified projects relating to the management of the agency.

Mr. Bassett and Mr. Foggo provided Intelligence Committee members with "trinkets" to win favor for their efforts, including a carpet displaying the words "Global War on Terror." The report said it was not clear whether these activities violated any regulation or law, but it recommended further inquiry.

The report suggested that Mr. Foggo, who is under investigation by federal authorities in San Diego for his dealings with Mr. Wilkes on a logistics contract, might be facing a broader inquiry than had been known. It said the investigation of Mr. Foggo also involved "several large contracts" managed by an unidentified contractor, who attended a dinner in June 2003 with Mr. Foggo and Mr. Wilkes at the Capital Grille here.

Mr. Foggo's lawyer, Mark J. MacDougall, declined to comment.

Report: Staff Caved To 'Duke' (HILL)

By By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, October 18, 2006

An executive summary of an internal House Intelligence Committee report released Tuesday by the panel's top Democrat gives the fullest accounting to date of how disgraced ex-congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) used the intelligence panel and its professional staff to fund two defense contractors, who in turn, bribed him.

Cunningham, a former defense appropriator and chairman of the Intelligence terrorism, human intelligence, analysis and counterintelligence subcommittee, was able to obtain the intelligence panel's authorization for up to $80 million in funding for projects requested by defense contractors Mitchell Wade and Brent Wilkes.

The committee staff was fully aware that the funds were intended for a specific recipient and "either actively cooperated with or did not resist Cunningham's efforts to steer the funds toward that recipient," according to the report.

Intelligence Committee Chairman Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), took immediate offense to ranking member Rep. Jane Harman's (D-Calif.) decision to release the summary, saying that the move shows "blatant disregard" for a bipartisan agreement they had made to fully review the Cunningham matter and charging her with politicizing the inquiry.

Harman (D-Calif.) released the five-page unclassified report three weeks before Election Day as Republicans are playing defense on several ethics fronts.

In a statement, Hoekstra said that Cunningham had "reached out to the committee and offered his testimony, a possibility the independent counsel is still reviewing," noting that until a final determination can be made on whether Cunningham will testify, the inquiry cannot be considered complete.

Harman's decision to release the summary and Hoekstra's virulent reaction deepens a rift between the two that began months ago over whether Cunningham, who is now in prison, should be subpoenaed for the internal-panel investigation, which special counsel Michael Stern is conducting.

Harman has argued that the ex-lawmaker should be subpoenaed, but Hoekstra said subpoenaing him would not produce any new information because Cunningham would invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. In the meantime, Hoekstra contacted Cunningham in an effort he said was made to informally convince him to participate in the investigation — a move that Harman has called "totally inappropriate."

In a statement, Harman said that earlier this month Hoekstra agreed that it would be "appropriate" for the committee to release the five-page executive summary and Harman said she invited Hoekstra to join her in releasing it.

"In light of this report, our committee must examine why 'red flags' did not trigger greater scrutiny of Cunningham's activities, and what can be done to prevent this type of abuse in the future," Harman said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0082818

The web of corruption involving Cunningham, Wade and Wilkes has spread beyond the halls of Congress to the Pentagon and the CIA.

The report did not identify any specific national security breaches resulting from the Cunningham corruption, but it did find that Cunningham had dealings with certain foreign nationals, a discovery the committee expects the appropriate national security agencies and law enforcement officials to examine.

Cunningham's status as a defense appropriator with the power to influence the intelligence panel's key priorities and his willingness to pressure and intimidate individual staff members were key to the success of his funding requests to Wade, the owner of MZM Inc. and Wilkes, the owner of ADCS Inc., according to the report.

Wade pleaded guilty earlier this year to conspiring to bribe Cunningham, among other crimes. Cunningham is already serving an eight-year jail term after pleading guilty in November to accepting $2.4 million in bribes from Wade and Wilkes. Wilkes has not been charged with any crimes and has not pleaded guilty.

As a consequence of the conspiracy between Wade and Cunningham, the ex-lawmaker obtained support in 2003 for a new project at the Counterintelligence Field Activity office, which helps identify and thwart terrorists and spies. Committee staff agreed to support the project despite concerns that it wasted taxpayers' money.

Over time, aides also encountered numerous "red flags" with the new project, as well as with Wade's ethics, but despite those signs, Intelligence Committee staff members continued to "accept and support Cunningham's growing requests for this project from [fiscal year] '03 through FY 06," according to the report.

The conspiracy between Wade and Cunningham impeded the intelligence panel's oversight over the project and the agency itself. The committee was reluctant to share negative information about MZM and when it did, "there was little that … staff was willing or able to follow up," the report said.

But the report states that staff who dealt with Wade were, to varying degrees, suspicious of him and were not inclined to favor him other than the treatment they provided as a consequence of caving to Cunningham's demands.

The report also sheds light on the relationship between Brent Wilkes, Brant Bassett, a former panel staff member and ex-CIA operative, and Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's No. 3 officer, who resigned after federal investigators raided his house in connection with the Cunningham corruption investigation.

Porter Goss, the former head of the CIA and ex-chairman of the Intelligence Committee, who had a close relationship with Foggo, also resigned but insisted at the time that his decision to step down had nothing to do with the corruption investigation.

Bassett, also known as "Nine Fingers" after losing one digit in a motorcycle accident, served as staff director of the Intelligence Committee when Goss was the chairman. Bassett had a close relationship with Foggo, who has known Wilkes for decades. While on the committee, Bassett worked with Foggo "to achieve certain objectives relating to the management of the CIA, " according to the report.

Bassett also introduced Foggo to key committee staff and they both sought to motivate those staffers to take certain desired actions by giving them government trinkets such as a carpet emblazoned with the words "War on Terror."

"At this stage it is unclear whether these actions violated any law or regulation, but further inquiry is appropriate," the report recommends.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department investigation of Foggo in the Cunningham matter includes awards of several large contracts to a company owner other than Wade and Wilkes. Foggo introduced Bassett to that individual in the spring of 2003 when Bassett was contemplating whether to leave the committee for the private sector.

"While we have not determined that Bassett had any involvement in the award[ing] of the CIA contracts either to Wilkes or to the other individual, we believe additional inquiry is warranted to determine whether Bassett or anyone else at the [committee] facilitated or was involved in any of the contract awards," the report said.

Many In Government Helped Cunningham Or Yielded, Panel Finds (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) channeled more than $70 million in Pentagon and intelligence agency contracts to two companies that paid him bribes, and required the "cooperation or at least the non-interference of many people" to pull that off, a congressional investigation has found.

Since Cunningham had no authority to award contracts, he needed the acquiescence of some members of Congress, congressional staff members and Defense Department officials, according to the executive summary of an investigation by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence into his activities as a panel member.

"This was a lot of people to persuade, cajole, deceive, pressure, intimidate, bribe or otherwise influence to do what they wanted," the executive summary says.

Although the congressional inquiry was directed at Cunningham's activities and found no evidence of corruption among panel staff members, the five-page summary written by the panel's special counsel, Michael Stern, indicates how the continuing federal criminal investigation of corruption and bribery has continued to spread since it began almost two years ago.

The summary discloses for the first time that the government is investigating the CIA's award of "several large contracts" that involved Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo when he was No. 3 at the agency under then-Director Porter J. Goss. Foggo was a longtime friend of contractor Brent R. Wilkes, who federal investigators say was one of Cunningham's co-conspirators along with contractor Mitchell J. Wade.

Foggo resigned in May after being linked to the Cunningham inquiry. Days later, federal agents searched his agency office and his rented home in Northern Virginia.

Yesterday, agency officials refused to comment on the newly disclosed information, saying the matter is under investigation. Foggo was originally investigated by both the CIA inspector general and federal prosecutors after it was alleged this year that he had helped Wilkes obtain CIA contracts and had improperly accepted vacation trips from him.

The House report adds that another Foggo friend, Brant Bassett, a former CIA officer who worked as a staff member of the House intelligence panel, has been drawn into the case. Bassett, Foggo, Wilkes and the unnamed person who received the large CIA contracts "apparently had dinner together at the Capital Grille in June 2003," according to the summary. Stern says that meeting warranted further inquiry but was outside his jurisdiction to investigate.

The summary says Cunningham had "dealings . . . with certain foreign nationals" that have apparently triggered inquiry by "law enforcement and national security agencies."

In November 2005, Cunningham pleaded guilty to taking bribes and is serving a prison sentence of up to eight years. Wade pleaded guilty in February to giving $1 million in bribes, and his sentencing has been postponed until March. Wilkes has yet to be charged but was listed as co-conspirator No. 1 in court documents charging Cunningham.

Published reports have indicated that other members of Congress are under investigation, including Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. Stern, in his report, says requests to the committee for permission to speak to current and past staff members have not been answered.

House intelligence panel staff members were aware of Cunningham's activities and in some cases saw "red flags" but did not interfere, the report says. It adds that there was "no evidence" uncovered that any past or present committee aides "sought to profit or expect to profit personally from any of the funding requests," Stern wrote.

Release of the executive summary by the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), added fuel to the running partisan battling going on in the committee, and quickly drew criticism from its chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.).

Harman said that she acted because the original investigation was finished in May and the unclassified executive summary in July, and that the release was held up because of a disagreement between her and Hoekstra over subpoenaing Cunningham to testify. Earlier this month, according to Harman, Hoekstra agreed to release a mutually agreed upon version of the summary, which was completed last week.

Hoekstra, in a statement yesterday, described the release as "disturbing and beyond the pale," and called the summary an "incomplete, internal committee document" that other panel members had not reviewed. His statement echoed words Harman used this month when Hoekstra released reports by the committee majority staff on North Korea and Iraq that were done without the approval of Democrats on the panel.

Wade's company, MZM Inc., benefited from several questionable contracts given by the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency (CIFA), the Pentagon's newest intelligence arm, which was created in 2002 to coordinate protecting defense facilities and personnel at home and abroad from terrorist attacks. Its budget is secret, but congressional sources earlier this year said it totaled more than $1 billion over the past three years; its staff consisted of 400 full-time employees and 800 on contract status.

Cunningham, as a member of the intelligence panel, chaired the terrorism subcommittee that had authority over CIFA. The House committee's "ability to conduct appropriate oversight over the counterintelligence project at CIFA, MZM's other contracts with CIFA, and arguably CIFA as a whole appears to have been seriously impeded by the corrupt conspiracy between Cunningham and Wade," the report says.

CIFA's two top officials, director David A. Burtt II and his deputy, Joseph Hefferon, suddenly resigned in August, but other officials at the agency refused to discuss any link to the ongoing investigations. A Pentagon spokesman said their leaving was "a personal decision that they both made together."

Republican Weldon Blasts 'liberal Attack Machine' For Publicity (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale
AP, October 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A day after the FBI raided the offices of a lobbying firm run by Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and his close friend, the Republican's campaign blamed publicity about the Justice Department investigation on "the left-wing, liberal attack machine."

The FBI is investigating whether Weldon used his influence to get Karen Weldon's firm nearly $1 million in lobbying contracts with foreign companies, two people familiar with the inquiry have told The Associated Press.

Weldon pushed the agendas of three of the firm's clients in public and private, at times urging the U.S. to buy their weapons or issue them visas, according to news reports published over the past 2 1/2 years.

On Monday, Weldon questioned the timing of the raids and said his sometimes unpopular stances may have angered people on both sides of the aisle - including Republicans who control the Justice Department.

"Bureaucracy is not Democrat or Republican. Come on," Weldon said Monday.

But on Tuesday, his campaign lashed out at the left.

"Now three weeks before the election, the left-wing, liberal attack machine has launched a coordinated effort to smear U.S. Rep. Weldon and his family in a desperate attempt to steal this seat," Weldon's campaign said in a statement.

Weldon's campaign spokesman said there are Clinton-era holdovers among the civil-service employees in the Justice Department.

"I don't mean to impugn the motive of the Justice Department, but there may be partisan motives for leaking word of this inquiry three weeks before the election," the spokesman, Pete Peterson, said.

The 10-term incumbent already faced a razor-close race against Democratic challenger Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral. The two are scheduled to debate Friday.

Weldon has clashed with the Bush administration and others in Washington. Over the past year, the congressman has repeatedly said a secret military unit called "Able Danger" used data.m.ining to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. The Pentagon rejects the idea.

The FBI on Monday raided six sites in Pennsylvania and Florida linked to Karen Weldon, her business partner Charles P. Sexton Jr. and their firm. The FBI removed evidence from their homes and office and from the Jacksonville, Fla., headquarters of their former client, a Russian energy firm called Itera International Energy Corp.

The lawmaker on Tuesday blamed the investigation on the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and a group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which he said was supported by Democratic activists. In 2004, the group asked the Justice Department to investigate Weldon for alleged bribery for "using his public office to benefit companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist."

Weldon has not received a target letter - essentially a prelude to an indictment - and has not been contacted by the Justice Department about the probe, Peterson said.

Philadelphia attorney Jim Rohn, who was retained Monday to represent Karen Weldon, said she has not received a target letter and has offered to cooperate.

"From my point of view, my client hasn't done anything wrong. I've been in touch with the prosecutor, and I've offered to have her cooperate," Rohn said.

Karen Weldon, 32, runs Solutions Worldwide with Sexton, one of her father's closest friends and political allies. Sexton ran the Republican Party in Delaware County, Weldon's home base, for decades.

Sexton's lawyer, Joseph Fioravanti, declined to comment on the investigation Tuesday.

Investigation Is Just Politics, Lawmaker Says (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Representative Curt Weldon is describing a federal investigation into whether he acted improperly on behalf of his daughter's lobbying firm as an election-season ploy that will find that "I engaged in no wrongdoing."

"I am extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress," Mr. Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, said in a statement issued Monday evening. "The timing of this situation is deeply concerning."

Mr. Weldon is in a tight race against his Democratic opponent, Joseph A. Sestak Jr., a former vice admiral, in a district near Philadelphia that he has represented for 10 terms without a difficult re-election challenge.

He said in his statement that he had confirmed the government investigation, which was first reported in news accounts over the weekend, and that he would cooperate with it.

DOJ_NMG_0082821

The congressman described the investigation as “preliminary.” But law enforcement officials said the inquiry, which began in the spring, had advanced well along. These officials said searches carried out by federal agents on Monday at six locations, including the homes of his daughter and a close political ally of his, reflected its quickening pace.

Mr. Weldon said he was disappointed by the “politics of personal destruction,” which he attributed to “left-wing liberal activists.” He singled out one group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which two years ago sent a letter of complaint to the Justice Department asking that he be investigated.

The complaint was centered on a Los Angeles Times article in February 2004 that said Mr. Weldon’s daughter, Karen, had reaped financial benefits from his position on the House Armed Services Committee. Mr. Weldon said Monday that the article had been referred to the House ethics committee and that the panel had concluded after its own inquiry that he had done nothing wrong.

The article reported that in September 2002, Mr. Weldon helped bring 30 Congressional colleagues to a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor the chairman of a Russian natural gas company, the Itera International Energy Corporation, several days before the company hired Karen Weldon’s lobbying and public relations firm, Solutions North America.

The Jacksonville, Fla., offices of Itera, Solutions’ first client, and the Philadelphia offices of Solutions were among the locations raided by F.B.I. agents on Monday. So was the home, near Philadelphia, of Ms. Weldon’s partner in Solutions, Charles P. Sexton Jr., a longtime associate of the congressman.

Mr. Weldon spoke favorably about Itera in a floor speech in 2002, traveled to Russia that year to visit the company’s offices and attended the opening of its American headquarters, in Jacksonville, in 2003. When he led a Congressional delegation to Eastern Europe in 2002, Itera paid for his daughter to join him on the trip.

Weldon's Ties To Serbian Businessman Part Of Probe (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade were surprised three years ago to be invited to a luncheon in honor of visiting Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), hosted by Bogoljub Karic, a wealthy Serbian businessman who had been barred from visiting or trading with the United States because of his close ties to former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic.

Weldon "was visiting solely because of Karic," whom he was trying to get off the U.S. blacklist, a former senior embassy official familiar with the visit concluded. "It seemed odd" at the time, because Karic had no obvious tie to Weldon's district outside Philadelphia, and Weldon should have known the embassy was shunning contacts with him, the official said.

What the embassy apparently did not know is that the Karic family that year signed a contract with Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner that called for monthly payments of $20,000 for "management, government and public relations," according to a copy of the March 2003 contract. In all, the family paid Karen Weldon's firm $133,858 that year for efforts she undertook to set up a foundation for it.

Curt Weldon's visit and that deal are under investigation by the FBI, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the probe. His efforts to assist clients of his daughter's consulting firm in their dealings with the federal government are the focus of that probe, according to sources familiar with it .

FBI raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida on Monday, including one of Karen Weldon's home and another of her consulting and lobbying firm, were part of the bureau's search for evidence of whether the lawmaker used his influence to benefit himself or his daughter's firm, according to the sources. They spoke on the condition that they not be named because of the sensitivity of the investigation.

A grand jury has been impaneled as part of the investigation, and it has obtained evidence gathered via wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers, the sources said.

Weldon has said he did not take actions to enrich his daughter or himself. His attorney, William J. Winning, said yesterday that "the congressman did nothing wrong, nor did his daughter do anything wrong." Winning added that he was not prepared to justify or discuss Weldon's travels.

Besides looking at Weldon's Karic connection, the FBI is examining the lawmaker's contacts with a Russian-managed oil and gas company, Itera International Energy Corp., the sources said. The company's offices in Jacksonville, Fla., were searched on Monday.

Itera spokesman Steve Koegler declined to answer questions yesterday, but released a statement saying that the government had expressed interest Monday in "any records or information Itera might have with respect to Itera's business relationship with Solutions Worldwide." The name of the firm that Karen Weldon operates with one of her father's close political supporters, Charles Sexton, is Solutions North America Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0082822

"Itera and all of its employees have cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the government's request," the statement added.

According to a statement Karen Weldon filed with the Justice Department's foreign agent registration office, Itera agreed in September 2002 to pay her firm a $170,000 startup fee and $300,000 more in monthly retainer fees, in exchange for "such consulting services" as the company might request.

That was the same month that her father attended a lavish dinner for the company at the Library of Congress, at which Itera's director, Igor Makarov, announced the start of a U.S.-Russian student exchange program, based in Weldon's district. Members of Congress were to nominate participants in the program.

That year, Weldon complained to the U.S. Trade and Development Agency about its cancellation of a grant to Itera to explore a gas field in Siberia.

In filings with the Senate clerk, Weldon has reported that Itera paid for a trip he took to New York in September 2002 and a one-day trip to Jacksonville in January 2003. He also reported that a nonprofit group directed by Itera officials financed his two-day visit to Jacksonville in November 2002.

Weldon, who has long advocated closer U.S.-Russian trade ties, listed another client of his daughter's firm, Saratov Aviation, as the financial sponsor of a three-day trip to Moscow in January 2003, the same month as a visit he took to Belgrade.

Weldon's chief of staff went to Belgrade in November 2003, initially listing the Karic family as his financial sponsor in a filing the next month with the Senate clerk. Two months later, after reporters for the Los Angeles Times questioned him about the trip, he amended the filing to state that he had reimbursed the company for his travel expenses.

Some watchdog organizations previously noted Weldon's support for companies that had little to do with his constituents in Delaware County and that paid fees to the firm operated by his daughter and Sexton, or to a close friend of Weldon's, lobbyist Cecilia Grimes.

"There seems to be a pattern of Congressman Weldon's activities overlapping with his private and personal interests," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, which monitored the efforts of Weldon and other lawmakers on behalf of companies that had contracts with their associates. "You can explain away one or two cases, but here you really have to question what's going on here and is it really in the interest of the U.S. taxpayers."

Weldon gave testimonials on behalf of a company, Advanced Ceramics Research, in two separate hearings of the House Armed Services subcommittee on tactical air and land forces, which he chairs. Weldon had invited the Arizona company's CEO to testify in 2004 and 2005 about what he characterized as its "very interesting work in developing state of the art composites that have increased performance while significantly reducing component cost."

The congressman lauded the company's work, noting its ability to produce "modern composites that lead to lighter weight, lower cost and tougher systems."

Advanced Ceramics Research paid Grimes $60,000 as its registered lobbyist in 2003 and 2004. An affiliate of Advanced Ceramics paid her an additional $40,000 during that time, according to her lobbying registration documents.

Efforts to reach Grimes at two phone numbers listed for her on lobbying registration forms were unsuccessful.

Weldon also supported an Italian defense contractor, Oto Melara, in a formal letter and testimony to the Armed Services Committee that recommended the Navy consider using the company's guns on its ships. Oto Melara has paid Grimes's firm $60,000 since she registered to lobby for it in June 2005, according to her lobbying reports .

Research director Lucy Shackelford and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Weldon's Itera Ties Long Known (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

As President Bush prepared to announce a new energy cooperation pact with Russia in May 2002, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and 10 fellow lawmakers sat down in Moscow with executives of oil and gas trader Itera Group, praising the company as a prime prospect for U.S. partnerships.

Itera had fallen under scrutiny at the time for its ties to Gazprom, Russia's state-owned natural gas giant, but its congressional clout remained strong, with help from Weldon and his daughter, Karen, whose public relations firm signed a $500,000 contract with Itera four months after the 2002 trip.

Itera is facing new questions this week after federal agents raided the company's Florida office as well as the homes of Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, her business partner and a longtime adviser to the embattled ten-term Republican, locked in the toughest re-election fight of his career. But despite Weldon's public speculation about a politically motivated probe, one Democrat came to Itera's defense yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0082823

"I only have good things to say about them," said Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.), whose district includes Itera's Jacksonville headquarters. Brown, who joined Weldon on the 2002 codel to Russia, led a later celebration of Itera's 10th anniversary in Florida that featured entertainment from Oscar winner Isaac Hayes and two Russian pop singers.

Brown said she was "really surprised by the nature of the investigation" of Weldon's links with Itera and two other foreign clients of his daughter, which Brown said she first heard of through news reports this week. "I just don't know how whether or not a person had a [lobbying] client would generate that kind of response."

Brown issued a statement on the 2002 codel, her portion of which was approved and paid for by the transportation committee. Lawmakers on the trip met with members of the Russian Parliament and the president of Uzbekistan and Azerbaijan, she said.

Karen Weldon and Sexton filed a lobbying registration for Itera International on Sept. 13, 2002, less than two weeks before nearly 30 lawmakers from both sides of the aisle joined Rep. Weldon for a Library of Congress dinner honoring Itera and its CEO, Igor Makarov. In a floor speech after the event, Rep. Weldon said the dinner was in gratitude for the May 2002 meeting and referred to meetings he suggested between Itera executives and former Central Intelligence Agency chief James Woolsey.

Itera did not return a request for comment on its meetings with Weldon and other lawmakers. Itera's lobbying stable includes Brown's daughter, Shantrel Brown Fields, who signed a deal in February for her firm, Alcalde & Fay, to represent the company on "international debt issues."

Weldon's office declined to comment on the ongoing probe, other than to point out that the lawmaker has not been contacted by the Justice Department. His lawyer in the criminal inquiry did not return a call for comment by press time.

James Rohn, a Pennsylvania lawyer representing Karen Weldon, said she plans to cooperate with the government actions. "From where I sit, she hasn't done anything that's wrong," he said.

In a statement posted late Monday to his campaign Web site, Weldon called the timing of the raid and investigation "deeply concerning."

Referring to a 2004 House ethics committee inquiry into Weldon's advocacy for his daughter's clients, opened at his behest, Weldon also asserted that the panel had absolved him of wrongdoing. Yet the ethics committee never publicly released any findings from that inquiry, suggesting that it may not have been completed.

Weldon's Democratic opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, out-raised Weldon during the third quarter and continues to win plaudits from the national party for a well-run campaign. His camp has stayed largely silent as the federal raid dominates local media coverage, letting Weldon's ethics drama play itself out with no distractions.

Despite Weldon's hints of a politically motivated probe, nonpartisan ethics groups point out that the Justice Department has conducted itself under a Republican administration.

"One thing I've noticed about the FBI is, they don't give two hoots about the election calendar or sessions of Congress," said Craig Holman, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch. "If they did, they would have come through with these indictments earlier in the session when we were trying to get meaningful lobbying and ethics legislation through."

William Canfield, a Williams & Jensen lawyer and former Senate Ethics Committee aide who represented Weldon in the 2004 matter, said the Justice Department's moves would likely stave off any further House ethics committee action this year.

"Plus, if he doesn't win, they're not going to care. … [There is] no impetus for them to do something until after the election," Canfield said. He questioned why federal prosecutors would rev up their pursuit of new information in the caseatthis late date. "Why it took two years for the Justice Department to read the L.A. Times, I have no idea."

Two other foreign clients of Solutions North America are at issue in the federal investigation: Russia-based Saratov Aviation, for which Karen Weldon and Sexton registered to lobby in 2003 under the firm name Solutions Worldwide, and the Karic brothers, members of a Serbian family linked to deceased dictator Slobodan Milosevic.

The Odor From Capitol Hill (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

As predicaments go for champions of family values, few can top the embarrassment suffered by Representative Curt Weldon when federal agents raided the home of his daughter, a Washington lobbyist, in search of evidence that the powerful lawmaker helped her with lucrative clients. The grand jury is still out on the investigation, and Mr. Weldon, a Pennsylvania Republican, says he is innocent. But with each fresh scandal, the tattooing of the G.O.P.-run 109th Congress continues in pre-election polls.

Voters had no sooner adjusted to the shock of seeing Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, disgraced from office by his come-ons to Congressional pages than Bob Ney took his turn on the pre-election scandal smorgasbord. Representative Ney, Republican of Ohio, pleaded guilty to being a principal in the quid-pro-quo insiders' market run by Jack Abramoff, the corrupt Republican lobbyist who is cooperating with investigators about his ties to Congress and the White House.

Another Republican, former Representative Randy Cunningham of California, is already doing time. He sold his office in steering $70 million in contracts to companies that offered bribes ranging from a Rolls-Royce to a carpet emblazoned "Global War on Terror."

It should be remembered that Speaker Dennis Hastert, now under fire in the Foley scandal, helped dampen any chance of in-House ethical controls in his failed attempt to save the career of former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, an Abramoff ally who is accused of political money laundering and is awaiting trial. The sight of the ossified ethics committee forced back to life by the Foley scandal is more pathetic than heartening. It's small wonder that lawmakers feel empowered to make ethical stretches — like Representative John Doolittle's boosting his own family's value by having his wife designated a consultant and paying her a 15 percent commission off the top of his campaign kitty.

The hustings ring with Democrats' vows to restore ethical spine. But the minority has its own problem in Representative William Jefferson of Louisiana, who is accused of taking bribe money and hiding it in his home freezer. And Democrats are not helped when their Senate leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, amends his ethics filings to better report a real estate windfall, and misuses campaign money to pay helpers at his Washington condo.

The G.O.P. leaders have themselves to blame for their multiple millstones. If they had passed actual ethics reform, instead of deep-sixing it in bromides, there could have been a believable independent corruption office to take some of the heat off their current plight as compromised self-investigators. (One of the defeated reforms would have denied pensions to lawmakers convicted of official abuses. Instead, Messrs. Cunningham and Ney are likely to keep collecting behind bars.)

Congressmen caught in wrongdoing at this time of year like to complain that they're the victims of election-eve politics. If the looming elections inspire whistleblowers, we say bravo. The prospect of voting day fills the vacuum created by the absence of an actual set of enforceable ethics rules in Congress.

Labor Leader Accused Of Taking $2.2 Million (NYT)

By ANEMONA HARTOCOLLIS And STEVEN GREENHOUSE

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

Brian M. McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman who as head of the nation's biggest municipal labor council personified New York City's politically powerful labor movement, was arrested yesterday on federal racketeering charges involving embezzlement, receiving bribes, fraud and money laundering. Conviction on all 43 charges could send him to prison for decades.

A 186-page indictment charges Mr. McLaughlin, 54, with illegally obtaining $2.2 million from taxpayers, labor unions and contractors over the last decade since he became president of the New York City Central Labor Council, a federation of 400 union locals with one million members.

The accusations range from the Dickensian (stealing $95,000 from Little League baseball teams to pay his rent) to the brazen (creating two no-show jobs on his legislative payroll and keeping part of one salary), according to the painstakingly detailed racketeering indictment unsealed yesterday.

Mr. McLaughlin surrendered early yesterday. He pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in Federal District Court in Manhattan before Magistrate Judge James C. Francis IV, and was released on $250,000 bail. His lawyer, Jonathan Bach, did not return a call for comment.

Law enforcement officials said that Mr. McLaughlin used subordinates as "personal servants," to take his dog to the veterinarian, hang Christmas lights, trap rodents in his basement and clean out his barn.

He is also charged with making an aide use his E-ZPass at tollbooths to make it appear that he had returned home from Albany later than he really had, allowing him to bill for daily allowances given to legislators.

He is accused of using more than $330,000 from his re-election campaign funds to pay for personal expenses like a rehearsal dinner for his son's wedding, renovation of his $760,000 house in Suffolk County near Long Island Sound, payment of his country club membership fees and the purchase and installation of a plasma television for a female friend.

He is charged with using stolen money for an $80,000 Mercedes-Benz for his wife, marina fees, school tuition for one of his children, rent payments on his Albany residence and rent payments on his Queens residence.

Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for Manhattan, said the extent of the thefts was "stunning in its breadth and scope," at a news conference yesterday announcing the indictment.

"This case lends a new meaning to the term 'hand in the till,' " he said.

Asked why Mr. McLaughlin would go to so much trouble to steal money when he was making what many would consider much more than a decent living — $263,600 in combined salaries and expenses as an assemblyman and labor council president — Mr. Garcia said he could not offer any insight, except to say, "What we have here is really a story of greed."

DOJ_NMG_0082825

For more than a decade, Mr. McLaughlin was among the most influential labor leaders in New York City and in the state, providing pivotal early support for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg's re-election and supporting the failed effort to build a football stadium on the Far West Side of Manhattan. He led the fight to keep Wal-Mart out of the city and lent strong support to transit workers during last year's strike.

The investigation became public seven months ago when the F.B.I. raided Mr. McLaughlin's offices.

Some labor experts said they were shocked by the scope of yesterday's accusations, which could represent a huge embarrassment for organized labor and elected officials.

"If these charges prove true, it's certainly a blot on the union movement, and whenever there's a corruption case involving a high-profile union leader, it has to hurt that much worse," said Joshua Freeman, a professor of labor history at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York.

Mr. McLaughlin, a Democrat, is the eighth state lawmaker accused of crimes in recent years. He announced in January that he would not run for an eighth Assembly term.

Republicans did not hesitate to capitalize on the indictment. "Today, New York's Assembly Democrats continued their long tradition of corruption," Stephen Minarik, chairman of the Republican State Committee, said in a statement.

A spokesman for the Assembly speaker, Sheldon Silver, a Democrat, would say only that the Assembly had cooperated with the inquiry.

Denis Hughes, president of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O. and chairman of the labor council's executive board, responded to the indictment with a statement: "Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations."

Labor Leader Arrested For Racketeering (AP)

By Pat Milton, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- The president of the nation's largest municipal labor council was arrested on federal racketeering charges Tuesday, accused of stealing more than $2 million from the state, labor unions and even a Little League fund.

Brian M. McLaughlin, a seven-term Democratic state assemblyman and president of the New York City Central Labor Council, has been under investigation for several years.

He surrendered Tuesday morning and was released on $250,000 bail after a brief appearance before U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. Francis. McLaughlin and his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, declined to comment as they left U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

"Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations," said the labor council's executive board chairman, Denis M. Hughes.

The labor council is an umbrella group of unions that has supported Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

In a 186-page indictment unsealed Tuesday, McLaughlin and others are accused of engaging in racketeering from 1995 through 2006 by using money collected for union activities to instead pay personal expenses, including credit card bills, rent and home improvements.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin committed mail fraud, embezzlement, money laundering and labor bribery by diverting money from various funds he controlled.

Among the funds identified were McLaughlin's political campaign committee, union accounts meant to provide benefits for union members and even contributions meant to support a Little League baseball program.

